been fought by every member of the party on this floor except the Senator from Connecticut. What are we to conclude? That they propose to carry out the doctrine of the New York Democratic platform. Now that the Senator himself is an exception to the great rule, although I admit that his powerful aid brought to that party may do a great deal; it does not give it a character, I am sorry to say, and never will so long as he holds his present opinions; and I am afraid that unless he becomes a little more orthodox he will not stay there with a great deal of comfort. Therefore I say that however I may respect the authority and the opinions of the gentlemen who have been referred to I hope the vote of the Senate to-night will show that they do not represent the opinions of those who made the Chicago platform, in which it was said that we intended to pay our debts not only according to the letter but the spirit of the contract into which we entered.

Mr. DAVIS. It is a very late hour, Mr. President; still I shall say a few words on this important subject.

Mr. POMEROY. Will the Senator give way to a motion to adjourn?

Mr. DAVIS. Oh, no; I do not want an adjournment.

Mr. President, the courts of the country have no jurisdiction over the subject-matter of the bill that is now pending before the Senate between the Government of the United States and the bondholders. I wish they had. I wish that the point in dispute between the bondholders and the Government could be referred to the Supreme Court of the United States for its decision, and I have no doubt what that decision would be. The Government has had a transaction of borrowing money from the bondholder. It did not receive in this loan coin. It did not receive gold or silver. It received greenbacks and a depreciated currency, and gave its bonds for the nominal amount of money thus borrowed. What is the law of usury, and what is the law against usury and extortion in such a state of case?

Suppose the honorable Senator from Ohio, the chairman of the Committee on Finance, had loaned me $1,000 in greenbacks and I had given him my note for the repayment of the sum of $1,000, and upon the maturity of the paper I refused to pay and he was forced to bring a suit against me, I could make him disclose upon oath as to the consideration and the manner in which that bond had originated, and could make him confess that it was a loaning on his part and a borrowing upon my part, not of $1,000 in gold and silver, but of $1,000 in greenbacks; and upon his admission of those facts, or my proof of them, what would be the judgment and the duty of the court? It would be that the greenbacks should be scaled at their value at the time of the loaning and the borrowing of the money, and that he should have his judgment for the value in gold and silver of these greenbacks with legal interest upon it. That would be the simple judgment of the court. I say that any court of chancery of intelligence in the United States in precisely an analogous transaction between individuals would render the judgment that I have indicated, and that decree would be according to the law and the equity of the case.

What is my further position? The same law that would regulate a transaction of this character between individuals ought to regulate it, and ought to be the rule of it between the Government and the bondholders. The Government does not permit itself to be sued. It establishes its own rate of interest. It may make it six, five, four, or three per cent., according to its sovereign will, and there is no power on earth that can control the action of the Government in relation to that matter. But, sir, when the Government goes into the market and borrows money, and that money is a depreciated paper, the same rule of law and equity, and the same judgment of the chancellor and the same judgment of the court that would be rendered in a case between individuals would be just, equitable, and reasonable between the Government and its creditors who had loaned it money.

Men may talk as much as they please about bonds and greenbacks. I am against any such medium of payment. The Constitution and the law know no greenbacks as a legal tender or as the payment of debt. The only legal tender is gold and silver currency; and when judgment is rendered in favor of a creditor against a defaulting debtor the only proper judgment that can be rendered is for dollars, meaning gold and silver. But when the transaction has been a lending and borrowing, and a depreciated, spurious currency has been the subject loaned, although the bond may call for dollars according to the nominal amount of this spurious and depreciated currency, it is usury, it is extortion, to exact it; it is against conscience; and whenever a chance for is appealed to he ascertains the consideration of the bond, its value at the time of the loan, and he gives a judgment or decree for the value of the consideration of the bond in gold and silver. Now, Mr. President, I say that what is equitable and right and according to conscience between individuals in a court of chancery is equitable and right between the Government and its creditors, the bondholders.

I wish that this case could go before the Supreme Court just as it would between private parties who were residents in different States. Upon the making out of the transaction before that court as it appears before the Senate and Congress the only relief and the full extent of the relief to which the creditors, the loaners of this depreciated paper to the Government, would be entitled would be the value of their depreciated paper at the time it was loaned, with legal interest upon it.

Now, Mr. President, what does the bill under consideration propose to do? It proposes to pay about nine hundred million dollars more than the sum that is actually due the bondholders upon this equitable principle. The law of usury is familiar to every tyro in the legal profession. A bond may not say anything about borrowing and loaning money or about the medium in which it is borrowed; but all this may be the subject of allegation and proof, and when it is alleged and proved in a court of chancery the only relief that the lender is entitled to is the value of the depreciated paper which he has loaned with interest upon it. I ask these gentlemen by what authority, by what principle, can they give $900,000,000 to those bondholders that they are not in equity entitled to? I turn to the honorable Senator from Ohio, and I tell him that if he was the executor of a deceased party who was a debtor for $1,000 in just such a transaction as exists now between the bondholders and the Government he would be bound to plead the usury in a suit brought against him as the personal representative of the obligor. He would be bound to make the plea, and if he failed to make the plea he would be personally responsible for the difference between the gold value of the money and the nominal amount of the bond in gold.

Mr. President, I would appeal to the honorable Senator from Ohio in another aspect that will illustrate this whole matter. Suppose he was the guardian of an infant child whose father had had a transaction of borrowing money in this depreciated paper and that child was sued in connection with the personal representative, and the property which it inherited from its father was sought to be made subject to the payment of the debt. As guardian of that infant child he would have to put in the plea of usury, he would have to plead the facts of the case. If he omitted to do so he would be guilty of default in his fiduciary capacity, and of such default as would make him personally responsible for the amount which he might save to his ward by making the plea.

Sir, is the fidelity and obligation of a guardian or of an executor greater to his cestui que trust than is the obligation and fidelity of the Congress of the United States to their cestui que trust, the people? No, sir. It is the duty of Congress now to ascertain the value of the greenbacks that were loaned upon the issue and sale of these bonds by the purchasers to the Government at the time of the transaction, and when this value is ascertained all that in justice and in equity, all that would not be condemned as usury and extortion, which Congress would be authorized to pay would be not the nominal amount of the bonds, but their value in gold and silver at the time that they were sold by the Government, at the time that the Government borrowed the money upon them.

Sir, there is no difference in principle, there is no difference in justice and equity between the Government of the United States when it borrows money and your honor who presides over the Senate if you borrowed money of the same kind. You, sir, having borrowed money in the form of these greenbacks, there is not a man who has read law for three months who would not concede that although you had executed your notes for the nominal amount, and although you had expressly promised in the most explicit language to pay in gold and silver coin, still you could go into an investigation of the nature and consideration of the contract of loaning and borrowing, and you could scale it to the value of the paper which you borrowed, which with interest from that time would be the relief and the utmost relief that your creditor would be entitled to against you.

Sir, I ask for the application of this simple and universally executed principle of law and equity to prevent fraud, extortion, and usury. I ask for the application of this simple and just principle to the present bill. If it be applied there is no difficulty. All that is to be done is to ascertain what was paid for these bonds when they were purchased by the bondholders. At the time of the purchase they purchased by loaning to the Government money upon them; they received bonds for the nominal amount that was loaned, but it is a fact demonstrable that the average amount of money loaned on these bonds did not exceed sixty cents in the dollar. I have made the computation. The excesses of interest upon the gold value of the bonds that has been paid being six per cent. in gold is usury; and what is a universal principle of law in the decision of usurious contracts? That such sums as are paid in interest above the legal rate shall be applied to the satisfaction of so much of the principal at the time that it was paid.

I have made a computation upon these bonds on these two principles. I have ascertained their gold value at the time they were sold, and I have charged as principal the usurious interest that was paid from time to time as it was paid upon the bonds, and it makes a difference of upward of nine hundred million dollars between their nominal amount and what is really due according to their gold value at the time the money was loaned upon the bonds. What is the proposition of the honorable Senator from Ohio and of the majority in the Senate? It is simply to give as a gratuity to the bondholders against the people of the United States, and to make the people of the United States answer by taxes for $900,000,000 beyond what they owe upon the bonds according to all the principles of law and of equity. Against that I protest, and I say that so far from this being a dishonest rule of settlement, any rule that would give this $900,000,000 in addition is the foulest extortion; it is usury excessive; it is fraud and robbery upon the people; it is a flagrant violation of their trust and power by the Congress of the United States to the people who are to be taxed to pay this $900,000,000 in addition to what is honestly and equitably due on the bonds, and I say that the bill for these reasons ought not to pass.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Missouri. [Mr. HENDERSON.]

Mr. HENDRICKS. Before the vote is taken I have a very few remarks to make. I did not expect to add anything to what I had said until

I heard the rather remarkable suggestion of the Senator from Maine, [Mr. FESSENDEN.] He attributed to me a sentiment that is to be found in the report of the Committee on Finance, and said that such a sentiment was a foul reproach. Of course the Senator did not understand that that sentiment had been first expressed by the Committee on Finance, but in this debate it was simply quoted by myself from their report as a part of my argument. And then the Senator went on further to state that it was not the report of the committee, but the report of the learned Senator from Ohio. I am sure that before the Senator from Maine expressed himself so positively he ought to have examined the subject. It is not right for him to attribute to me, and then to characterize in rather offensive language, sentiments that are found expressed in an elaborate report of the leading committee of this body. Now, sir, this report commences in this wise:

"The Committee on Finance, to whom was referred so much of the President's message as relates to the public debt, and the report of the Secretary of the Treasury on the state of the finances, is called upon to report upon three important subjects necessarily connected with each other."

Then the subjects are stated in the report, important subjects connected with each other; and the report closes, as in the language of the committee, by what was known as the funding bill. And yet the Senator from Maine in the excitement of the debate attributed this report, one of the most elaborate and deliberate productions of a committee that this body has witnessed, as simply a report of the Senator who made it. Why so? If this were a foul sentiment and a reproach that it should be uttered why did not the Senator so denounce it at the time, and why did he wait until I simply repeated the sentiment? Is it because the committee were of his own party and I was not? Is that the justice of the Senator in public debate?

Now, sir, I will read again the sentiment that he characterizes as a foul reproach; and then the question is distinctly between him and the distinguished committee that expressed it. Discussing the question whether the five-twenty bonds might be paid in greenbacks as an equitable and just proposition the committee uses this language:

"If this question rested solely upon the act of February 25, 1862, and the bonds had been negotiated under that act alone, it would be manifestly a breach of faith to redeem the bonds with the present United States notes. They are very different from the first legal-tender notes, which, from the limited amount authorized and the privilege to convert them into bonds, could not have had a less market value than the bonds. But it was found that with such restrictions upon the notes the bonds could not be negotiated, and it became necessary to depreciate the notes in order to create a market for the bonds. The limit of notes was trebled and the right to convert them taken away. The amount of United States notes in circulation when the bonds were negotiated was equal to the amount now outstanding, so that the question arises whether by the terms of these several acts the bonds may be redeemed with notes of the precise character paid for the bonds when negotiated by the United States."

Mr. President, I have read the entire passage.

Mr. SHERMAN. It is but just to the committee, and the Senator will find it in the report which is carefully considered, to say that the committee expressed no opinion whatever, and expressly disclaimed the purpose of expressing any opinion on the question of the legal construction of the law. I have no doubt some misapprehension has grown out of the fact that subsequently in a speech I made on the funding bill, in which I expressed my own opinions and expressly disclaimed expressing the opinions of the committee, I did give the opinion that has been commented on, that by the legal terms of the acts issuing the bonds there was no distinction made between the lawful money of the United States in the payment of the bonds. And in the report—I have not read it for a long time—I am quite sure the Senator will find that no opinion was expressed by the committee or for the committee as to the legal construction of the law, because there was a difference in the Committee on Finance as there was a difference in the Senate, and is to this day, as to the legal construction of the law.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I believe that I understand not only the letter but the very spirit of this report, and when I advert to it I think the Senator from Ohio will concede that I place a proper construction upon the language which it uses. I am not just now discussing the question which the Senator from Ohio raises in his interruption. I am answering the language of the Senator from Maine. He felt himself authorized to use that very strong language that it was a foul reproach that the sentiment was expressed that there had been a purpose to depreciate the currency of the country with a view to float the bonds in the market; that it became necessary. I was not a member of this body when the several laws were enacted authorizing the issue of the Treasury notes. I of course did not have a personal knowledge by any association with the gentlemen of this body of the purpose of the several enactments; but first it is plain that there were $150,000,000 provided for, and again there was a further issue of $150,000,000, and again six months afterward another $150,000,000, making an aggregate of $450,000,000 provided for.

I am commenting upon that action of the Senate and of the House at different dates providing for these large issues of Treasury notes, and how does the committee state it? That by the act of 25th February, 1862, $150,000,000 of Treasury notes were provided for, and an issue and sale of Government bonds by the same act was authorized, and the committee states it logically and forcibly that the $150,000,000 of Treasury notes would not float the bonds, that these Treasury notes had value because of their limited amount and because of the fact that at the pleasure of the holder they were convertible into bonds, so that these notes being thus convertible into bonds could not fall below the market value of the bonds, and it became necessary, says the committee, to depreciate the notes by taking away that quality which gave them a market value equal to bonds, a convertible quality, and treble their quantity. This was the means resorted to. I say I was not here to know the motive, and it was right for me, in judging of the purpose of this legislation and judging of the equities that are now urged upon us in favor of the bondholders, to ascertain the spirit and purpose of this legislation from the authoritative statement of the leading committee of this body; and when I did say so it was not right for the Senator from Maine to say that it was a reproach. Was it a reproach? Was it a reproach that deliberately the Congress of the United States by taking away the convertible quality of the notes and by trebling their quantity upon the market depreciated them, and that this was necessary in order to secure a market for the bonds? If that were necessary it is not to be charged upon me as a reproach that I referred to it in this debate.

Mr. President, the Senator also said that it was without foundation in fact that the people did ever intend to pay less than a dollar when they promised to pay a dollar. Who said they promised to pay less than a dollar? Who defined what a dollar is? I did not. I have never given a very earnest support to the doctrine that Congress ought to define what should be a dollar. I have not questioned, I have not yet felt it to be my public duty to question, the constitutionality of the legal-tender clause; but the Senator from Maine I expect was a supporter of the act of the 25th of February, 1862, and that act in as plain and emphatic language as can be commanded declares that these Treasury notes are dollars, declares that they are not only legal tenders in the discharge of public obligations and private debts but that they are lawful money of the United States. When the Senator by the act of February 25, 1862, said that these notes were lawful money of the United States what did it mean? I want to know of the Finance Committee what it meant. I understood it to be, in my plain understanding of language, that these Treasury notes in respect to their power to discharge debts and as a standard of value should be equal in dignity and force with gold and silver, and that for the purpose of discharging all public indebtedness except the interest on the public debt and except where the Government has promised to pay gold, and also in the discharge of debts between man and man, these Treasury notes were dollars. Was it not so? If I am wrong now let the Senator correct me. If they were not dollars it was because your act had not constitutional force and validity. If it had constitutional force and validity you said that these Treasury notes were dollars, dollar for dollar, according to the face of the obligation.

Then, sir, my argument this afternoon did not state that the people of this country had ever undertaken to pay a dollar with less than a dollar, but that when the people of the United States promised to pay so much money, and did not expressly agree to pay it in coin, then the reading of the obligation is that they will pay it in the lawful money of the country. If I promise to pay to the honorable Senator from Maine by my note $1,000 in money, let me ask him will he raise the question whether I may discharge that with less than a dollar for dollar? He would not ask gold of me upon such an obligation; he would say that the construction of that promise made by me to him was a promise to pay in the lawful money of the United States, and that if I did not in my obligation agree to pay gold the legal construction would be Treasury notes, upon which you by law have impressed the quality of money.

Then, sir, why make the fling that somebody wants to pay less than a dollar for a dollar upon a promise of the Government? I have not suggested it. I have said, however, that when the promise is plain and the construction cannot be doubted we have no more right to impose upon the people of the United States an additional obligation without some new consideration than the Senator would have a right to demand of me twenty-five per cent. more than the legal construction of my contract entitled him to. That is where the question is. It is not a question of legal construction; it is a question of now making the bonded debt of this country, $600,000,000, worth more than it is under the contract. That is the question.

Why, Mr. President, who can doubt it? The very law that said that these bonds might be issued and did not authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to say that the bonds should be paid in gold provided for the issue of paper which should be lawful money and which might pay these very bonds, and these Treasury notes were issued at the same time the bonds were issued and before the bonds were sold, and upon these Treasury notes you impressed the quality and the power to pay these bonds. What did you mean when you said in the act of February 25, 1862, that these Treasury notes should be receivable in the discharge of all the obligations owing by the Government except the interest of the public debt? What do those plain words mean to the people, to common-sense people? When you said in plain words that the Treasury notes, amounting in all before these bonds were negotiated to $450,000,000, according to the statement of the committee, should be receivable in payment of the public obligations except the interest on the public debt what did your law mean? If these five-twenty bonds cannot be paid with the Treasury notes what public obligations can be?

The other bonds the laws provide shall be paid in gold. Then the other securities can be paid in currency. If these Treasury notes are not a legal-tender discharge at the election of the Government of these five-twenty bonds what is the meaning of the language in the act of 1862, I should like to know? It is not going to satisfy the country even for a Senator of the great weight and eminence before the country of the Senator from Maine simply to say that it is not honest. That will not quite do; he has got to come to the point for the people to understand it. In 1862 that Senator said that this paper was money, that it was lawful money, that it was the lawful money of the United States, and by his vote that Senator said that this lawful money in the Treasury of the United States should be a full and sufficient discharge of the Government's obligations except the interest, and it would seem to be reasonable that the Government should then have so provided, for in that very law you said that these Treasury notes should be receivable by the Secretary of the Treasury in payment for the bonds when they were sold, and then when the bonds are to be paid the same kind of money should go in their discharge in the hands of the holder. That is just the plain statement of what your law says. If it is knavery to stand by that, then you have induced me to the knavery by very singular language. Go back and correct the language of 1862 before you talk to me about knavery. Go back and correct your own legislation. Do not charge me with knavery when I form a judgment that is supported by the language that you put upon the statute-book; and when you vote a gratuity of $600,000,000 to be taken from the people and to be given to the men that hold these bonds do not say that it is knavery if I refuse, because I stand upon the letter of the statute. I stand there. I wish to see the bondholders get all that is consistent with the interests of the people and with the obligations of the people toward them; but I wish to see it brought about by a restoration of prosperity, by an increase of production, by a sale abroad of our great staples which will bring the gold in a current toward our shores instead of a constant flow from them. I have no faith at all in a restoration of our finances to a sound condition and a sufficient volume of currency in the country, except as we find it in a restoration of production, an increase of production, and a command of the foreign market.

We may be deluded. We may have fair promises made. It is not the first time. Assurances are very easily given; but commerce has never yet been restored in this world by mere paper promises. Commerce has its own great laws, and it is restored, becomes sound and successful by its own development, by production, by the results of labor. Our legislation must be of such stable and wise character as that it will give confidence to industry and will stimulate enterprise and investment. We must have the lands that are now lying waste cultivated once more. Our untilled fields must blossom and bloom and ripen with the grain and with the cotton and tobacco. Then I see a way to a sound currency and a sufficient volume. But in the assurances that are given us I do not see it; I do not expect to see it. When I know that there is an increase of production then I know that we shall have an increase of currency. When the people have much to sell there is no difficulty in having plenty of currency. He who causes two blades of grass to grow upon the ground where but one grew before renders a higher service to his country than the ablest politician. That is the philosophy upon which we are to have restored prosperity in this country, in my judgment. We must have abundant corn crops, and stock, and all the productions of the different sections, buy less and sell more, and we shall soon have a specie basis for our currency; but you may tell the Secretary of the Treasury to commence paying out gold to-morrow, and the result will be what was beautifully described by the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. McCREERY] a few days ago. The sun of that day, as he said, will go down upon an exhausted Treasury. It cannot be done. You cannot pay a debt of this magnitude with $200,000,000 of gold in the country.

Mr. President, I have occupied now more of the attention of the Senate than I expected to do on this question. It is an important one, and ought not to be disposed of in this way. If we are ready to provide for this debt let us do it. If Congress is now ready to provide for this debt let us go to the work. This bill does not pay it. It does not pretend to pay it. It does not suggest resources from which the payment is to be brought. It simply proposes a construction. What an advance would a couple of gentlemen make in the adjustment of their affairs, one owing the other and not having the means to pay and the debt not being due, if they met and held a consultation as to the meaning of the contract? That is what we are at to-night, as I understand it. We are trying to put upon the contract a construction that the letter will not admit; that is the trouble of it, and a construction that the people of this country will not hold themselves bound by if you put it upon it to-night.

If we have such a return of prosperity as that the currency will become of uniform value, that our paper currency will be of the same value with the gold currency, then, indeed, this question will be removed, all controversy about it will be removed; but as long as there is a material difference between gold and paper the people will say, "We will stand by the contract." I think so, and I guess they have the right to say so. If this declaration of construction to-night were made upon a new consideration then of course it would become obligatory.

Mr. PATTERSON, of New Hampshire. I should like to ask the gentleman if it was not a part of the contract in the law of 1862 that the greenbacks should be absorbed in five-twenties. Now, if they had been all absorbed in the five-twenties, in what would the five-twenties be redeemed but gold and silver?

Mr. HENDRICKS. The act of February 25, 1862, did provide that the holder of the greenback might deliver that to the Secretary of the Treasury and receive a bond. That was the convertible quality of that note: but under the acts of July 11, 1862, and March 3, 1863, referred to in this report, there was not that convertible quality, so that $300,000,000 of the Treasury notes were not of the character that the Senator refers to, and hence his question does not have very much bearing on the matter. The right to convert was repealed after the first $150,000,000 were issued.

Mr. MORTON. And as to the first $150,000,000.

Mr. HENDRICKS. My colleague says it was repealed as to the first $150,000,000, and that was done before these were negotiated, according to the statement of the committee.

Mr. PATTERSON, of New Hampshire. The gentleman appealed to the Senate to know what that act of February 25, 1862, meant if it did not mean that the bonds were to be paid in greenbacks, when the very act itself provided for the absorption of the greenbacks into the bonds.

Mr. HENDRICKS. The act provided that the bonds might be bought by the people with greenbacks, and then provided that the Government might pay to the people these bonds in greenbacks again.

Mr. PATTERSON, of New Hampshire. Oh, no.

Mr. HENDRICKS. At any rate that is the construction I put upon the law. The Government might reissue these bonds when they came in. Have they not done it always? So that if $100,000,000 of greenbacks found their way into the Treasury in payment for bonds the Secretary of the Treasury was authorized to reissue them, I suppose.

Mr. PATTERSON, of New Hampshire. Are not the greenbacks redeemable in gold, and what difference does it make whether you pay the bond in gold or pay the bond in greenbacks and then pay the greenbacks in gold?

Mr. HENDRICKS. You may say that in law the greenbacks are redeemable in gold, but still they are not redeemable in gold, they have not been yet that I have heard of, and they have not had a par value yet; and because they do not have a par value this question is an important and essential one.

When I was interrupted I was just about concluding what I had to say. This bill, which is simply a construction of former laws and former contracts, is not upon any new consideration, and subsequent Congresses will claim the same right to put a construction upon the laws of 1862 and 1863 that we exercise, and they will not regard this construction as conclusive upon them. I simply wish to state that I should be very glad if we have a return in specie payments by that return of prosperity that I look for in the country, and then of course there will be no controversy about a question of this sort; but at a time when there is a difference of twenty five or thirty per cent. between the paper and gold currency of this country I am not willing that we shall volunteer an attempt to tie the hands of the people to a construction that is not the right one of the contract made.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Missouri, [Mr. HENDERSON.]

Mr. HENDRICKS. I was desired by the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. BUCKALEW] and the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. VAN WINKLE] to say that they have paired off. Mr. BUCKALEW, if here, would vote against the bill and the Senator from West Virginia would vote for it.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. President, I wish to say in a few words why I oppose the bill. The first section is merely a declaration of the opinion of Congress as to the meaning of a section of a certain law. I think it objectionable legislation always after a Legislature has passed a law to be construing it. The construction should be left to the courts, and the Legislature should not usurp that province themselves. I do not see any good that can result from this mere declaration except benefiting a few speculators and jobbers in bonds.

There is another objection I have to it. I do not see clearly through this financial question, and am not exactly willing to commit myself on a question that I do not thoroughly understand. I am very well aware that most of the Senators appear to understand the subject well, as most of them have expressed their opinions, but I believe that every one who expresses an opinion thinks that his opinion is better than anybody else's. I have not arrived at a satisfactory conclusion yet in regard to the solution of this problem. I shall not vote for a measure that commits me in this kind of style.

Again, I do not think that any of the financial measures that have come before Congress meet the question which I think is necessary to be settled in order to the solution of this great problem.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

Mr. HENDERSON. I now renew the amendment to the first section. On my amendment to the second section I did have a yeas and nay vote. I ask for the yeas and nays on my amendment to the first section.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Several SENATORS. Let the amendment be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. The amendment is to strike out the following words, commencing in the third line:

That in order to remove any doubt as to the purpose of the Government to discharge all just obligations to the public creditors and to settle conflicting questions and interpretations of the laws by virtue of which such obligations have been contracted it is hereby provided and declared—

And then, after the word "to," in the eighth line, to insert:

An early resumption of specie payments by the Government in order that conflicting questions touching the mode of discharging the public indebtedness may be settled, and that the same may be paid in gold.

And to strike out the residue of the section; so as to make it read:

That the faith of the United States is solemnly pledged to an early resumption of specie payments by the Government in order that the conflicting questions touching the mode of discharging the public indebtedness may be settled and that the same may be paid in gold.

Mr. SHERMAN. I desire a division of the question. Let the question first be taken on striking out.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That is contrary to express rule. You cannot divide a motion to strike out and insert.

Mr. SHERMAN. It can be, because it is to different parts of the section.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The rule expressly declares that you cannot.

Mr. SHERMAN. You can where the motion applies to different parts of a bill. It is a double motion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment.

Mr. WILSON. I wish to announce that Mr. VICKERS has paired off with Mr. TRUMBULL.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 8, nays 34; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Cole, Davis, Henderson, Morton, Pomeroy, Robertson, Ross, and Spencer—8.

NAYS—Messrs. Abbott, Cattell, Conkling, Conness, Corbett, Cragin, Dixon, Edmunds, Ferry, Fessenden, Frelinghuysen, Grimes, Harlan, Harris, Howard, McDonald, Morgan, Morrill of Maine, Morrill of Vermont, Nye, Osborn, Patterson of New Hampshire, Sawyer, Sherman, Stewart, Sumner, Thayer, Tipton, Wade, Warner, Welch, Willey, Williams, and Wilson—34.

ABSENT—Messrs. Anthony, Bayard, Buckalew, Cameron, Chandler, Doolittle, Drake, Fowler, Hendricks, Howe, Kellogg, McCreery, Norton, Patterson of Tennessee, Pool, Ramsey, Rice, Saulsbury, Sprague, Trumbull, Van Winkle, Vickers, Whyte, and Yates—24.

So the amendment was rejected.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time. The bill was read the third time.

Mr. EDMUNDS called for the yeas and nays; and they were ordered.

Mr. ANTHONY. On this bill I am paired with the Senator from Minnesota, [Mr. NORRIS.] If he were present he would vote against the bill, and I should vote for it if I was at liberty to vote.

Mr. CATTELL. I am requested by the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. CAMERON] to say that he is paired off with Mr. KELLOGG, of Louisiana. If they were present Mr. CAMERON would vote for the bill and Mr. KELLOGG against it.

The result was announced—yeas 30, nays 16; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Abbott, Cattell, Conkling, Conness, Corbett, Cragin, Dixon, Edmunds, Ferry, Fessenden, Frelinghuysen, Grimes, Harlan, Harris, Howard, Morgan, Morrill of Maine, Morrill of Vermont, Nye, Patterson of New Hampshire, Robertson, Sawyer, Sherman, Stewart, Sumner, Thayer, Tipton, Willey, Williams, and Wilson—30.

NAYS—Messrs. Cole, Davis, Doolittle, Fowler, Henderson, Hendricks, McCreery, McDonald, Morton, Osborn, Patterson of Tennessee, Pomeroy, Ross, Spencer, Wade, and Welch—16.

ABSENT—Messrs. Anthony, Bayard, Buckalew, Cameron, Chandler, Drake, Howe, Kellogg, Norton, Pool, Ramsey, Rice, Saulsbury, Sprague, Trumbull, Van Winkle, Vickers, Warner, White, and Yates—20.

So the bill was passed.

Mr. SHERMAN. I move to amend the title so as to read "An act relating to the public debt."

The motion was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by W. K. MEHAFFY, one of its clerks, announced that the House had passed a joint resolution (H. R. No. 469) granting the use of military equipments for the inauguration ceremonies, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

The message also announced that the House had agreed to the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 568) explanatory of the act entitled "An act declaring the title to land warrants in certain cases."

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The bill (H. R. No. 2009) authorizing the Secretary of War to place at the disposal of the National Lincoln Monument Association at Springfield, Illinois, damaged and captured ordnance was read twice by its title, and ordered to lie on the table.

The joint resolution (H. R. No. 468) authorizing the Union Pacific Railway Company, eastern division, to change its name to the Kansas Pacific Railway Company was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Pacific Railroad.

MILITARY EQUIPMENTS FOR INAUGURATION.

The joint resolution (H. R. No. 469) granting the use of military equipments for the inauguration ceremonies, was read twice by its title.

Mr. WILSON. I ask unanimous consent to act on that joint resolution now. It is necessary that it should pass to-night.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution (H. R. No. 469) granting the use of military equipments for the inauguration ceremonies. It is a request to the Secretary of War to deliver to the mayor of the city of Washington, for the use of such volunteer military organizations as shall take part in the inauguration ceremonies on the 4th of March next, four thousand muskets, with equipments, accouterments, six brass field pieces, with caissons, equipments, and accouterments, and a suitable number of infantry, cavalry, and artillery flags; taking such security as he may deem proper for the careful preservation and prompt return of said property.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

INTERNAL REVENUE STAMPS.

Mr. CONKLING. I wish to enter a motion to reconsider a resolution which was adopted last evening on the motion of the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. BUCKALEW] calling on the President to furnish a long statement about stamps.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The resolution has been transmitted to the President of the United States.

Mr. CONKLING. Then I desire to have it recalled, and submit that motion.

The amendment was agreed to; and it was Ordered, That a message be sent to the President of the United States requesting him to return to the Senate the resolution of the Senate of the 26th instant, requesting him to furnish a statement of the account of the internal revenue stamps issued by the Government since the passage of the act of July 1, 1862.

SUFFRAGE CONSTITUTIONAL AMENDMENT.

Mr. STEWART. I desire to have the concurrent resolution in regard to sending the constitutional amendment to the Secretary of State passed. I move to take it up.

The motion was agreed to; and the following resolution was adopted:

Resolved by the Senate, (the House of Representatives concurring,) That the President of the United States be requested to transmit forthwith to the Executives of the several States of the United States copies of the article of amendment proposed by Congress to the State Legislatures to amend the Constitution of the United States, passed February 26, 1869, respecting the exercise of the elective franchise, to the end that the said States may proceed to act upon the said article of amendment, and that he request the Executive of each State that may ratify said amendment to transmit to the Secretary of State a certified copy of such ratification.

ARMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the Army appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I move that it be postponed and made the special order for half past twelve o'clock on Monday next.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. COLE. I move that the Senate adjourn. The motion was agreed to; and the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SATURDAY, February 27, 1869.

The House met at eleven o'clock a. m. The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

EASTERN CHEROKEE INDIANS.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting a letter from the Commissioner of Indian Affairs with an estimate of the expenses of a delegation of the eastern Cherokee Indians and recommending an appropriation; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

AMERICAN OCEAN STEAMERS.

Mr. ELIOT, of Massachusetts, by unanimous consent, presented resolutions of the Legislature of the State of Massachusetts in favor of the passage of Senate bill for the establishment of a line of American ocean steamers; which were referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. CHANLER. I call for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The first business in order is the question of privilege pending at the adjournment last night, being the report of the Committee of Elections upon the contested-election cases from the second congressional district of Louisiana.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I hope the gentleman from New York [Mr. CHANLER] will withdraw for a moment the call for the regular order, that I may report from the Committee on Reconstruction a bill to supply an omission in a bill which was passed in last July to remove disabilities from about twenty persons, among whom is one gentleman who is a member of the other side of the House.

Mr. CHANLER. The bill does not propose any new legislation?

Mr. BOUTWELL. No, sir; it simply corrects an error in an act already passed.

Mr. CHANLER. I withdraw for the present the call for the regular order.

REMOVAL OF DISABILITIES.

Mr. BOUTWELL, from the Committee on Reconstruction, reported a bill (H. R. No. 2008) in addition to an act entitled "An act to relieve from legal and political disabilities certain persons engaged in the late rebellion," approved July 27, 1868.

Mr. HARDING. I object.

The SPEAKER. The Committee on Reconstruction have the right to report at any time when they can obtain the floor.

The bill was read a first and second time. It provides that (two thirds of each House concurring) all legal and political disabilities imposed by the fourteenth article of amendments of the Constitution of the United States, by reason of the late rebellion, be removed from the persons named in an act approved July 27, 1868, entitled "An act to relieve from legal and political disabilities certain persons engaged in the late rebellion."

Mr. BOUTWELL. I will only state that in the act of July 27, 1868, removing disabilities from about twenty persons, among whom was Mr. YOUNG, now a member of this House, the words "be, and the same are hereby, removed" being the operative words, and necessary to give force to the act, were accidentally omitted, either by the engrossing clerks or by the committee. This bill is designed merely to give effect to that act of Congress.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time.

The question being taken on the passage of the bill, it was decided in the affirmative, two thirds voting in favor thereof.

Mr. BOUTWELL moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

NORMAN WIARD.

Mr. SCHENCK. I ask unanimous consent to submit a report from the Committee on Ordnance upon the case of Norman Wiard.

Mr. CHANLER. I call for the regular order.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. HOLMAN, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bills of the following title; when the Speaker signed the same:

 An act (H. R. No. 1599) making appropriations for the naval service for the year ending June 30, 1870.

SMITHSONIAN INSTITUTION.

Mr. HOOPER, of Massachusetts. I desire the House by unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table, for action now, a joint resolution from the Senate providing for the appointment of Professor Agassiz as a Regent of the Smithsonian Institution.

Mr. CHANLER. I insist on the call for the regular order.

CONTESTED ELECTION—LOUISIANA.

The SPEAKER. The regular order being called for, the House resumes the consideration of the question of privilege pending at the adjournment yesterday, being the report of the Committee of Elections in the contested-election case from the second congressional district of Louisiana. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. UPSON] is entitled to the floor, having fifty minutes of his hour remaining.

Mr. UPSON. Mr. Speaker, the close of the session being so near, and so much business pressing upon the attention of the House, I design to occupy only a brief period in making a statement of this case. I shall then yield fifteen minutes to the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. BLACKBURN] who presented last evening the resolution in favor of Mr. Jones. After that I propose to yield ten minutes to the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. MAYNARD,] and then, unless there is a manifest desire to continue the discussion, I propose to call the previous question.

The case of Jones vs. Mann comes from the second congressional district of Louisiana. The election took place in April last under what are known as the reconstruction acts. In July last Mr. Mann appeared here, presented a certificate of election, and was sworn in as a member with the other members of the delegation from that State.

In the subsequent month of August Mr. Mann died, but previous to his being sworn in a notice of contest was served upon him by Mr. Jones, the contestant. Evidence had been taken under that notice of contest, and had been closed just previous to Mr. Mann's death. It is under that notice and that issue there made and the evidence then taken that this case is presented to the House for its consideration. The House is to determine the merits of the issue made in that notice and the evidence thereunder. The grounds of notice are set forth in the report of the committee in this case, No. 27 of the present session. I may say briefly that it consists chiefly of allegations of intimidation and violence preventing the friends of the contestant from voting. In one or two instances allegations are made of stuffing ballot-boxes in one or two precincts. There was the further allegation that Mr. Mann was ineligible at the time of his election. The committee deemed it proper to consider mainly whether under the evidence Mr. Jones is shown to have received a majority of all the votes; and under that evidence they are compelled, as they have reported unanimously, to say that he has failed to make out a case. In the first place Mr. Jones utterly failed to show what was the vote cast in the district, either in the aggregate or at the several election precincts. He has utterly failed to show how many election precincts there were. In order, then to enable the committee to come to any conclusion as to the vote we had to call upon the commanding general for a statement of the vote cast. It will be found in the testimony under the head of "additional testimony in the case of Jones vs. Mann, second congressional district, Louisiana." The vote is there stated to be as follows:

 For Simon Jones.....5,634

showing a majority of 1,150 votes for Mr. Jones. This is the only legal evidence as to the vote cast in that district. It was objected on the part of Mr. Jones that the certificate of the commanding general was no evidence and cannot be received. Now, as evidence of the vote cast, by the provisions of the supplementary reconstruction act of March 11, 1868, it is declared—

"That 'the same election officers who shall make the return of the votes cast on the ratification or rejection of the constitution shall enumerate and certify the votes cast for members of Congress.'"

Accordingly, in the States of Louisiana, Georgia, and South Carolina these returns were so made and certified to the commanding general and an election certificate given by him on that statement of the votes. The House has received members from all those States on those certificates, and it seemed under that phraseology of the statute and under the action of the House that was a construction of the law recognizing the propriety of the commanding general in the reconstructed States certifying to the person elected. We have, therefore, accordingly recognized that the commanding general acted officially in receiving the returns made to him and in giving a certificate to the person who received the highest number of votes.

Looking upon that as prima facie evidence of the vote cast we find no evidence presented which overturns it. On the part of Mr. Jones there is no evidence of the vote cast either in the aggregate or in any precinct. Consequently there was nothing by which any fraud or irregularity or illegal votes could be purged from the aggregate vote. But so far as the committee is able to discover from the evidence there are not exceeding 100 votes which can be recognized as illegal or as having been cast fraudulently, or which could be subtracted from the majority of Mr. Mann and added to the vote of the contestant. Nothing is found to do away with the majority of Mr. Mann of 1,150 votes. That being so, the question of ineligibility of Mr. Mann the committee believed to be of little consequence in this investigation. It was claimed that Mr. Mann was not a resident in the sense of the law of Louisiana at the time of the election. We had one or two affidavits on that allegation, but nothing clear or satisfactory; nothing that would justify the committee in deciding that Mr. Mann was ineligible as a candidate at the time of the election. There are also affidavits taken on the part of Mr. Mann during his life which, if admitted in evidence, would go far to do away with the force of the testimony taken on the part of Mr. Jones. It was objected, however, to the testimony on the part of Mr. Mann that it was taken before a notary public, and therefore was not competent evidence. The objection under the law the committee considered good; but as Mr. Mann has since died, and as that evidence contains statements in relation to his eligibility, the committee did not feel authorized to strike it out of their own motion, but leave it to this House to say whether it would consider it or not. But the committee considered it of no material consequence unless Mr. Jones was shown to have received a majority, for it was decided in this House, in the cases of Blakey vs. Golladay and Smith vs. Brown, that to entitle a person to be admitted as a member of this House as duly elected he must show that he has received a majority or a plurality of the votes cast in his district, and that no person who received a minority of the votes cast ought to be admitted to a seat as a legal Representative from a congressional district.

The views of the committee were set forth so clearly and forcibly in the reports in the case of Smith vs. Brown, and also in the case of Blakey vs. Golladay, which were supported by the House, that we deem it unnecessary to do more than refer to the positions there assumed and sustained by the House as satisfactory and conclusive in this case, as adopting a rule in such cases from which the House would not deviate, there being no law of Congress or of the State of Louisiana providing for an election of a member of Congress by a minority. Considering that our Government is a Government in which officers are chosen by majorities, and not by minorities, the committee did not feel authorized to assume that the law was otherwise than had been heretofore announced by the House or than has been universally accepted as the rule of elections throughout the country so far as the election of members of Congress is concerned.

But I will state further, in relation to another matter of evidence which has been attempted to be introduced here, that the original evidence in this case was taken and concluded when Mr. Mann was alive. Notice of contest was served on the 22d of May, 1868; the answer was served on the 3d of June. On the 22d of June the testimony was commenced, and on the 10th of August it was concluded. On the 26th of August Mr. Mann died; and notwithstanding the testimony was closed and the time for taking testimony under the statute had expired, and no order for further time to take testimony had been given by the House, yet on the 8th of January, 1869, an affidavit was taken in this District on the part of Mr. Jones before a justice of the peace, without any authority of Congress, and without giving notice to any person representing Mr. Mann's interest. That ex parte affidavit is brought in here to show that there were 1,100 less votes given than the returns of the commanding general showed, and also that Mr. Jones received a majority of the votes. The man who makes that affidavit, Mr. Leon, was himself only an officer at one election precinct, and did not have the returns himself, but claims that he was present when they were read in a certain man's office, and swears to the result that the majority was so much for Mr. Jones. The committee considered that this ex parte evidence, being taken without authority six months after the time for taking the testimony had closed and sworn to by a party who could not be cognizant of the facts and testifies only from recollection of matters which he says he heard nearly a year previous, would not avail to set aside the returns of the commanding general under authority of law. It is too vague, general, indefinite, uncertain, and unreliable to be considered here, and it never would be received in any ordinary election case when taken under such circumstances. As the committee are unanimous in their report, I shall not take up the time of the House further, but will yield fifteen minutes to the gentleman from Louisiana who introduced the resolution yesterday on behalf of the contestant.

Mr. BLACKBURN. Mr. Speaker, in the few remarks which I may be permitted to make on this case I would not be understood as questioning the nice legal points assumed by the committee; nor yet should I be understood as attempting to impugn the integrity of the late member whose seat is contested. In a personal sense he was my friend. I knew him well, and he was an honorable gentleman. But, sir, this is simply a political question, one which does not involve personalities or personal feelings. As I am allowed but a few minutes I will briefly state to the House that I simply ask the admission of Simon Jones as member of Congress upon this floor from the second congressional district of Louisiana upon general principles of right and justice, and as carrying out in good faith and practically the reconstruction policy inaugurated by Congress.

Now, sir, I lay down this proposition, and I defy a successful refutation of it, that whenever you see a gentleman coming up from the South claiming a seat upon this floor and claiming to have been elected in a district or section of country where there is a large and ruling majority of Republican votes, and who comes here as the enemy of the congressional plan of reconstruction, his pretended election is a fraud and a cheat. Such, sir, was the case in regard to my deceased friend, Colonel James Mann. He was a loyal man, it is true. He had fought the rebellion bravely and nobly, and when he laid down his sword, what did he do? He went down South; and with whom did he fraternize? He fraternized politically with the friends of Jeff. Davis and with those rebellious leaders whose hands were reeking with the blood of patriots who died that this nation might live. He received his commission at the hands of a gentleman who trod the same path, General Buchanan.

Now, how did it come to pass that James Mann was elected in a congressional district where there was a clear Republican majority of from five hundred to one thousand? I contend upon general principles, without minutely investigating the case, that it was a fraud; and Mr. Simon Jones, if he can be allowed to address the House, or his legal friends and advisers who may be permitted to do so, can clearly show that fact. Mr. Mann came here, and notwithstanding his case was contested, he was at once sworn in as a member of Congress in the month of July last. And here, sir, let me say to the House that while it admits members upon this floor from the South who come here elected in direct opposition to its own policy of reconstruction, this reconstruction policy is worse than a farce; it becomes a machinery to crush out every true loyal man in my section; and I am proud to be permitted to occupy this floor if but for a few moments, as a native southern loyalist, to speak in behalf of another of my own class. While I am not opposed to a judicious policy of clemency and forgiveness toward what I call the rebellious element of my native land, I tell this Congress that when it reaches over the dead bodies of the native southern loyalists in that section to honor and pardon rebels or to honor and raise into high places those who fraternize with them, it proves recreant to that liberty for which General Grant fought and in behalf of which he conquered. Mr. Speaker, I remember that since your election to the second office in the gift of the American people you stood up in the States of the free North and declared to the world that the time was at hand when the friends of this Government should be permitted to sing its national hymns upon the banks of the Mississippi and upon the banks of the Rio Grande with the same safety and liberty with which they exercise their patriotic devotions upon the shores of the northern lakes. But I tell you that day will never come while the national Legislature turns the back of the hand and gives the go-by to those few patriotic and devoted southern men who stood up for the flag of their country when surrounded by the friends of treason; when there was no Federal cannon's echo to cheer them on in their devotion to their country; when if they wanted to pray for their country they had to enter into the wilderness where the ear of treason could not hear and detect their words of devotion. If I had time I would fain dwell at length on these things which yet stir my soul when I remember them. As a new and inexperienced member I feel a great difficulty in attempting to compete with the unanimous report of an old and experienced committee of this House. I can do nothing more than to plead, as I said at the outset, upon the general principles of right, which every member upon this floor, whether Republican or Democrat, if he loves his country, if he loves freedom, cannot fail to understand and appreciate. I therefore ask on the general principles of right, and as being in strict accordance with the true intent and meaning of the reconstruction acts of Congress, that my friend, Mr. Jones, who is a native loyalist, who has walked through tribulation and blood in his native land to uphold his Government, be admitted as a member upon this floor, and that he be sworn in as such. Now, the honorable gentleman who has spoken in behalf of the committee says that Mr. Jones has not made out his case. That may be true. And if that gentleman had lived where Mr. Jones lives, if he had endured what Mr. Jones has endured, if he had met the devilish machinations of treason there, when at the time this report was made all the civil power of Louisiana was in the hands of rebels, men who hate a southern loyalist more thoroughly than the devil hates holy water—if he had endured these things, then he might well understand why it was impossible for Mr. Jones, even if his motives had been as pure as the crystal drops which sparkle upon the trees by the stream of life, had he been as vigilant as the angels who vie around God's throne, could not have made out a clear case. No, sir; and why? Because the spirit of treason is wily, it is shrewd, it is intriguing, it is devilish, and it is unprincipled.

Now, sir, whatever may be said in regard to legal technicalities, and they may be against Mr. Jones in this case, I will remind the House of this fact, that but for those things known in law as legal technicalities, Andrew Johnson would have been convicted on his impeachment. That, sir, is the only excuse why he was not convicted. Certain conscientious lawyers in the other end of this Capitol planted themselves upon what are termed legal technicalities, and they let Andrew Johnson go unwhipped of justice. And in consequence of this, as I know of my own personal knowledge; hundreds, ay, thousands of patriotic men in the South now sleep in untimely graves. On the road to my home the wayside is dotted with the graves of the poor, unsophisticated freedmen who died by the hand of midnight assassins because Andrew Johnson was not convicted and removed from office. And why was he not? For the same reason on which gentlemen seek to deprive my friend, Mr. Jones, of a seat on this floor; because, forsooth, some legal technicalities stood in the way. I trust, sir, that this House will prove itself wise and patriotic enough to disregard all such formalities and do justice upon the naked principles of common sense and right.

Mr. UPSON. I now yield ten minutes to the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. MAYNARD.]

Mr. MAYNARD. Mr. Speaker, if members of the House will give me their attention for even so brief a time as ten minutes, I can, unless I deceive myself very much, satisfy them not only that the great principles of justice and right are in favor of the contestant, Mr. Jones, but also that our friends upon the Committee of Elections are mistaken even with regard to the questions of technical law.

The facts in this case are few. In the month of April last an election was held, under the reconstruction laws, in the second congressional district of Louisiana, for a member of this House. Mr. Jones and a gentleman by the name of Mr. Mann were the competing candidates. The certificate of General Buchanan, commander of that department, was to the effect that Mr. Mann had received a majority of the votes. Upon that certificate Mr. Mann was admitted to a seat in this House just at the close of the session last summer. A notice of contest was served upon him by Mr. Jones. While the contest was going on, and after a body of evidence had been taken, but before the proof was complete, Mr. Mann was called away by death, leaving of course, no one with whom Mr. Jones could carry on the contest. Another election was ordered for that district in the autumn, to supply the place of Mr. Mann. At that election Mr. Hunt and Mr. Menard were the competing candidates, Mr. Jones of course taking no part in it, but claiming his seat under the previous election. Those two gentlemen are here, both of them claiming Mr. Mann's seat, and of course both denying the right of Mr. Jones to the seat; both of them being in fact his opponent, while in opposition also to each other.

The question we have now before us is whether, at the election in April, Mr. Jones was or was not elected; and this question is so simple that I think there will be no difficulty in understanding it, and, I trust, as little difficulty in deciding it. Mr. Mann, as I have said, received the certificate of General Buchanan to the effect that the returns, as they came to him, showed that Mr. Mann had the majority. But there was a body of evidence showing thoroughly and completely a state of facts justifying all that has been said by the gentleman from Louisiana, [Mr. BLACKBURN.] The testimony of a gentleman named Leon was taken in this city early in January by Mr. Jones, upon notice to both Mr. Hunt and Mr. Menard. They were present and cross-examined the witness. The testimony was presented here, referred to the Committee of Elections, and ordered to be printed. No objection has been made to any irregularities or informalities; no technical objection, so far as I am aware, has been interposed by either Mr. Hunt or Mr. Menard. The testimony is, then, with the assent of the parties interested on each side, legitimately and fairly before us, to be looked at without objection. Of course, where the parties interpose no objection on either side, the court will make no objection. I will read a few passages from the testimony of Mr. Leon. He says:

District of Columbia, County of Washington, ss:

Personally appeared before me, the subscriber, one of the justices of the peace in and for the District and county aforesaid, Frank Leon, and made oath according to law to the following statement: that he resides in New Orleans, Louisiana, in the second congressional district; was appointed deputy sheriff on the 16th day of April, A. D. 1868; gave orders on the 17th day of April, 1868, at seven a. m., to open the polls; was appointed one of the judges of election a few moments after he gave the above-named order; was in charge of the book of registration of the legal voters. The election lasted two days, being April 17 and 18, 1868. On the evening of the 17th the boxes were placed in the police station for safe-keeping; it took all night of the 18th and the whole day of the 19th to count the votes; did not sign the returns; refused to sign because persons entitled to vote were refused the privilege; did himself refuse the votes of six men, who had been in the penitentiary at Baton Rouge, as they were brought by Sam Bola, a man well known in the Democratic party; did visit the chief register's office, Captain Scott's; saw the vote as summed up by Captain Scott; also counted them; whole number of votes cast on the 17th and 18th of April, 1868, was 12,318. Jones received in the first district of New Orleans a majority of 644. Mann's majorities were—fourth district, 540, and in the second district was 33, making a total of 573.

Am personally acquainted with Colonel Mann. Colonel Mann's family never resided in the State of Louisiana permanently.

Cross-examination:

Does not know how many polls there were in the district, (second congressional) served at one only. After the voting stopped the returns were made; witness refused to sign them. The boxes, after the votes were counted, were sealed up and sent to Captain Scott's office; counted the votes for the whole congressional district at Captain Scott's office. Military law required that after the boxes were returned to the chairman of registration they should carefully count the votes. The counting was done by Messrs. Clark, Mader, and several others. Captain Scott asked witness to count the votes; explained that after the votes had been counted and placed in figures on paper the witness went over them so as to see if the memorandum was correct. After the investigation at Captain Scott's office the boxes were then sent to General Buchanan's headquarters, with his return made out that Mr. Jones had received 71 majority. Witness by profession is a civil engineer; expects an office; Mr. Jones has not promised anything; figures on card shown were obtained in Washington; those on the memorandum of witness were obtained in Captain Scott's office. (The witness apparently did not understand the question about counting the votes at Captain Scott's office.) On second question, did the committee count the ballots at Captain Scott's? No; simply compiled the returns from the several polls and made up one general return to be forwarded to General Buchanan.

F. LEON.

Subscribed and sworn to before me, the subscriber, [L. S.] on the day and date herein stated.

JOSEPH T. K. PLANT, J. P.
JANUARY 28, A. D. 1869.

Then he introduced a memorandum. My time being limited to ten minutes compels me to be as brief as possible in presenting the facts in this case. That memorandum, made upon the spot recently after the transaction, shows that the number of votes cast was 12,318. I will ask the Clerk to read it so that it may be more fully brought to the attention of the House, for I take it this House means to do justice in this case.

NEW ORLEANS, April 26, 1868.

Whole number of votes cast 12,318.
First district, comprising the first, second, and third wards, S. Jones received 644 majority.
Fourth district, comprising the tenth and eleventh wards, the tenth ward being in the second congressional district, gave to James Mann 540 majority.
The second district, comprising the fourth, fifth, and sixth wards, the fourth ward being in the second congressional district, gave to James Mann 33 majority.
F. LEON.

On this 11th day of January, A. D. 1869, personally appeared the above-named F. Leon, and made oath on the Holy Evangel of Almighty God that the above statement is true.

[L. S.] JOS. T. K. PLANT, J. P.

Mr. MAYNARD. Now, it will be seen that these returns, made under these circumstances, sworn to in the presence of these parties, show that at the time of taking the votes the majority in favor of Mr. Jones was between 50 and 100 votes. None of us can be for a moment in doubt in what way, by what spell, these returns were medicined so as to show a different result from the time they left the polling places until they reached the headquarters of General Buchanan.

At this point the Committee of Elections say in their report:

"The ex parte and unauthorized testimony of Mr. F. Leon, taken before a justice of the peace in this District, January 11, 1869, since the death of Mr. Mann, is the only other evidence as to the votes cast at this election in this congressional district, and it is insisted by the counsel for the contestant that such sworn statement of this witness is better evidence than the return of General Buchanan, who, as contestant, claims 'had no jurisdiction over congressional elections,' and that 'the sworn proof therefore stands upon higher ground than the voluntary statements of General Buchanan about a matter not within his jurisdiction.'"

In the first place, I beg to say that this testimony is not ex parte. Mr. Hunt and Mr. Menard claimed to be the representatives of Mr. Mann, and the testimony was taken in their presence and after cross-examination. It is claimed it was unauthorized. No one objects on that ground except the committee. It is said it was taken before a justice of the peace in this District. There was no objection on that ground. It was taken under oath and on notice to both parties. It is said that it was taken since the death of Mr. Mann. That was not our fault, although it was Mr. Mann's misfortune to be called away by the hand of death.

The naked question presented to us is this: shall we give the highest credence to the certificate of General Buchanan certifying simply to what the returns show after they got into his office and what he could know nothing about, or the testimony under oath of one who was one of the officers of the election and swears to the memorandum he made on the spot while the transaction was taking place? For myself I have no hesitation in deciding that the latter is entitled to the highest credibility. I do not thereby seek to impugn General Buchanan. He may have acted honestly; I am disposed to assume that he did. The returns as they came into his office may have shown exactly what he certifies they did show, but the testimony taken here which was referred to by my friend from Louisiana [Mr. BLACKBURN] shows a condition of things there that would have very easily permitted a tampering with those returns very essentially from the time the votes were taken out of the ballot-boxes until the returns reached headquarters.

I fully sympathize with all that has been said of those men who have gone through fire and blood during these contests in the southern country. These men are not fighting their battles alone. It is less theirs than yours. These men have stood with their lives in their hands upon the onerous works of reconstruction, not always in safety, as appeared from the case of the late Mr. Hinds, who was assassinated in Arkansas.

Shall we turn aside upon the idea that it is just at the close of the session; that this is but a small matter, and we have no time to consider these matters; that it might cost a little trouble, and therefore we will throw it aside? Mr. Speaker, we cannot afford to do injustice.

Mr. COBURN. Does the gentleman say that Mr. Leon was cognizant of the entire returns?

Mr. MAYNARD. That is his testimony.

Mr. UPSON. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. COOK. I wish to say a word in reply to the gentleman from Tennessee. The truth is that in opposition to the returns of the commanding officer, which were required to be made by law and which appear to be made in pursuance of law, there is but the affidavit of Mr. Leon, taken in the city of Washington after the death of Mr. Mann, an ex parte affidavit so far as it appears before the committee. But the point I wish to make is this: Mr. Leon discloses the fact that he could not have had personal knowledge of the facts of which he affirms. He says that the election lasted two days, and that Mr. Mann's majority in the fourth district was 540 and in the second district 33, and that in the first district Mr. Jones's majority was 644. But on cross-examination he says he does not know how many polls there were in the district. He served at one only. He could not have had personal knowledge of what the majorities were at the different polls in the district, because among other things he did not know how many polls there were in the district. The manner in which he derives his information as to the majorities given he does not tell us. Clearly it could not have been by an inspection of the poll-books or of the returns thereon, except in one district, of which he was a judge. He could not have known personally, by personal observation, how many men voted in the other districts, because he was engaged in the precinct of New Orleans as judge and was not present at the other polling places. He could not have known by inspection of the poll-books because they were not submitted to his inspection. It is a general statement in reference to a matter about which he could not possibly know the facts. It would be strange indeed if testimony under such circumstances were allowed to override the returns made in pursuance of law and in accordance with the forms of law.

Mr. UPSON. I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Louisiana.

Mr. NEWSHAM. I wish merely to make a statement. The contestant in this case, Mr. Jones, is unquestionably elected by a majority of the votes cast. That there was a fair election held on the 17th and 18th of April in that district is very questionable. It is even denied. The record which I hold in my hand proves a majority for Mr. Jones of 71 votes. There are, however, in this case three contestants, Mr. Hunt, Mr. Menard, and Mr. Jones. A contest for this seat was made by Mr. Jones prior to the time when Colonel Mann took his seat in this House. After that contest was made a new division of the election districts in the State of Louisiana was made by the Legislature of that State, and from territory entirely different from that represented by Colonel Mann now come Mr. Hunt and Mr. Menard, claiming to represent a district which was vacated by Mr. Mann. But they did not receive 10 votes in that district. I merely wanted to make this statement. Mr. Jones is the only representative of the district, the only man who received any votes in the district made vacant by the death of Colonel Mann.

Mr. UPSON. The gentleman from the third district of Louisiana, who has just spoken, has evidently misapprehended the facts of the case. He is talking about the election to fill the vacancy, while this is a claim on the part of Mr. Jones for the seat which was occupied by Mr. Mann prior to the vacancy being made. The election to fill the vacancy took place six months afterward. That is to be considered in the case of Hunt vs. Menard. There is only one claimant here, and that is Mr. Jones, for the seat which Mr. Mann occupied here before his death. Now, I wish to say a word in relation to the statement of the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. MAYNARD.] The gentleman is also laboring under a mistake of fact in regard to the time. The contestant gave his notice on the 22d of May, 1868. The answer was received June 2. The taking of the testimony commenced on the 22d of June, and the sixty days' time allowed by law expired on the 10th of August. The taking of the whole testimony was concluded before Mr. Mann died, and after his death no further testimony could be taken either by law or in fact without some action on the part of the House, and there never has been anybody to represent Mr. Mann since the taking of the testimony was concluded by law and in fact. If the gentleman will look at the depositions he will see that the taking of the evidence was concluded by the 10th of August; so that the time during which the testimony could be taken expired during the lifetime of Mr. Mann. He did not die until the parties had had full time to take all the testimony and had taken all they desired. There never has been any extension of time.

Still further, the gentleman is mistaken when he says that no objection was made to the testimony to which he has referred. If he had been present, as he was not, when the counsel argued on the part of Mr. Mann he would have found that they did object to this testimony, and I have their written objection before me made in the argument of counsel in the hearing. They objected to the testimony, and it was a good and valid objection, for it was ex parte evidence, taken after the time had elapsed, without authority of law and before an officer not authorized to take it, and in addition to that it is absolutely good for nothing. This man Leon swears from recollection merely. He was only an officer in one election precinct. He swears that he afterward went to the office of the chief register, Captain Scott, where the returns were made; he swears to hearing a statement made at Captain Scott's office, and he swears to 1,000 votes less than the aggregate return. He swears to this more than six months after the man to whom the votes referred is dead and six months after the time for closing the testimony had passed.

Mr. MAYNARD. Allow me one moment on that point. The question suggested by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. COBURN] shows that I had not made myself clear in my statement.

Mr. UPSON. I desire to complete what I have to say upon this point. I read from the cross-examination of the witness:

"Witness by profession is a civil engineer; expects an office; Mr. Jones has not promised anything; figures on card shown were obtained in Washington; those on the memorandum of witness were obtained in Captain Scott's office."

Mr. MAYNARD. Will the gentleman allow me to refer him to a portion of the direct testimony of this witness? He says:

"Saw the vote as summed up by Captain Scott; also counted them; whole number of votes cast on the 17th and 18th of April, 1868, was 12,318. Jones received in the first district of New Orleans a majority of 644. Mann's majorities were, fourth district, 540, and in the second district was 33, making a total of 573."

Mr. UPSON. I have read that myself. Here is what is interlined in the cross-examination by the person taking the testimony:

("The witness apparently did not understand the question about counting the votes at Captain Scott's office.) On second question, did the committee count the ballots at Captain Scott's? No, simply compiled the returns from the several polls and made up one general return to be forwarded to General Buchanan."

There is all that he knew about it. He swears that he was present there when they compiled the returns and sent them to General Buchanan, and General Buchanan, with the returns before him, says that the vote was 1,000 more than this witness swears it was. The gentleman from Tennessee wants us to take the parol testimony of this man one year afterward to contradict the official return of the general commanding, who had the returns before him.

Mr. MAYNARD. I hope the gentleman will allow me to correct him. I know he does not want to do injustice in this case. It is only pride in sustaining the report of the committee.

Mr. UPSON. A large majority of the committee are in full sympathy with the gentleman claiming the seat, but on the testimony before them they could not report in his favor.

Mr. MAYNARD. The gentleman will understand that I am not impugning his honesty at all. But I want to call his attention to a matter in which I think he does himself injustice. The witness says that the figures on the card shown were obtained in Washington, while those on the memorandum of the witness were obtained in Captain Scott's office. That is the memorandum from which I read, and was made in New Orleans on the 26th of April, 1868, and it was that which he used to refresh his memory when he gave his evidence.

Mr. UPSON. He swears that there were 1,100 votes less than are shown by the returns made to General Buchanan.

This testimony was closed during the lifetime of Mr. Mann; the sixty days were over before Mr. Mann died; no order was made for the taking of other testimony or for an extension of the time for taking the testimony. No justice of the peace there was ever authorized to take testimony in this case. The whole of it is illegal and illegitimate; it is all vague and inconclusive, and in direct contradiction of the returns of the commanding officer who took them from the official record.

I now yield the remainder of my hour to the chairman of the Committee of Elections, [Mr. DAWES.]

The SPEAKER. There are two minutes of the hour left.

Mr. DAWES. I hope my colleague will allow me a little of his time after the previous question is called.

Mr. UPSON. Certainly.

Mr. DAWES. The only importance attached to this case in these last days of the session is in connection with the rule that shall be established by this House when they come to act upon it in the decision of other cases; and that is the only inducement to me to interfere in or take part in this debate which my friend, who has charge of this matter, [Mr. UPSON], is amply able to take care of himself.

I desire to repeat with him that the sympathies of the Committee of Elections were entirely with the contestant, Mr. Jones, and they would have been glad to have found a way consistent with law and with fact by which they could report in favor of giving him a seat in this House. But I want to present one or two considerations to this House. If they are disposed to lay down a rule by which they desire themselves to be tried, and by that rule they decide to admit Mr. Jones to a seat in this House, then let no man hereafter complain if he shall find himself in a House with a majority against him if the rule comes back against him. Who of you desires to have set aside the official return of the votes cast in your district by the simple uncorroborated testimony of one man? Suppose it to be the testimony of an upright man, taken in the time prescribed and according to the forms of law with the opposing party present, is there any gentleman in this House who desires to lay down a rule by which he wishes himself to be tried, a rule that the official returns of his election shall be set aside simply upon the statement of one witness as to what he remembers to have been the state of things six months before?

The SPEAKER. The hour of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. UPSON] has expired.

Mr. UPSON. I now call the previous question on the resolution reported by the committee, together with the substitute offered by the gentleman from Louisiana, [Mr. BLACKBURN.]

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

Mr. UPSON. I now yield further time to the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. DAWES.]

Mr. DAWES. If that were all that there is in this case I think I could submit it to the calm and candid judgment of the House. But that is not all. There is no such case as I have indicated in this House at this time. The actual case is this: in this testimony, taken in conformity to law during the lifetime of the sitting member and brought here to be heard before the committee, there was not one particle of testimony presented to the committee to invalidate the returns. It was after the case was closed, after death had closed the eyes and lips of the sitting member and after the case was brought here, that the contestant found in this city a man who was willing, he said, to make an affidavit that he had seen these returns six months before, and that then they were different from what had been represented in the evidence. He took his affidavit, and my friend from Tennessee [Mr. MAYNARD] says there was no objection to his doing so. Why, sir, who could object? The only man who had a right to object had been in his grave for months and the time for taking testimony had closed before he died.

Mr. MAYNARD. Does my friend from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] take the narrow, technical ground that there was no competitor, no opposing party, because Mr. Mann was dead?

Mr. DAWES. I am taking the ground—it may be narrow—that there is something in the manner of taking this testimony that weakens its credibility and the faith that we should attach to it; in the first place, that it was taken long after the case was closed, there being when the case closed not a suggestion on the record that there had been a mistake in the count; and secondly, that this affidavit was taken without the presence of any party properly interested. There was present a man who volunteered to go there, representing himself, but not representing Mr. Mann. More than that, the return which it is proposed to invalidate by the affidavit of this witness found in the city of Washington is precisely the same return (being on the same paper and signed by the same man) as the return on which my friend from Louisiana [Mr. BLACKBURN] and his colleague [Mr. NEWSHAM] were admitted to their seats. If there is any truth in the statement now made, then these two gentlemen have no business here on this floor to-day. The paper now objected to is the identical paper on which they have been admitted, and if there is any truth in the statement made in the affidavit of this man here in this city that this return is false and fraudulent then that fact turns out of the House these gentlemen who have been advocating the claim of Mr. Jones.

Mr. MAYNARD. The certificate of General Buchanan states merely the return made to his office. Does it follow that because in one district the returns were falsified the returns from the other districts were also falsified, or is there necessarily any imputation upon those other returns?

Mr. DAWES. Mr. Speaker, the testimony is not that the return in any particular district was falsified, but that this return made here to the War Department is, so far as this district is concerned, false; and this is attempted to be established by the testimony of a single witness found here after the case had closed.

I do not desire to occupy longer the attention of the House. We are now establishing a rule, not simply for this case, but for others to come hereafter. The Committee of Elections did not feel at liberty to allow themselves to be governed by their sympathy for this man, for they apprehend that the rule that may be laid down here is the rule by which at some time or other we ourselves are to be tried. The desire of the committee, and they were unanimous in this desire, was to lay down a rule upon which they would be willing to be tried themselves. If the House should adopt the rule which my earnest and patriotic friend from Tennessee [Mr. MAYNARD] is so anxious to have established, then let him take care of himself when a hundred men can at any time be brought from Tennessee to swear against the legality of the official return under which he holds his seat.

Mr. MAYNARD. As I do not propose to reply to the gentleman he will allow me to say just here that there is no conflict whatever between the testimony of this man Leon and the return of General Buchanan. General Buchanan simply certifies to the state of the return in his office. That we do not controvert; we admit that such returns were found in his office. But we contend that between the time the returns left the place where the votes were counted and the time they reached General Buchanan's office they were tampered with and changed.

Mr. DAWES. Mr. Speaker, my friend from Tennessee did not hear the whole case as presented before the committee. If he had done so I have not the slightest doubt that he would have joined in our report. But he is not able to see the facts as the nine members of the Committee of Elections saw them. The very statement which he has just made shows that he does not understand this case. The witness testifies that he saw these figures counted up and took a memorandum of them, and that they are not now in the certificate as they were then. That is the story of this man who, by some unaccountable accident, appears in this city just after the case is closed. Who he is? What induced him to flee from Louisiana and alight down here just at that particular time, no one knows. No member of the committee, nobody but the magistrate who took the affidavit, and my respected friend, the contestant here, can testify anything about him.

Mr. MAYNARD. I wish to ask whether the committee had anything before them except what appears in the printed documents? The gentleman intimates that I do not understand the facts in this case; and I therefore desire to know whether all the facts appear in the record; for that I have examined very carefully.

Mr. DAWES. Mr. Speaker, I leave the question to the House. Let it establish in this case such a precedent as it may deem wise.

Mr. UPSON. In relation to this case, so far as this affidavit is concerned, I will simply say that in the case of BLAIR against Barrett affidavits taken under similar circumstances were rejected by the House and by the Committee of Elections acting in strict accordance with the precedents and the law of evidence. The committee have so treated this affidavit in this case; but even if it were admitted in evidence for what it is worth it is too indefinite, too vague, merely parole, and not sufficient to overthrow the official certificate of the commanding general to whom the legal returns were made and who has certified them to the House.

Mr. ROSS. Who has the certificate in this case? Who holds the regular certificate?

Mr. UPSON. That is the other case. There seems to be a great deal of misconception on this matter. The man who held the regular certificate is deceased.

Mr. ROSS. Who holds the certificate to fill the vacancy?

Mr. UPSON. That question is not now up. This is the case of Jones vs. Mann under the first election. When the case comes up under the resolution of the committee in the second case the gentleman will be answered. As it is a great deal of confusion has occurred by gentlemen commingling the two cases. My friend from the third congressional district of Louisiana [Mr. NEWSHAM] in his remarks labored under the same mistake, that this was the case of Hunt vs. Menard, and not Jones vs. Mann.

Mr. ROSS. I ask the gentleman from Michigan why Mr. Menard, who has received the regular certificate, has not been allowed to take his seat?

Mr. UPSON. Because the gentleman's political friends filed a protest and by order of the House the matter was referred to the Committee of Elections. But I will pass over all these proceedings for the present.

Mr. ROSS. Has his political friends so controlled this matter that this man holding the regular certificate has been kept out of his seat?

Mr. UPSON. His party do not wish to be guilty of any inconsistency or to do wrong for any partisan purpose.

Mr. ROSS. I understand that Mr. Menard, a colored man, holds the regular certificate, and that the otherside who belong to his party are keeping him out of his seat. Do they say that he shall not have his rights like any other citizen because of his race or color? [Laughter.]

Mr. STOVER. I rise to a question of order, that this is not germane to the issue before the House.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is of the opinion that the case of Mr. Menard is involved in this controversy, either directly or indirectly.

Mr. UPSON. When I call up the report of the Committee of Elections in that case, which I shall do as soon as the pending one is disposed of, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. ROSS] will have an opportunity, which he seems to desire, to cast his vote with the rest of his Democratic friends for Mr. Menard. [Laughter.]

Mr. ROSS. What I object to is that he shall be "snubbed" in this way by his Republican friends. Is it because of his race or color?

Mr. UPSON. You and your friends who voted against the constitutional amendment will have an opportunity to vote to give Mr. Menard a seat upon this floor.

The resolution of the Committee of Elections was:

Resolved, That Simon Jones, not having received a majority of the votes cast for Representative in this House from the second congressional district of Louisiana, is not entitled to a seat therein as such Representative.

The question first recurred on Mr. BLACKBURN'S amendment, in the nature of a substitute, as follows:

Resolved, That Simon Jones is entitled to a seat on this floor as a member of the Fortieth Congress from the second congressional district of the State of Louisiana, and that he be now sworn in.

Mr. MAYNARD demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

The amendment was rejected.

The resolution of the committee was adopted.

Mr. UPSON moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

FRANKLIN OLIVER.

Mr. ECKLEY. I ask unanimous consent to report back from the Committee on the Public Lands House bill No. 1595, to perfect the title of Franklin Oliver, a soldier of the war of 1812, to certain lands which he claims to have covered by military warrants.

Mr. COOK. I object.

LOUISIANA CONTESTED-ELECTION CASE.

Mr. UPSON. I now call up the case of Menard and Hunt.

The Clerk read the resolution of the Committee of Elections, as follows:

Resolved, That neither J. Willis Menard nor Caleb S. Hunt is entitled to a seat in this House as a Representative from the second congressional district of Louisiana, to fill the vacancy caused by the death of James Mann.

Mr. MAYNARD. I rise to a question of order. This is the first moment it could be made. Inasmuch as one of the contestants for the seat from the second congressional district is present here, as I understand, with a certificate of election and a commission, he is entitled as matter of right to come to the bar and to be sworn in and take his seat until the House shall upon examination decide otherwise.

The SPEAKER. The Chair overrules the point of order. It is in the discretion of the House and not of the Speaker. If there is no objection the Speaker always swears in a member claiming a seat. If there is it is to be submitted to the House. If there is not unanimous consent of course no person can be sworn in.

Mr. MAYNARD. I make that motion.

Mr. CHANLER. Which contestant does the member refer to?

Mr. MAYNARD. Whichever has the certificate of election.

The SPEAKER. The motion is that J. Willis Menard shall now be sworn in as a Representative from the second district of Louisiana. Is there objection?

Mr. WOOD and Mr. KERR objected.

Mr. MAYNARD. I will move to suspend the rules for that purpose.

Mr. UPSON. I do not yield for that.

Mr. ROSS. Mr. Speaker, cannot the gentleman make that motion?

The SPEAKER. Not without the consent of the gentleman from Michigan, who has the floor.

Mr. CHANLER. I raise a point of order, in view of having the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MAYNARD] exhaust this case to the satisfaction of the country if he wishes to do it.

Mr. DAWES. I would like to inquire of my colleague on the committee [Mr. CHANLER] what objection he has to hearing the claimant on his own right to a seat?

Mr. CHANLER. I have no objection. Please to wait a moment until I present my point of order.

Mr. UPSON. If the gentleman will waive his point for a moment I will state to the House that the contestants in this case inform me that they only desire fifteen minutes each to be heard on their respective claims before the House. I therefore move that they be allowed to address the House for that space of time under the rules of the House.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. CHANLER. The point of order I wish now to make—

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state his point of order, not argue it.

Mr. CHANLER. I am going to state it. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MAYNARD] has a right to exhaust his point of order by moving to suspend the rules for the purpose of having the gentleman named in his motion sworn in.

The SPEAKER. The Chair overrules the point of order, on the ground that no member can be taken from the floor by a motion to suspend the rules even for the highest question of privilege. The gentleman from Michigan is entitled to the floor.

Mr. CHANLER. He certainly can yield for that purpose.

The SPEAKER. Certainly, if he desires to.

Mr. UPSON. I do not yield.

Mr. CHANLER. A colored man comes here and the gentleman debars him from taking his seat.

Mr. UPSON. I have no objection to that if the gentleman will vote in favor of giving him his seat. [Laughter.]

Mr. CHANLER. I am entirely against him; but I am striving to aid the Republican party in doing justice to a black man.

THE SPEAKER. Is there objection to the motion to suspend the rules?

Several MEMBERS objected.

The question was taken; and the motion was agreed to; two thirds voting in the affirmative.

THE SPEAKER. If there is no objection Mr. Menard will first address the House.

Mr. WOODWARD. I suggest that he speak from the Clerk's desk.

THE SPEAKER. A contestant having no seat is usually allowed to speak from whatever place he can.

Mr. WOODWARD. We can hear him better from the desk.

Mr. VAN HORN, of New York. I object.

Mr. MENARD, (the contestant.) Mr. Speaker, I appear here more to acknowledge this high privilege than to make an argument before this House. It was certainly not my intention at first to take any part in this case at all; but as I have been sent here by the votes of nearly nine thousand electors I would feel myself recreant to the duty imposed upon me if I did not defend their rights on this floor. I wish it to be well understood before I go any further that in the disposition of this case I do not expect nor do I ask that there shall be any favor shown me on account of my race or the former condition of that race. I wish the case to be decided on its own merits and nothing else. As I said before the Committee of Elections, Mr. Hunt who contests my seat is not properly a contestant before this House, for the reason that he has not complied with the law of Congress in serving notice upon me of his intention to contest my seat. The returns of the board of canvassers of the State of Louisiana were published officially on the 25th of November, and the gentleman had sufficient time to comply with the law of Congress if he had chosen to do so. When Congress convened on the 7th of December he presented to the Speaker of this House a protest against my taking my seat. I did not know the nature of that protest until about the middle of January, when the case was called up before the committee.

Upon this point of notice I desire to call the attention of the House to this fact: that General Sheldon, who ran on the same ticket that I did as a candidate for the Forty-First Congress, was declared to be elected upon the same grounds that I was, and he wrote to the chairman of the Committee of Elections to find out his opinion with regard to this question of notice. Mr. Hunt, it seems, failed to give him notice also; and I understood when I was last in New Orleans that it is the opinion of the chairman of the Committee of Elections that the case of Mr. Sheldon is a very clear one. I am very sorry that the chairman of the Committee of Elections did not give me the benefit of that opinion.

I am of opinion that when Congress enacted that law it certainly intended that every contestant should comply with its requirements, and I can see no reason why the law should be set aside in this case any more than in any other, and I think that if Mr. Hunt did not know the law of Congress he was a very poor subject to be sent to Congress. [Laughter.]

Now, sir, the Committee of Elections, in their report, have cited the New Hampshire case of Perkins vs. Morrison, but they take as a precedent the action of the minority of the committee in that case, which is very strange indeed, and they give us no benefit from the report of the majority of that committee. I ask the Clerk to read from that majority report the passage which I have marked.

"By the Constitution of the United States the right to prescribe the times, places, and manner of holding elections for Representatives in each State is declared to be in the Legislature thereof, subject to the superior power of Congress to make or alter such regulations by law. That power, however, Congress has never exercised, unless it was partially exerted by the second session of the 2d of June 25, 1842, to which reference has already been made. Limited only, therefore, by the provisions of that session, the Legislature of New Hampshire had plenary power to prescribe by what districts the elections should be made, and to change the boundaries of those districts at its pleasure and at any time. No constitutional provision, no law of Congress restrains this right originally to form or subsequently to alter the limits of congressional districts at the discretion of the State Legislature. It is conceded that Congress could by law have exclusively determined the extent of each district and enacted that it should remain unchanged under the apportionment during the entire period of ten years. But this has not been done. The act of June 25, 1842, only enacted that the elections, alike general and special, should be by districts of contiguous territory; and under the law the limits of each district must be as they were before its passage—such as the Legislature of the State may from time to time prescribe. The act of Congress is merely commendatory. It was not possible to delegate to the State Legislature the legislative power vested by the Constitution in Congress. It follows, of course, that the districting acts are the untrammelled action of the Legislative Assembly of New Hampshire, and consequently that the power to change the boundaries of a district remains unlimited in the same Legislature. Your committee are not informed that this position has hitherto ever been seriously controverted. Such appears to have been the common understanding. The Legislatures of several of the States, after having formed congressional districts in conformity with the recommendation of the act of Congress of June 25, 1842, have subsequently redistricted the States or made changes in the boundaries of the districts previously formed. North Carolina, Georgia, Ohio, and Pennsylvania are among the number. Representatives elected from the districts thus reorganized have been admitted to seats in the House without objection. More than twenty Representatives elected by these reorganized districts sit unchallenged in the present Congress.

But it is urged on behalf of the contestant that if the power be conceded to the Legislature of New Hampshire to redistrict the State, the districting act of July 11, 1850, does not extend to an election to fill vacancies in the Thirty-First Congress. In terms, however, it unquestionably does. It took effect from its passage. It repealed so much of the former act as was inconsistent with its provisions. Immediately on its passage, therefore, there were no congressional districts in New Hampshire other than those limited by this later act. An election to fill the vacancy occasioned by the resignation of Mr. Wilson could, therefore, have been held in no other manner than that in which the sitting member was elected. The third district, by which Mr. Wilson was elected, was a creature of the act of July 2, 1846; it was sustained by it and ceased with it. When, therefore, an election was ordered to be held on the 8th of October, 1850, no political division, no congressional district, embracing exclusively the counties of Hillsborough and Cheshire, had any legal existence. It had given place to the third district as limited by the second districting act. The Governor of the State could issue his precept to none other than an existing district. Had the precept been sent to the counties of Hillsborough and Cheshire alone, it would have been sent to a political nonentity."

Mr. MENARD. Mr. Speaker, in the matter of redistricting the State of Louisiana the Governor had no authority of law whatever to send his precept for an election to fill this vacancy to any other district than the new one made by the Legislature on the 22d of August, 1868. He could not have ordered an election to fill this vacancy under a law which had been repealed.

There is another point to which I wish to call the attention of this House. The State was redistricted before Colonel Mann died. Therefore, at the time when he died his district was intact, and no change was made in it after his death. And the voters in that portion of the new district which were formerly within the districts that elected Mr. NEWSHAM and Mr. VIDAL to this House were no longer constituents of those gentlemen, but had become the constituents of Mr. Mann. So far as the law is concerned Mr. Mann represented the new district as it now stands. And when he died, and there was a vacancy in that new district, the Governor of the State had no power whatever to order an election in the old district to fill the vacancy, but the election had to be held by law within the territorial limits of the new district. The Legislature of Louisiana, according to the Constitution of the United States, had the power to change the districts. Therefore the Governor was by the new redistricting act to order an election to fill the vacancy within the new district.

Now, I would call attention to another point. If it be admitted that the election was legal, and that the Legislature had full power to create new districts, I ask a moment's attention while I compare the vote on the 3d of November with the vote cast in the preceding April election on the ratification of the constitution: In the first, second, third, tenth, and eleventh wards of the city of New Orleans, which are included in the new second congressional district, the vote for the constitution in April was 7,373. In the same wards on the 3d of November there were only 125 votes, showing a falling off of 7,248 votes in the space of six months. In the parish of Jefferson, on the 17th and 18th days of April, 1868, the votes for the constitution were 3,133. On the 3d of November following the Republican votes in that parish were only 662; showing a falling off in six months of 2,470 votes. This is sufficient to show to any reasonable person that the loyal voters in this portion of the district were deprived of the right to go to the polls and cast their ballots. Now, this falling off was caused by the intimidations and threats made and the frauds practiced in those parishes. And I now ask Congress on behalf of the loyal people of my district to set aside the returns of votes from those parishes, so as to give the rebels there no more encouragement for their systematic plan of fraud and intimidation. And if the votes of those two parishes are thrown out I will then have, in the remainder of the district, a majority over Mr. Hunt, my contestant, of 3,341 votes. And as I hold the certificate of election from the Governor, I hold that I should be recognized and admitted to this body as the legal Representative of the district in which a vacancy was created by the death of my predecessor, Mr. Mann. There is no evidence whatever that there was any fraud in the election in the remaining five parishes of the district. Our vote in November compares favorably with the vote cast in April for the constitution. And I think that Congress should recognize the right of the voters of those parishes to be represented here. Had the same Republican vote been cast in November that was cast in April in the parishes of Orleans and Jefferson I would still have a majority over Mr. Hunt of several hundred votes.

It will be noticed that under the new registration for the election of November there were 20,314 voters registered in the five wards of the city of New Orleans comprised in the second congressional district of Louisiana. The total votes in those wards cast at the election, admitting all of them to have been legal, were 11,660, showing that over 8,500 legal voters were deprived of the right to vote in consequence of the condition of things then existing in Louisiana, and I have every reason to believe, judging from the election in April previous, that those 8,500 were Republican voters. I ask this House to give these men—most of whom were colored—some consideration, and not allow the rebel votes to be counted against them. If this is done, it is possible that at the next election loyal men will have a chance to express their will through the ballot-box. And according to the registration for the parish of Jefferson there were then 5,969 voters, while the total number of votes cast on the 3d of November was 2,886, showing that in that parish alone there were 3,083 loyal voters who were deprived of their right to vote in consequence of the intimidation and lawlessness there.

THE SPEAKER. The fifteen minutes have expired. The other claimant, Mr. Hunt, is now entitled to the floor for fifteen minutes.

Mr. KERR. Mr. Hunt desires me to say that he does not wish to occupy any part of his fifteen minutes. He leaves the question to be discussed by other gentlemen.

Mr. MAYNARD. Mr. Speaker, would it be in order for me now to make the motion I indicated a few moments since?

THE SPEAKER. It could only be presented in the form of an amendment to the pending resolution. The House is now considering the question of the claims of these respective contestants to the seat. That is a question of as high privilege as any that can be pending in the House at this time.

Mr. MAYNARD. The point, in the form in which I proposed to present it, was that whichever of these claimants holds the certificate is prima facie entitled to the seat, and should be admitted the moment it appears to the House that there is a vacancy.

The SPEAKER. That is a question for the House to determine. The House is now engaged in considering the question which of these claimants is entitled to the seat. If the case had not been investigated the House might, upon the prima facie case presented by the certificate, decide to swear in a person; or it could so decide now if it saw fit.

Mr. MAYNARD. Then I make that motion. The SPEAKER. The gentleman cannot make the motion unless the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. UPSON] yields for the purpose.

Mr. CHANLER. I appeal to the gentleman from Michigan to allow the motion to be made.

Mr. UPSON. I do not yield for that motion. This matter has been referred to the committee; they have reported upon it; and I want the House to determine the question upon that report. And I would say that this case follows the precedent established in previous cases—in the cases of the members from Kentucky as well as the case of the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. BUTLER.] Wherever a protest has been presented to the House before the admission of the person presenting himself as a member, and a prima facie case has been made against him, the House has uniformly referred the case to a committee, and has always acted upon the report of the committee. I know of no reason why we should in this case deviate from the customary course. And let me say that some of the gentlemen who are apparently so anxious to precipitate a decision by a departure from the ordinary proceeding, will, when we come to a vote upon the record, be found on the other side.

Mr. CHANLER. One word right here—
Mr. UPSON. I do not yield to the gentleman.

Mr. CHANLER. I only wish to say—

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. UPSON] declines to yield, and is entitled to be protected against interruption.

Mr. CHANLER. Of course, protection is always extended on that side.

The SPEAKER. The remark of the gentleman from New York [Mr. CHANLER] is not just to the Chair; for the Chair has protected him from interruption when he has declined to yield.

Mr. CHANLER. When questions of veracity have been raised here I have appealed from the decision of the Chair when that side has been protected and this side punished.

The SPEAKER. The remarks of the gentleman from New York are not respectful to the Chair; nor are they true.

Mr. CHANLER. Very well; let it be decided by the record.

Mr. UPSON. I yield for a moment to the gentleman from New York, [Mr. WARD.]

RELICS OF GEORGE WASHINGTON.

Mr. WARD. I ask unanimous consent to submit the following resolution:

Whereas there appears in the Evening Express, a paper published in this city, under date of February 26, 1869, the following:

The Articles Taken from the Arlington House.—General Robert E. Lee made application a few days ago, through a gentleman residing in this city, to the Secretary of the Interior for a number of articles once the property of George Washington, which were taken from the Arlington House, General Lee's estate before the war, when that place fell into the possession of the Federal Army. The articles were pieces of household furniture, clothing, dishes, and papers which formerly belonged to General Washington. Secretary Browning has decided to grant the request, and an order has been given to turn the articles over to the person deputed by General Lee to receive them.

Resolved, That the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds be directed to inquire into the subject, and ascertain whether the matter so published is true, and if true to ascertain by what right the Secretary of the Interior surrenders those articles so cherished as once the property of the Father of his Country to the rebel general-in-chief; and that said committee report fully upon the subject by bill or otherwise; and that they have power in pursuing said investigation to send for persons and papers, and leave to report at any time.

Mr. BROOKS. I object, and call for the regular order.

CONTESTED ELECTION—LOUISIANA.

Mr. UPSON. Mr. Speaker, the questions involved in this contest are peculiar. The case is one that is without a precedent in the records of Congress. I ask the attention of members that they may understand the grounds of the action of the committee. The report of the majority, if properly understood, will, I think, commend itself to the candid judgment of the House.

This case was presented early in this session by the presentation of the credentials of Mr. Menard, and also of a protest from Mr. Hunt, with a certificate from the Governor and secretary of State of the votes cast in that district. The credentials and the protest, together with an opinion of Mr. Randell Hunt on the legal questions involved, and a statement of the facts in regard to the organization of the new district, will be found in the report on pages 6 to 9.

For reasons best known to himself the Governor gave the certificate to Mr. Menard, although it appears from the certified statement which accompanies it that the whole number of votes cast at said election to fill such vacancy in said district was 27,019, of which votes so returned to the secretary of State, 19,078 were rejected by the committee of canvassers and the returns thrown out, being a large majority of the entire vote of the district as returned, and the certificate was given to Mr. Menard on the vote of but three of the seven parishes of the district, and casting in the aggregate only a vote of 7,941. The vote of the single parish of Orleans, one of those rejected, was 11,628, being nearly four ninths of the entire vote of the district, and 3,687 votes more than the entire vote on which the certificate was given to Mr. Menard. The reason given in the certified statement for the rejection of the vote of the parish of Orleans, namely, "that the returns were made by the boards of supervisors of registration," shows that in this respect the returns were made as required by law, and that the objection is invalid. By the provisions of section twenty-five, of act No. 164, laws of Louisiana, 1868, page 228, it is expressly made the duty of said supervisors of registration in each parish to make out and forward said returns to the secretary of State.

I will ask the Clerk to read that provision of the law of Louisiana.

The Clerk read as follows:

"Sec. 25. That it shall be the duty of said supervisors of registration in each parish to make out triplicate returns, to forward one of them immediately by mail to the secretary of State, and another to the secretary of State by the next most speedy mode of conveyance, and to deposit the third in the office of the clerk of the district court, and in the city of New Orleans in the office of the clerk of the first district court; and for their willful failure or neglect herein, such supervisors shall, upon conviction before any court of competent jurisdiction, be fined in a sum not exceeding $500, at the discretion of the court."

Mr. UPSON. Notwithstanding this plainly expressed provision of the statute the Governor has wholly ignored it, and has rejected these returns because they were made by the very officers whom the law said should make them. It is unnecessary to notice further the objections stated to the returns from the other parishes rejected, (although those urged against Jefferson and Terrebonne would seem to be frivolous,) since, if any valid election was held there, the parish of Orleans being properly returned, should be counted, which would give Mr. Hunt a majority over Mr. Menard so great that it would not be overcome by the vote of all or any of the other parishes if they were counted, and in no event can Mr. Menard be shown by the returns to have received a majority vote in the district.

The most favorable construction of the evidence for the contestant that could be given would not identify and count up additional votes enough in his favor to equal one half of the majority returned for Mr. Mann, much less to give him the majority, even if all the votes assumed by witnesses to have been changed in the ballot-boxes or fraudulently put in were charged to the Democratic vote, deducted from Mr. Mann's majority, and counted for the contestant. The only remedy for or correction of the evils complained of under the state of the case as presented, would be to set aside the returns, declare a vacancy, and order a new election, as it is impossible from the evidence to purge the poll; but this the contestant does not desire or insist should be done, nor do the committee consider the evidence sufficient to justify such a course.

So far as the returns and the evidence show, therefore, the contestant has not received a majority of the votes cast in said district for Representative in Congress, but that majority was given to Mr. Mann.

It is objected by Mr. Hunt that the district from which Mr. Menard claims to have been elected is a different district in its territorial limits to that one which Mr. Mann was elected to represent, and that the vote on which Mr. Menard claims to have been elected is entirely from parishes which were never in the district represented by Mr. Mann, and which have been incorporated into the second district as now known by an act of the Legislature of Louisiana passed since Mr. Mann took his seat in this House, which statement as to the territorial organization and vote of the district as now known appears to be correct.

The second congressional district of Louisiana, as it existed at the time that Mr. Mann was elected therefrom and took his seat in this House, was created by act No. 54 (Laws Louisiana, 1864-65, p. 144,) approved April 4, 1865, dividing the State into five congressional districts, and comprised "that portion of the fourth representative district of the parish of Orleans which is included between St. Louis, Rampart, and Canal streets and the Mississippi river, third, second, and first representative districts of the parish of Orleans, and that portion of the tenth representative district of the parish of Orleans which is known by existing statutes as the tenth ward of the city of New Orleans."

By a subsequent act of the Legislature of Louisiana, approved August 22, 1868, making a new division of the State into five congressional districts, the second congressional district was changed so as to comprise "all that portion of the parish of Orleans on the left bank of the Mississippi river above and west of Canal street, in the city of New Orleans, comprising the first, second, third, and tenth representative districts of the parish of Orleans and the parishes of Jefferson, St. Charles, St. John the Baptist, St. James, Lafourche, and Terrebonne," and this election to fill the vacancy in the original second district caused by the death of Mr. Mann was held in the limits last above prescribed for the second district by said act of August 22, 1868, and not in the limits prescribed by the act of April 4, 1865; and both Mr. Menard and Mr. Mann claim to have been chosen by the electors of and to represent said new district so created by act of August 22, 1868. It will be seen that this new second district created by the act of 1868 not only does not embrace all of the same portion of the parish of Orleans as the one created by act of 1865, but also includes the parishes of Jefferson, St. Charles, St. James, Lafourche, and Terrebonne, none of which were in the district represented by Mr. Mann, but were all included in the third congressional district, and are now represented in this House by the member from said district, [Mr. NEWSHAM,] whom they participated in electing. That portion of the fourth representative district of the parish of Orleans which was included in the second congressional district of Mr. Mann by the act of 1865 has by the act of 1868 been cut off from it, and the portion of the tenth representative district of said parish of Orleans not before included in the old congressional district, and known as the eleventh ward of the city, has also been added to the new second district, and was by the act of 1865 a part of the third congressional district.

The largest portion of this new second congressional district, as created by the act of the Legislature of Louisiana of August 22, 1868, and comprising a majority of the voters of said district, is made up of a part of one of the other old districts of the State now having a Representative in this House, to wit, the third congressional district, as created by the act of 1865, and the singular spectacle is presented of a vacancy in the second congressional district, claimed to have been filled by the voters of the third district, who already have a Representative chosen by them sitting in this House.

The new second district of Louisiana therefore, as constituted by the act of the 22d of August, 1868, might with more propriety have been termed the third district, because the greater portion of it is made up of the original third district, and the whole vote given to Mr. Menard comes from parishes embraced in the third district, now represented here. The point, therefore, was distinctly raised, and I call the attention of my colleague on the committee to the fact, that we find a statement laid on our desks on the part of Mr. Hunt claiming that the committee went outside of the record to find reasons for rejecting his claim, whereas in fact he himself placed on record, in the very first papers he filed, a protest against Mr. Menard's election on the ground that he was chosen from a district that did not compose a part of the second district. That will be found in this very protest, as I will now read:

"1. Mr. Menard and I were candidates for election to fill the unexpired term or vacancy caused by the death of said James Mann.

"2. But after his election as Representative to the Fortieth Congress, and before the election to fill the vacancy occasioned by his death, the Legislature of Louisiana reapportioned the State for congressional purposes, changing the districts in very material respects.

"3. And in what was Mann's district, that is, the second district, Mr. Menard received only 93 votes and I received 11,535 votes; but all the votes of this precinct or parish were rejected by the committee of canvassers on purely technical grounds of informality in their returns, in most manifest violation both of law and justice, so that the certificate was awarded Mr. Menard by the Governor upon a state of facts showing that Mr. Menard did not receive a single vote in Mr. Mann's late district."

That was the very objection raised by Mr. Hunt and upon which the committee were called upon to decide, and accordingly they acted upon it, as it was proper they should even had their attention not been called to the matter, because it was patent on the face of the papers.

Mr. SCHENCK. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. UPSON. Certainly.

Mr. SCHENCK. I have some difficulty in hearing the argument, and I do not know that I entirely understand the point of the case. I understand that Mr. Mann was admitted to a seat as having a prima facie right to it, and that his seat was contested by Mr. Jones, but in the mean time Mr. Mann died; that upon the death of Mr. Mann, Mr. Hunt and Mr. Menard became candidates to fill the vacancy; that Mr. Jones has to-day been decided not to have had good grounds for contesting the seat of Mr. Mann, and therefore the seat has been refused to him by the House. That, I understand, is the decision of the House—that the death of Mr. Mann, who was entitled to a seat, created a vacancy.

Mr. UPSON. Certainly.

Mr. SCHENCK. Now, is one of these contestants in possession of the evidence of a prima facie right to the seat; and if so, is it Mr. Menard? Has the House decided that there is a vacancy; and if so, did the committee find one of these contestants entitled by the production of the certificate of the Governor, or otherwise, to a prima facie right to the seat?

Mr. UPSON. That question was not referred to the committee.

Mr. SCHENCK. Will the gentleman tell me whether I am right?

Mr. UPSON. I will answer the gentleman. This case was presented, as I stated in my opening remarks, in the early part of the present session on the certificate of the Governor, given to Mr. Menard on the protest of Mr. Hunt, accompanied by a certified statement of the vote of the district protesting against Mr. Menard's being sworn in and claiming the right to the certificate himself. That protest and the certified statement with the certificate of the Governor to Mr. Menard were presented by the Speaker to the House, were referred to the Committee of Elections to determine who was entitled to the seat, and on that reference the committee have acted and made their report.

But I was proceeding to remark in relation to the redistricting of the State. Objection was taken, as we have seen, by Mr. Hunt, and we find that the statement which he made was correct as a matter of fact; that this district had been newly created, and that the major part of the new district was made out of the old third district of Louisiana, although it is called the second district. The vacancy occurred in the second district, which Mr. Mann was elected to represent, and consisted only of a portion of the parish of Orleans. The whole of the return for Mr. Menard is based upon the vote of parishes which are included in the third congressional district, which is represented here by Hon. Mr. NEWSHAM.

The attention of the committee was called to the case of Perkins vs. Morrison, with which I presume the gentleman from Ohio is familiar, for if I mistake not he participated in the discussion of the legal questions presented in that case. It was a case from New Hampshire in which two claimants claimed the seat, one claiming to have been elected from what had formed the old district, and the other claiming the seat upon the votes which were returned from the new district as formed by the Legislature of New Hampshire. If the votes in the old district were counted, then Mr. Perkins, the contestant, would have been entitled to the seat, and if the votes in the new district were counted, then Mr. Morrison, the sitting member, was entitled to the seat. The Committee of Elections, divided according to party lines by a vote of five to four, decided in favor of the sitting member who was elected by the new district. But they themselves stated an objection that had been raised which they were compelled to admit, and I read from page 145 of Bartlett's Contested-Election Cases:

"In the discussion of this case before your committee, one other and only one other argument was submitted by the contestant. It was, that if the Legislature of New Hampshire could change the boundaries of the district, they might have so divided it as to render it impossible to determine to which district the Governor's precept should have been sent. This may be admitted, but it does not disprove the existence of the power. It is certainly illogical to argue that because a power may be abused therefore it does not exist."

Now, the very objection insisted upon there finds an exact illustration in this case. A man presents himself here with a certificate claiming to have been elected from a portion of territory that never was included in the district made vacant by the death of Mr. Mann, and from a district which might with more propriety have been termed the third district than the second district.

Mr. PAINE. I ask the gentleman if he will yield to me for five minutes?

Mr. UPSON. For what purpose?

Mr. PAINE. To make a statement to the House.

Mr. UPSON. I will yield for that purpose.

Mr. PAINE. I send to the Clerk's desk a resolution which I will ask the gentleman to allow me to present to the House for a vote of the House now.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That J. Willis Menard, having a prima facie right to a seat in this House as a Representative from the State of Louisiana, be admitted to the House pending the consideration of the present contested-election case.

Mr. UPSON. I must object to the reception of that resolution at this time, and I will give the gentleman my reasons why.

Mr. PAINE. Then allow me to state to the House that if the previous question shall not be sustained, so that I shall have an opportunity to offer that resolution before this case is disposed of, I will offer it. I would add, with the gentleman's permission, that this claimant for the seat has a certificate from the Governor of his State such as gives us all our right to sit here in the first instance—gives us all a prima facie right to sit here.

Mr. UPSON. The gentleman will bear in mind that these credentials were presented in the early part of this session, when the House had just the same opportunity of knowing the facts from the face of the papers that they now have, for the credentials were presented here and this House directed them to be referred to the Committee of Elections. They did the same with the whole of the Kentucky cases. In every one of those cases the gentleman claiming a seat presented a certificate of election in due form, but they were all referred to the Committee of Elections. And so was the fact in the case of Mr. BUTLER, of Tennessee. He presented his credentials in due form, and they were referred to the Committee of Elections. So also with the credentials of the member from Georgia and from every other reconstructed State; and this House, as a matter of consistency, should abide by the rule they have established for themselves. And they should also abide by the statement that has been made in the hearing of the House by Mr. Menard himself that he wants no favor shown him on account of his race or color, and that you shall consider his case and decide it as you would the case of every other person. In that light the committee have endeavored to discharge their duty in the premises, and have shown to the House the reasons upon which they have predicated their action.

Mr. HIGBY. Will the gentleman yield to me for a question?

Mr. UPSON. Certainly.

Mr. HIGBY. I would ask the gentleman if there is any defect in the credentials submitted by Mr. Menard? What is the finding of the committee upon that?

Mr. UPSON. In form it is all regular, but it comes from one of those States where all the certificates are first referred to the Committee of Elections, and where the House have always refused to act until the Committee of Elections have reported upon them. They have now reported upon these credentials, and I ask the House to act upon that report and not make any deviation from the principle they have already established in other cases.

At the time the credentials of Mr. Menard were filed and referred to the committee there was also filed and referred a certificate under the seal of the State of Louisiana, and signed by officers of that State, with a protest from Mr. Mann, claiming the seat for himself. The certificate signed by the Governor of the State and by the secretary of the State, under the seal of the State, showed that Mr. Menard was not elected. More than that, it showed that Mr. Menard received but 93 votes in that portion of the new district which had been embraced in the old district represented by Mr. Mann. Now bear in mind that every one of the votes on which the certificate given to Mr. Mann was predicated is from portions of the district which at a previous election chose Mr. NEWSHAM, now holding a seat on this floor, and not from the district represented by Mr. Mann during his lifetime. They are the votes of those who never were authorized to vote for Mr. Mann at the time he was elected.

The position taken by the Committee of Elections in this case is the same that was taken by the minority of the Committee of Elections in the case of Perkins vs. Morrison, from the State of New Hampshire. The reasons will be found in the volume of Contested Elections, and they are copied in the report of the committee in this case. The language of the minority in that case is applicable also to this case. That minority report was signed of four of the nine members of the committee, and received a vote in the House of 90 to 98. The Committee of Elections are satisfied that the reasons presented in that minority report are correct; that is, that the vacancy caused by the death of Mr. Mann could only be filled by the voters of the district that formerly elected him; that the redistricting of the State was only prospective, and that any election by voters of the third district to fill a vacancy that had arisen in the second district was illegal and void. That is the conclusion to which the committee have arrived. They apply the same rule to the case of Mr. Hunt, and they find by the same reasoning that he is not entitled to a seat here, although he claims that he was elected by voters in the new portions of the district.

Mr. GARFIELD. I desire to ask the gentleman a question. He is discussing, as I understand, the relations between the old and the new district and the vote in the respective districts. I wish to ask him whether the law which created the new district did not repeal the law creating the old district, and whether there could have been any legal election at all on the basis of the old districting law?

Mr. UPSON. The act redistricting the State repealed only so much of former acts as was inconsistent with it. It was only prospective in its operation, applying to elections of members to future Congresses.

Mr. GARFIELD. Does the law say so?

Mr. UPSON. The law provides for the repeal of everything "inconsistent with the provisions of this act." The same reasoning applicable in this case was adopted in the case of Perkins vs. Morrison. The language used in that case is as follows:

"It does not purport to provide for any method of filling vacancies that might occur in the future, and beyond all question it was understood as providing only for the election of members of future Congresses. Such are the terms of the act and such must also be its spirit. A vacancy in the House of Representatives is the occurrence of an event by which a portion of the people are left unrepresented, and the filling of that vacancy is directed by the Constitution in such explicit language as requires no aid from State enactments to perfect the right. The second section of the first article in the Constitution contains the following provision: 'When vacancies occur in the representation from any State the executive authority thereof shall issue writs of election to fill such vacancies.' This is the only provision of law on the subject of vacancies, and it is ample and sufficient. No act of the Legislature of New Hampshire purports to interfere in the matter, and the act of July ought not, in our belief, to be understood as requiring the vacancy occasioned by General Wilson's resignation to be filled by any other person than those whose Representative he was."

Mr. GARFIELD. One further question. Has the gentleman's attention been called to the case of two members now on this floor—the gentlemen from Indiana [Mr. WASHBURN] and his colleague [Mr. HUNTER]—who are at the present moment members from the same district and have been for more than a year, the old law by which their districts were created having been repealed. The appointment of registers in bankruptcy as well as everything official that has been done in regard to the congressional districts since that time has proceeded on the basis of the new districts. I ask the gentleman whether this case which I now cite is not precisely parallel to the case he is discussing?

Mr. UPSON. There is no parallel between the two cases. The two gentlemen from Indiana to whom the gentleman has referred were both elected from their respective districts at the same time, and no vacancy has since occurred in either district, nor has any special election since been held there. In the present case there has been a special election to fill a vacancy in the Congress to which Mr. Mann was elected; and it is absurd to say that an election in that district for a member of Congress is for only half a term, provided the Representative chosen in the first instance dies, and that the election of his successor for the residue of the term must be held in a district which is substantially different from that in which the first election was held.

Mr. GARFIELD. Suppose a vacancy should occur in one of the two districts represented by the two gentlemen from Indiana already referred to, would the gentleman's line of reasoning lead him to declare that in such a case there must be an election on the basis of the old district rather than on the basis of the new district which has been recognized by law for a year and a half?

Mr. UPSON. I certainly do maintain that to fill the vacancy the election would have to be held on the basis of the old district; otherwise it would happen that a portion of the people embraced within the new district would for the residue of the term have two Representatives in Congress, while a portion of the people in the old district would have no Representative.

Mr. GARFIELD. One further question before the gentleman leaves this point. Does not Mr. Menard seek to represent, and, if elected at all, was he not elected to represent the second congressional district of Louisiana? And did not Mr. Mann, the deceased member, represent the second district? Is there not as regards this district a mere change of boundaries rather than a change of identity?

Mr. UPSON. There is an absolute change of identity; for a majority of the voters in the second district as organized under the recent law are residents of the district now represented by the gentleman from Louisiana, [Mr. NEWSHAM.]

Mr. GARFIELD. That I understand; but is it an absolute change?

Mr. UPSON. The district could with more propriety be called the third than the second, because it contains more of the voters of the third than the second.

Mr. GARFIELD. The law calls it the second district.

Mr. UPSON. But that does not change the reality. The repealing clause of the law of Louisiana, to which the gentleman has called my attention, provides that—

"All laws and parts of laws in conflict with this act be, and the same are hereby, repealed."

Mr. GARFIELD. Is it not in conflict with that act for the old districts to remain after the new districts have been created?

Mr. UPSON. No, sir; because that is beyond their power. That gun has gone off. The election had taken place for members of this Congress, and that legislation could not change it. It could make no change except for members of the next Congress. Does the gentleman say they can make a law for half of a Congress, and then say for the next half of the Congress the election should be held in another district?

I call attention of the House to the reasoning in the case to which I have referred:

"It would not be a preservation of the purity of the elective franchise, nor would it be a just guardianship of the republican principle that all shall have a right to be represented, to admit the power of a State Legislature to provide that a portion of the people should have two Representatives in Congress while another portion should have none or not be represented by the man of their choice."

"It is, besides, in disregard of the law of Congress of June, 1842, which declares that no one district shall be entitled to two Representatives. If the people who choose a Representative are not entitled to fill the vacancy happening by his resignation it is impossible to tell what portion of the population may most properly exercise this privilege. It seems to be assumed in this case that the new district made by the act of July 11, 1850, and numbered three, has the right to send a Representative in place of General Wilson because the number corresponds with that which General Wilson represented. But the order of numbering is an unimportant circumstance, and the first or the fourth district might have been as properly called the third as any other; yet it would be a strange assertion that on this account such district would be authorized to have two Representatives during the remainder of the Thirty-First Congress."

Mr. GARFIELD. Let me ask my friend a question in this connection. I desire to obtain information on the subject. Was not an election held at the same time for members of the next Congress, and I ask him whether upon the same ticket members for the present and for the next Congress were not voted for?

Mr. UPSON. It was so all over the State.

Mr. GARFIELD. I wish to ask the gentleman whether the principle here involved may not arise in the next Congress?

Mr. UPSON. It can never happen again, unless a vacancy should arise under the same circumstances.

Mr. GARFIELD. Would a decision in this case one way or the other in any way affect the case of General Sheldon in the next Congress?

Mr. UPSON. Not in the least. The election was held properly, so far as his case is concerned. It does not affect an election for a future Congress, but only an election for an unexpired term of this Congress.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I will say that so far as Mr. Menard is concerned it is unimportant whether the election was held in the new district or in the old district, for on the returns he is in the minority, and a greater minority in the old district than in the new.

Mr. GARFIELD. Do I understand the gentleman to say that this certificate did not show that Mr. Menard had received a majority of the votes?

Mr. UPSON. The certificate says nothing about that.

Mr. GARFIELD. What does the certificate say?

Mr. UPSON. It is in the ordinary form from the Governor of Louisiana, certifying to his election; but accompanying that certificate and filed with the Speaker at the same time was a certified statement of the Governor and secretary of State of Louisiana, giving the whole vote of the district and the reasons which induced them to throw out certain votes. The reasons they give for throwing out those votes are the very reasons why they should have been counted. The prima facie case then changed. The whole matter was referred to the Committee of Elections for their determination. They were asked to decide which of these two, Menard or Hunt, was entitled to the seat, and they have decided that neither of them was entitled to it.

Mr. GARFIELD. Do I understand the gentleman to say the Governor gave a certificate of election to both of these parties, Menard and Hunt?

Mr. UPSON. No; he gave the certificate of election to Menard, but the certified statement which accompanied it showed that Menard had received a minority of the votes.

Mr. GARFIELD. He gave a certificate to one and a certified statement showing the vote to the other?

Mr. UPSON. He gave a certificate accompanied by a statement showing what votes had been counted and what votes had been rejected.

Mr. GARFIELD. Then, the prima facie right to the seat is in Mr. Menard?

Mr. UPSON. No; the prima facie wrong is in Mr. Menard.

Mr. GARFIELD. The prima facie wrong?

Mr. UPSON. Yes, sir.

Mr. GARFIELD. Is it prima facie wrong when he comes with a certificate of election?

Mr. UPSON. I take both the papers referred to together. I say, so far as the return is concerned in that second district of Louisiana, Mr. Menard is returned as having received only 93 votes.

Mr. ROSS. By what authority can a Governor give a certificate except to a man who is elected?

Mr. UPSON. The question here is not as to what authority he had, but what he did.

Mr. ROSS. It has no force or validity if given to the wrong man.

Mr. UPSON. The reasons are given, and I have shown wherein they are invalid.

Mr. PAINE. I desire to ask my friend whether the certificate given by the Governor to Mr. Menard is not such as would give him a prima facie right to a seat in this House just exactly as good as that of any member here to-day.

Mr. UPSON. It is; but I will tell the gentleman so it was in regard to the certificates from every one of the southern States that have also been referred to the committee. And so it was in regard to the case of the members from Kentucky and that of Mr. BUTLER, of Tennessee. In referring this case to the committee all the papers were sent to them, and now on the face of these papers it is shown that Mr. Menard was not entitled to the seat. The gentleman cannot by any cyphering or by any principle of law make out a prima facie case for Mr. Menard.

Mr. PAINE. Another question. Is it not true that the reason and the sole reason why we referred these papers as between Mr. Menard and his contestant to the Committee of Elections was that we did not yet know whether there was or was not a vacancy in this district of Louisiana?

Mr. UPSON. No such reason have I heard alleged. I think they were referred without argument.

Mr. PAINE. I understood that to be the only reason we ever referred the case to the committee. It was the only reason why I ever voted for it, I know.

Mr. UPSON. Whatever reasons they were they were satisfactory to the House at the time, and now the case comes before the House on the facts; and when the gentleman has the facts before him why does he ask about a prima facie case? What is a prima facie case good for when you show it good for nothing?

Mr. PRUYN. That is it.

Mr. PAINE. What I want is, so far as this case is concerned, to decide whether there was or was not a vacancy. After that we have a right to give the seat to any man who has the certificate of the Governor, and then hear the contestant as to his claim.

Mr. UPSON. I ask the gentleman why it was this House refused to swear in the members from Kentucky until an investigation had when they had regular certificates?

Mr. COOK. Did not the House refer all those cases to the Committee of Elections with instructions to inquire whether there was a vacancy, and also whether either of these men was duly elected?

Mr. UPSON. This whole case was referred to the committee, and the argument as to the prima facie case is now too late for consideration, because the merits of the case are before the House, and the moment the papers are examined by the gentleman he will recognize it if he is a lawyer. The certified statement of the returns of the votes is good legal evidence anywhere so far as regards showing the votes cast at this election. It is under the seal of the State and is signed by the Governor and secretary.

Mr. GARFIELD. I do not desire to protract the colloquy, but I have been trying to get the gentleman to say distinctly in answer to my question whether the prima facie case is in favor of Menard or not.

Mr. UPSON. There is no prima facie case here. The prima facie case was when it was presented to the House.

Mr. GARFIELD. Do I understand the gentleman to say that we have the very singular example of an election case in which there is no prima facie case about it?

Mr. UPSON. Yes, sir; we have got beyond that.

Mr. GARFIELD. This is the first time I ever heard there could be such a thing.

Mr. UPSON. Perhaps the gentleman is not familiar with a prima facie case. Let me give him a definition as given by an old gentleman in Vermont. "It is a case," the old man said, "that was good on its face but bad in the rear." [Laughter.]

Mr. GARFIELD. Do I understand the gentleman to say that this is a good case prima facie, but bad on its merits?

Mr. UPSON. No, sir.

Mr. GARFIELD. Or does he say it is bad on its face and good on its merits?

Mr. UPSON. I say it is bad all round, on both sides. I say that he has not a prima facie case, and if the gentleman will permit me I will endeavor to show it before I get through.

Mr. GARFIELD. If the gentleman will allow me, I desire to ask him if what we call a prima facie case is not known everywhere to be this: that the man who brings a regular certificate of election from the Governor of his State has a prima facie case?

Mr. UPSON. I will answer the gentleman; and I tell him that this House has decided over and over again that there is no such prima facie case from the reconstructed States, and there never has been. Every case from those States has been referred to the Committee of Elections, and a report has been had from that committee before determining the question of the admissibility of members; and that is what was done in this case. I tell the gentleman further that this case was not referred to the committee on one paper. It was referred on two papers. They were both presented together and referred together to the committee, and the papers thus presented show no prima facie case in favor of Mr. Menard.

Mr. GARFIELD. I desire to say to my friend from Michigan that I quite recognize the truth of what he says in regard to the reconstructed States. We have followed the rule which he states when we first admitted Representatives from those States; but the State of Louisiana has been represented here, and this is not a case of first intention. It is a case of filling a vacancy.

Mr. UPSON. Will the gentleman tell me whether the cases from Kentucky were cases of first intention, and whether the case of Mr. Butler, of Tennessee, was a case of first intention?

Mr. GARFIELD. Certainly; Mr. Butler's district had not been represented.

Mr. UPSON. His State had been represented.

Mr. GARFIELD. But his district had not.

Mr. UPSON. The State of Kentucky had been represented ever since it was admitted into the Union, and yet the cases from that State were not acted upon by the House until they had been referred to the Committee of Elections and reported upon.

Mr. GARFIELD. Does not my friend recognize this difference, that in the Kentucky cases and in the case of Mr. Butler the question of the personal loyalty of the Representatives was raised? That was the reason we referred them to the committee. They never came up on the certificates to be tried on the merits.

Mr. UPSON. I tell the gentleman that the question of the election was raised in this case on the face of the papers, for the papers presented to the House showed that Mr. Menard was declared elected illegally and ought not to have been so declared.

Before I proceed further, let me say, as my friend from Ohio has referred to the cases from Kentucky and has stated that in every one of those cases there was a charge of personal disloyalty, that the gentleman from the Lexington district [Mr. Beck] has called my attention to his own case, where there was no such charge, and so far as the face of the papers showed his election was regular and his loyalty unchallenged.

Mr. BECK. Let me say that on the 3d of July, 1867, when my case was referred to the Committee of Elections, there was not an objection made by any human being upon the floor, except that General Logan stated that I had been the law partner of John C. Breckinridge. Affidavits were sent here afterward, but there was no objection at the time.

Mr. JONES, of Kentucky. The same is true of five out of the eight cases from Kentucky, and yet the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. Garfield] voted to refer them to the Committee of Elections.

Mr. UPSON. It was because Mr. Menard did not receive a majority of the votes, so far as appeared from the testimony, either in the old second district or in the new second district, that the committee felt compelled to report against him. But the same objection they find is also fatal to Mr. Hunt's claim to the seat. He is not shown by the evidence to have received a majority of the votes in the old second district, left vacant by the death of Mr. Mann. The returns are made from the parishes constituting the new second district, and the portion of the parish of Orleans in the new district is different from what it was in the old—one half or more of the fourth ward of the city of New Orleans is not included in the new district, and no election to fill the vacancy was held therein nor returns made therefrom. The eleventh ward has been added to the new district, and was not in the old, but the vote of this ward is included in the returns. What the vote would have been in the part of the fourth ward left out, or what the vote is in the eleventh ward added, it is impossible to determine from the returns as made, and hence Mr. Hunt fails to show that he has received a majority in the whole of the district left vacant by the death of Mr. Mann. It is also apparent that in a portion of the district left vacant by the death of Mr. Mann no election was held to fill the vacancy.

I would also call the attention of the House to another matter of importance, because the contestant, Mr. Hunt, has insisted that the committee went out of their way to find objections against him. I will state a few of the general facts and call the attention of the House to some things in connection with those facts. In the first place the aggregate vote of the State for Congress in April, 1868, at the time Mr. Mann was elected, was 107,156, as shown by the papers. The aggregate Republican majority of the congressional vote at that time was 16,985. In the second district Mr. Mann received 6,784 votes, and Mr. Jones 5,634, leaving a majority for Mr. Mann of 1,150 votes. There was also 849 Republican votes scattering, making the total vote in the district 12,467.

Now, the vote for Mr. Hunt in the parish of Orleans six months afterward was 11,535, while the vote for Mr. Menard was only 93. And I will show by the same certified statement that Mr. Sheldon received only 125 votes in the same district.

I wish to call the attention of the House to another fact. There was no evidence brought before the committee of the number of registered voters of the entire new district. But I find attached to the report of the minority a statement, certified to by officers of Louisiana, of the registered voters of that district. By that it appears that the registry of voters in November, 1868, was 35,772, while the vote cast was only 11,628, showing that in this parish of Orleans there were, at the time of this last election, 28,144 registered voters who, from some cause or other, did not vote. So also in the parish of Jefferson, which is embraced in this new district, the number of registered voters is given at 5,969 in the minority report, while the returns of the votes cast are 2,866, showing that over 3,100 voters did not vote there at that election.

Now the same principle applies here as in the case of Blakey vs. Golladay. A vast majority of the people of this district were virtually disfranchised at this election, and there was such a state of things existing in this congressional district that no loyal man claiming to be a Republican could vote with personal safety.

These facts are a matter of public history. We all know, as a matter of public history, that lawlessness and riot reigned throughout Louisiana; that the Governor was unable to maintain civil order; that the Legislature of the State applied to the Executive of the United States for troops to maintain order in the State, and that the Executive neglected to respond to the call; that the Governor of Louisiana had applied to the commanding general, stating that he himself was unable to maintain order there, and that the mob reigned in the city of New Orleans. A letter from the Governor, setting forth these facts specifically, was laid upon the tables of members early in this session.

There are certain things of which the House may take notice judicially, public matters affecting the Government and matters of public history affecting the whole people. Those matters this House can take cognizance of. And I know of no case where it would be more proper for them to do so than in this case where riot and lawlessness prevailed at this election in Louisiana. The return of the votes is practical evidence of that fact. In this election the portion of the city of New Orleans embraced in this district cast only 93 votes for the Republican candidate, while but six months before the same ticket received some 5,000 votes in the same portions of the city.

Mr. WHITEMORE. I would inquire if the 28,000 votes which it is claimed were registered in this district, but not cast for some reason or other in this election, were not cast in the April election for Mr. NEWSHAM, who now represents here the third district of Louisiana?

Mr. UPSON. They were; that is all of them except those embraced in the parish of Orleans.

Mr. ROSS. What was the vote in the new district?

Mr. UPSON. It was about 11,600 in the parish of Orleans. The whole of the new district gave the aggregate vote of about 27,000. Over 11,000 votes in the parish of Orleans were cast for the Democratic candidate and only 93 for the Republican candidate. This is well explained by the statement of the Governor to one of the Senators from that State, which statement was laid on our desks during the early part of this session, and also by the communication from General Buchanan and that from the Governor, which are appended to this report. I do not desire to consume time by referring to these documents in detail. With the statement which I have already made I leave the question to the decision of the House.

Mr. KERR obtained the floor, and yielded ten minutes to Mr. CARY.

Mr. CARY. Mr. Speaker, my own convictions are clear that Mr. Hunt is entitled to the seat made vacant by the death of Mr. Mann. I can scarcely hope in the few moments allowed me for the presentation of the facts to bring the minds of members to the same opinion which governs my own mind. It appears that in November last an election was held in the second district of Louisiana, the candidates being Mr. Menard and Mr. Hunt, to fill the vacancy occasioned by the death of Mr. Mann. After Mr. Mann had been elected and about the time of his death the boundaries of the district were changed. Mr. Menard comes here with a certificate of election. At the same time a certificate is presented from the Governor and secretary of State that some 15,000 votes were thrown out for informality. The records show—and this, as I understand, is the unanimous opinion of the committee—that these votes were improperly thrown out. I think there can be no question upon that point. They were votes returned according to law by the only persons authorized to return them. So that according to the prima facie case it is clear beyond question that Mr. Menard has no right to the seat, whether the new or the old district is the one in which the election should properly have been held. Hence I think the claims of Mr. Menard must be dismissed from this case entirely.

The question then presents itself, is Mr. Hunt entitled to the seat? If the votes of the old district only should be counted, Mr. Hunt is elected by over 10,000 majority in Mr. Mann's old district? If the votes of the new district only are to be considered, Mr. Hunt is elected by 9,600 majority.

Mr. UPSON. Will the gentleman tell me how he ascertains what were the votes in the old district? He does not find them in the evidence taken before the committee.

Mr. CARY. There can be no question in regard to that point when we look at the votes for Mr. Mann in the former election.

Now, sir, in any event it appears to me Mr. Hunt must be declared entitled to this seat, unless, as the committee attempt to show, there was such intimidation and threats that voters were prevented from coming to the polls. But suppose it to be true that persons were kept away from the polls by intimidation. Numerous cases have been reported to this House in which it has been held that that is not a sufficient ground of contest. In one case from Tennessee, the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES,] the chairman of the Committee of Elections, presented the report, stating that voters had been intimidated by rebel bayonets, and thus kept away from the polls, but that this was not a sufficient ground for the rejection of the person presenting the certificate of election. But, sir, where is the evidence of intimidation in this case? That is the evidence, that persons were kept away from the polls. There is not a particle of evidence going to show that there was a more quiet and peaceable election in any district of the United States than transpired in the second congressional district of Louisiana on the 3d day of November. There is not an affidavit on file. There are bold statements in some newspaper reports that persons were kept away from the polls. There can be no doubt that the friends of Mr. Menard understood from the number of votes registered that they were defeated. They then tried to get the Republicans from voting at all, in order that they might build on that fact some sort of representation that they could not go to the polls to vote.

Mr. Speaker, I have here a little paper which I wish to read. It was circulated in all the negro churches in the district and in every colored school. It was prepared beforehand in New Orleans, and it was circulated with the ostensible view of having it charged upon the Democratic party. The type is that of the Republican paper in New Orleans. It was got up for the purpose of having it appear that the Democrats had attempted to keep away the Republican voters from the polls. The paper to which I refer is as follows:

A White Man's Government or no Government!—The hand of the oppressor bears heavily upon us! Let the Caucasian arise in his strength! Too long have we lain supine! Assert at once and in unmistakable accents your supremacy! This is a Government of white men, for white men, and by white men. Let white men vote solidly for their rights and allow nothing to prevent the triumph of their principles! We have the means, and let us use them effectively! It is full time that our strength was felt! None but the blue-blooded should vote! See to it, you whose very existence is at stake, that none others do. In order to carry out the designs of the party the council orders that the independent clubs station a company at and about each polling place for the accomplishment of our purpose. Officers in charge will hold themselves in readiness at all times during the day and evening to act promptly upon all orders from the council.

By order of the COUNCIL OF SEVEN.

Now, sir, in addition to that the speakers and leaders of the Republican party, as well as the Republican newspapers circulated in the district, advised the Republicans not to go to the polls and vote. Why did they not go to the polls and vote? Was there any threat of disorder? Was there any violence?

Mr. HARDING. Will the gentleman let me ask him a question?

Mr. CARY. I cannot yield to the gentleman, as I have not the time.

Why did they not go to the polls and vote? It was certainly not on account of any intimidation. The ninety-three voters who voted for Mr. Menard did go to the polls, and they were not disturbed. There was no disorder at any poll in the district. They stayed away from the polls because the leaders of the Republican party advised them to stay away. As I have said ninety-three did vote for Mr. Menard; but the whole vote of the county was thrown out, and the certificate of election was given to Mr. Menard. Accompanying that certificate, however, is a certified statement from the Governor and secretary of State showing that the votes thrown out were illegally thrown out and that Mr. Hunt was legally elected.

It is perhaps unfortunate that the committee had before them at the same time the case of Jones against Mann and the case of Menard against Hunt, and gentlemen perhaps have had them mixed up in their minds. I now propose to refer for a moment or two to a passage in the report of the committee. It is as follows:

"Both candidates for the vacancy claiming to have been elected and entitled to the seat, neither has sought or desired to prove the election itself invalid or to urge any such objection to it, but on the contrary it is necessary for each to insist upon its validity in support of his claim to the vacant seat."

"This may in some degree account for the very slight showing that has been made by either party on the hearing of facts in relation to this election. There are some facts which appear in the evidence bearing upon this November election in the State of Louisiana to which your committee would now call attention. When Mr. Mann was elected the second district, as then constituted by the act of April 4, 1865, was wholly within the parish of Orleans, though not comprising the whole of said parish, and his aggregate vote was in April, 1868, 6,874, and the vote for Mr. Jones as returned was 5,634, besides 349 scattering votes given for other Republican candidates, making the aggregate vote opposed to Mr. Mann 5,983. At the late election in November, only a little over six months after, when under the act of August 22, 1868, other parishes were included in this district and a portion of the parish of Orleans, this portion of the parish of Orleans now in the district returns 11,535 votes for Mr. Hunt for both the Fortieth and Forty-first Congress, and but 93 votes for Mr. Menard for the Fortieth Congress, and 125 for Mr. Sheldon for the Forty-first Congress. The smallness and wonderful decrease of the Republican vote, the vastness and wonderful increase of the Democratic vote and its exact coincidence for both Congresses are all somewhat strange and not easily susceptible of satisfactory explanation on the theory of a fair and honest election."

The majority of the committee here admit there was but a slight showing made before the committee in relation to the election itself. It does not, however, appear in the evidence before the committee in this case of Hunt vs. Menard that anything was shown respecting the election beyond showing that it was duly held according to law, and therefore, in the absence of any objection to it, it is prima facie a valid election.

But as there were before the committee two contested cases for the same seat, arising out of two elections held at different times, the majority of the committee have, by comparison of votes cast at said elections at different times, attempted to get up some showing to the prejudice of the election contested between Hunt and Menard. An argument might be effectively sustained against the right of a committee, sitting for the hearing and adjudication of conflicting claims of contestants, to consider or act upon any question not in controversy between the parties nor presented to the notice of the committee by them; but it is hardly necessary to argue that point when by a few figures the immense deductions of the majority of the committee will dwindle down to common and ordinary results. The majority of the committee say that at the election of April, 1868, in the then second congressional district, the Democratic candidate, Mr. Mann, received 6,874 votes, and the Republican candidate received 5,983; and at the election here in question, held November 3, 1868, the Democratic candidate, Mr. Hunt, received 11,535, and the Republican candidate, Mr. Menard, received only 93 votes; and that the smallness and wonderful decrease of the Republican vote and the vastness and wonderful increase of the Democratic vote are somewhat strange and not easily susceptible of satisfactory explanation on the theory of a fair and honest election. If the majority of the committee had stated the premises right they would have had less reason for their wonderful surprise.

The district which gives Mr. Hunt the vote of 11,535 contains the eleventh ward in addition to the district which gave Mr. Mann his 6,874 votes. If the vote of that ward be taken off Mr. Hunt received a little over 9,000 votes against Mr. Mann's 6,874—a very small increase considering the different state of things at the two elections. At the election in April for the adoption of the constitution and the reorganizing of the State under the reconstruction laws it was well understood at the time that the Democratic party took but little interest in the election, and the vote cast at that election did not by any means show its strength; but at the election in November following, after the question of reconstruction became a foregone conclusion, the Democratic party, thoroughly organized and competing for the negro vote, very naturally and legitimately increased its vote. On the other hand the Republican party, with a full swing of opportunity and circumstances, not only went into the election in April with its entire white, but also virtually the entire negro vote.

But the vote cast in Mr. Mann's district in April, excepting the one precinct of the fourth ward, was larger than the vote cast in the same district at the November election, it being at the former election 12,522 and at the latter 10,041. The vote cast at the April election was seventy-eight per cent. of the registry, while the vote cast at the November election was but fifty-seven per cent. of the registry. These variations of the two elections are not the result of any fraud on the part of the Democratic party, as the majority of the committee intimate, but arise solely from the conduct of the Republican party, which at the November election, for reasons well understood, resolved to stay away from the polls and thus escape a direct defeat on the merits, to which the leaders foresaw the party was destined when they knew the result of the registry. Of course the opportunity which this stay-away policy afforded also to allege as the reason therefor that Republicans were threatened with violence and intimidated was availed of by the leaders to a degree not very creditable to their honor. I hold in my hand and read a circular concocted by the Republican managers and printed in the Republican newspaper office and sent to the houses of the negroes and read in their churches with the double purpose of frightening them into staying away from the polls and inducing the world to believe that such a necessity was forced upon them by the Democratic party, upon whom the circular was dishonestly charged.

Besides this circular, the Republican leaders publicly advised the Republicans not to go to the polls, which advice seems to have been generally followed, and then after the election we hear the untruthful reason for the small vote cast for their candidate that they were intimidated. Of course a voter has a right to stay away from the polls for any reason he pleases, truthful or untruthful, but the majority of the committee have no right to propose the invalidation of an election because voters did not choose to attend.

But further on the subject of intimidation, the majority of the committee should first have ascertained whether all the votes that might have been cast under the registry, but were not cast, would have been given for Mr. Menard, and second, if so cast for him whether he would thereby have received a majority in the district. These very essential questions appear not to have occurred to the majority of the committee, or else were not considered because the answers would not prove satisfactory.

It is demonstrated by the figures of the election that if every registered elector in Mr. Mann's old district, namely, the first, second, third, and one precinct of the fourth and tenth wards, who did not go to the polls and vote by reason of actual or imaginary intimidation and violence had gone to the polls and voted, as he could have done, for Mr. Menard, the majority in the district would still have been largely in favor of Mr. Hunt. In the face of such a result where is the justice or propriety of invalidating an election which would have had the same result whether influenced by intimidation or not?

But further, with what consistency can the House be expected to coincide with the proposition of the majority of the committee to hold the election of November 3 to have been no valid election, after the expression of the House by a vote of more than two to one to the contrary of such proposition. The election for electors of President, Vice President, and for Representatives in the Forty-First Congress, and for the filling of Mann's vacancy, was held under the same call, conducted under the same laws by the same officers, and the names of all the candidates combined upon one ticket; and yet, although the House has so pointedly and fully rejected the proposition of no valid election in the case of presidential electors, the majority of the Committee of Elections now propose that the House shall stultify itself by accepting and indorsing the proposition of no valid election in the case of another part of the same ticket.

But finally, it has been heretofore decided by Committees of Election and indorsed by the House that inquiring into questions of intimidation and other reasons for loss of votes at an election constitutes no proper or legitimate duty of the Committee of Elections in cases of contested elections. (See case No. 54, vol. 1, Contested Elections. Biddle & Richards vs. Wing.) And again, it has been held judicially, and also by the Committee of Elections, that violence of riot or otherwise, though intimidation of voters be thereby effected and they induced to forego voting, does not constitute ground for invalidating an election. (See Baltimore cases.)

Mr. KERR. Mr. Speaker, in this case my own convictions as to the duty of the House are very clear, and I am glad to be able to say that they have been arrived at without any reference to "distinctions of race or color." [Laughter.] It is assumed by the majority of the committee as one of the grounds upon which they have arrived at their conclusions that there existed in this election district in Louisiana such a condition of public confusion, disorder, intimidation, lawlessness, and crime as that this House is called upon to take judicial notice of the existence of these facts without their being placed in this record in any legal way by any of the parties to this contest. Now, I submit with great confidence that if honorable gentlemen will look into the evidence here, and will inquire even as to that public rumor about disorder, they will not consider this position tenable in any respect. It is a most dangerous position to assume in connection with any case of this kind.

A legislative body sitting in a judicial capacity—and we are now sitting in that capacity—should never assume facts to exist unless those facts come to the knowledge of that judicial body in some record form, in some lawful way. When my colleague on the committee who has charge of this case [Mr. UPSON] was disposing of the case of Jones vs. Mann, he very justly assumed that these charges of intimidation and fraud ought never to be lightly entertained—never upon mere assumption, mere newspaper allegations, or letters of correspondents, or anything of the kind, but that they should be placed in the records of the case in the form of legal testimony. But when my friend comes to dispose of this branch of the case he entirely forgets his own law and the precedents of this House. The precedents of this House, even in cases which have arisen in the course of our late unfortunate war, wholly fail to justify the position assumed by my colleague who manages this case. Those precedents, on the contrary, show that it has been the uniform practice of the House, where there have been allegations of general disturbances, to require proof of those allegations to be regularly incorporated into the record made up in the case by the parties.

That was done in the case from Tennessee; that was done in the case from Virginia; and in every instance the House has always required that proof of those things, if they do exist, shall be put on record. Why should not that be done? Are not such facts as susceptible of legal proof by witnesses or by record as any other facts that may tend to determine what shall be done in a case like this? There is nothing in the circumstances of this case, there is nothing in the conduct of the community that composes this second district of Louisiana, there is nothing in the history of the times, there is nothing anywhere to show or that tends to show that any one of these parties could not by legal testimony have put upon the record here such facts as would precisely indicate the degree of intimidation or violence or lawlessness or fear or anything else that tended to make this anything but an ordinary election. Nothing of this kind was done. But now we are called upon to assume that it has all been done, and upon that assumption and without any evidence to act. I hope, Mr. Speaker, that this House will tolerate no such precedent as that, will set no such example as this for its own future guidance or for the guidance of parties in future contests.

One of the main positions assumed by the majority in their report, upon which they hope to deny the seat in this case to both of these parties, is that the election was not held within the proper territorial limits; that the election should have been held in the old second district and not in the new one; and that because it was held in the new and not in the old district therefore this House should declare that no election was ever held there, and that the seat is still vacant, and send the whole subject back to the people of that district. This position is held mainly on the assumption that if we allow the new district to elect a member to this House a part at least of his constituency may be then represented in this House by two or more members of Congress. Now, I submit that in that reasoning there is no strength, that it is entirely without foundation; and a few reflections, it appears to me, will make abundantly clear my position that this election could have been legally held nowhere but in the new second district of the State of Louisiana. When the State of Louisiana, having the constitutional power to do so, and being the only possessor of that power except the Congress, undertook to change these congressional districts in the State of Louisiana, and did make that change by a valid law of the State, then I submit to every gentleman upon this floor the old districts in fact and in law ceased to exist, and none of them exist to-day.

Sir, the same thing was done in my own State. My own district, since I was elected to this Congress, by a competent and constitutional law of the State of Indiana, has been changed, most materially changed in its territorial limits. But does it follow that I am not the Representative of the new district here? Certainly it does not. I represent, not the eight counties which constituted my old district, but I represent to-day the ten counties which constitute my new district, because now there is no other second district in my State. So it is with every gentleman here, the territorial limits of whose district have been changed. It is competent for the Legislature of a State at any time to change the congressional districts, and when they are changed the preceding law is repealed, the preceding territorial divisions cease to exist, and the men who were before elected stand then as the Representatives respectively of the new districts, and so it is with the gentlemen from the State of Louisiana.

But it is said that if we allow this proposition to be held as good law it follows, then, that some men in this district might be allowed to vote more than once for a member of Congress. That is often the case. There is on the floor of this House to-day a Representative from the State of Illinois who was elected by the votes of the constituents of every other member on this floor from that State. He has no separate constituency of his own. And it would be competent for all the States of this Union, if Congress had not assumed jurisdiction over the subject to that extent, to declare that each one of their Representatives in Congress should be elected by the voters of the entire State, and not simply by the voters of a single district. It is also true that if this law had never been changed, and the vacancy left by the death of Colonel Mann had been left to be filled by the voters of his old district, even then all of those legal electors in the State of Louisiana who, after his election and before his death, or before the election to fill his vacancy, had removed into that district, having theretofore voted in other districts, would still be exercising the second time their right to vote for members of Congress. I submit, therefore, that this election could not have been legally held anywhere except in the second district as constituted under the new law. That new law by its very terms expressly repeals the preëxisting law. The election, therefore, could have been legally held under no other law than the new law. Such was the decision of this House in the old case of Perkins vs. Morrison, (2 Contested-Election Cases, p. 145), from New Hampshire, in the Thirty-First Congress, and there has been no contrary precedent in our history. And there was not needed any previous declaration by this House that there existed a vacancy in that district. The people of that district and the Governor of the State of Louisiana were required in that case to take notice that their previous Representative had died. An election in the new congressional district was called under the forms of law, and the election was held according to law. And at that election Caleb S. Hunt received an overwhelming majority of all the votes cast for member of Congress to supply that vacancy. As to the number of votes received by Mr. Hunt, I shall devote but very little time to the consideration of that matter, because the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. CARY] has already very fully and yet very forcibly and succinctly referred to that part of the case, and in my judgment has triumphantly disposed of it against the report of the majority of the committee. The palpable and most important fact, then, remains that without any reference whatever to the change in the territorial limits of the old second congressional district Caleb S. Hunt has received an immense majority of the votes whether you take into consideration the old district or the new one. Consider the matter in any light in which you can consider it in view of the facts in this case, and he is elected by a very large majority over the other candidate.

It is true that even if you go back and take the original registry, either in the old district or in the new district, and determine the merits of this contest on that registration alone, and assume that every man who was registered did in fact vote, and that every man who is not returned as having voted for Caleb S. Hunt did in fact vote for J. W. Menard, even then Caleb S. Hunt is elected; because of the whole number registered he received a clear majority. On what grounds of justice or of law, then, can this House say that he shall not now be permitted to take his seat here? He is elected; Mr. Menard is not elected. Mr. Hunt has received the indorsement of the people of the district.

Admit, if you please, that there were violence and fraud and intimidation, and give to Mr. Menard the full benefit of all those assumptions, still Mr. Hunt is elected, still he has a majority of all the votes cast, still the people of the second district of Louisiana say that they want him and not Mr. Menard for their Representative. Consider for a moment the facts and figures: when Mr. Mann was elected, the second congressional district was entirely within the parish of Orleans, and comprised the whole of the first, second, third, one precinct of the fourth, and the whole of the tenth wards of the city of New Orleans. At the election November 3, to fill the vacancy, the portion of the second district within the parish of Orleans comprised the first, second, third, tenth, and eleventh wards of the city of New Orleans, the precinct of the fourth ward having been, by the change of the district, taken from and the eleventh ward added to the district. The votes returned from the parish of Orleans at the recent election to fill the vacancy were, therefore, cast by the electors of the original second congressional district, except those cast in the eleventh ward, which had been added to the district since the election of Mr. Mann; and the whole number of votes so cast and returned from the parish of Orleans was 11,628—for Caleb S. Hunt, 11,535; for J. W. Menard, 93. If from these figures be taken, as should be, the number cast for each candidate by electors of the eleventh ward, the result would show exactly the vote of the original second district, excepting the single precinct of the fourth ward which did not vote. It is not known precisely from any testimony before the committee what number of votes were cast for the candidates, respectively, in the eleventh ward; but from an authentic copy of the registry record the number of electors registered in the eleventh ward was 2,785. As the votes cast might have equaled but could not have exceeded the registry it may be assumed that the number of votes cast in the eleventh ward was 2,785; and if that number be deducted wholly from the 11,535 shown to have been cast for Mr. Hunt, he will then have received from the electors of Mann's original district 8,748, and a majority of 8,655 over Mr. Menard. In the single precinct of the fourth ward, originally belonging to Mann's district, no vote to fill the vacancy was taken, in consequence of the precinct having been taken from the second district; but if a vote had been taken in that precinct the general result would have been affected but little either way, because, as shown by the late election, the entire vote of that precinct did not exceed 600; and if it be all taken from the vote given to Mr. Hunt it only slightly reduces his majority.

It has been shown the law of Louisiana required that the returns of the votes cast at the election in question in each parish should be made by the supervisors of registration of the parish to the secretary of State.

It has been shown, by admission of the board of State canvassers, that the returns of the votes cast in that part of the parish of Orleans comprised within the second congressional district were made by the supervisors of registration thereof, appointed under an act, No. 92, approved September 19, 1868, providing for additional supervisors of registration, whose duty and authority that board of State canvassers consider limited to registration, and extended to making returns of election.

It has been shown that by a subsequent act, No. 164, approved October 19, 1868, it is expressly made the duty of the supervisors of registration to make returns of election.

It has been shown that the votes so returned by the supervisors of registration in the parish of Orleans, as cast at that election to fill that vacancy, were for Caleb S. Hunt 11,535, and for J. W. Menard 93.

Therefore, from what has thus been shown, in my judgment the returns made of the votes cast in the parish of Orleans are in law and fact competent returns, and were improperly rejected from computation by the State canvassers, and that the votes should be computed with the votes of the three parishes, namely, Lafourche, St. Charles, and St. James, which were computed as I have stated.

If that be done, then the aggregate number of votes returned and computed from those parishes, namely, Lafourche, St. Charles, St. James, and Orleans, will be for Caleb S. Hunt 14,368, and for J. W. Menard 5,201—a majority for Hunt of 9,167 votes.

In view of such result I deem it unnecessary to consider the objections made by the State canvassers in respect to the returns from the three remaining parishes, namely, Jefferson, St. John the Baptist, and Terrebonne; for if the votes from those parishes be computed the final result from the whole district would be but very slightly changed, and a large majority would still remain in favor of Mr. Hunt.

But it has been suggested by Mr. Menard himself, not I believe by my colleague on the committee, that he should be allowed to take his seat at least primarily until further investigation, because Mr. Hunt never served upon him a legal, proper, formal notice of contest. I will therefore beg the attention of gentlemen to that subject for a minute or two. In the outset, I concede for the purposes of the argument that no such notice was served in this case by Mr. Hunt upon Mr. Menard. But what was done, and done with all the publicity and notoriety and formality that can accompany such an act, is upon the record and is exhibited in the reports of the majority and minority of the committee. It consists in the presentation to this House of the certificate of the Governor of Louisiana setting forth all the facts connected with that election, making a specific return of all votes cast, which certicate, together with the facts and returns, shows that the certificate issued by the Governor to Mr. Menard was unlawfully issued; that it ought never to have been issued; that it was issued upon illegal and false assumptions; that it was issued without authority of law; that it was issued in violation of the express and conceded will of the people of that district, and to accomplish a partisan end to keep out of this Hall Mr. Hunt, whom the people desired to represent them here.

Now, let gentlemen look at these returns. Let them look at Mr. Menard's certificate, and then at Mr. Hunt's certificate, which is full and complete, setting forth all the facts material to a fair and just judgment on the part of the House in this case. Let it also be remembered, Mr. Speaker, that we need in this case no facts that are not placed upon our record to enable us to decide this question upon its merits, its broad, clear, unquestionable merits. We do not need any outside testimony; we do not need to listen to the statements of witnesses; we do not need to look into the records which are deposited in the offices in the parish of Orleans; we do not need to examine the vote in any other parishes. All those things may be dismissed from consideration, because in this certificate of the Governor of Louisiana are set forth all the material facts which it is necessary for us to understand in order to decide this case properly and legally.

It also appears when we compare this second certificate given to Mr. Hunt by the Governor with the law of Louisiana, of which we may take judicial notice; of which we must, and in such cases always do, take judicial notice, we find that the votes which were rejected in the parish of Orleans by the board of canvassers were unlawfully rejected. The majority of the committee so find; the minority so find. It is conceded on all hands that the rejection of the votes in the parish of Orleans was irregular and unlawful, and ought never to have been made. Now, give Mr. Hunt the benefit of those rejected votes so far as they were cast for him; give Mr. Menard the benefit of them so far as they were cast for him, and still Mr. Hunt is triumphantly elected.

But I submit further that every precinct that was rejected by the board of canvassers was rejected without authority of law; contrary to law; contrary to all the precedents that have governed cases of this kind in the past history of Congress. It is an established principle of law in cases of contested elections, not only in Congress, but in the States of this Union, that wherever there has been a neglect on the part of the returning officers or the canvassing officers to comply literally with the merely directory provisions of the statute such neglect shall not work injury to anybody; that the votes shall be received and counted; that the parties shall have the benefit of them for whomsoever they are cast. In every case of contested elections the one great question to be determined, the one point of supreme importance to be ascertained by the House, sitting as judges, is, who has received the majority of votes of the legal electors of the district; whom do the people want to represent them; for whom have the majority of voters legally cast their votes? The fact that some officers may have made an artificial or somewhat informal return should not affect the substantial interests of the parties to that election.

In uniform harmony with these views there is a long and unbroken course of decisions both by this House and in all the courts of last resort in our country.

Since the passage of the act of 1851 regarding contested elections the rulings and decisions of the Committee of Elections, sustained by the House, in respect to the construction and application of its provisions and the practice thereunder, have been most liberal in regard to the personal rights of contestants and the constitutional rights of constituencies and the rights and powers of the House as involved more or less in every case of contested election. (See case of Wright vs. Fuller, Contested Elections, vol. 2, p. 154.) The committee say:

"The intention of the law requiring this notice to be given was to prevent any surprise being practiced, and to put the sitting member upon a proper defense."

Also, case of Daily vs. Estabrook, (vol. 2, p. 304,) the committee say:

"All the act of 1851 contemplates it is fair notice of the subject-matter of contest within the time specified by the act itself; as the sitting member has had such notice, in the opinion of the committee, he has no ground for complaint."

Also, case of Williamson vs. Sickles, (vol. 2, p. 290,) the committee say:

"The committee do not consider the law of 1851 as of absolute binding force upon this House, for by the Constitution 'each House shall be the judge of the election, returns, and qualifications of its own members,' and no previous House and Senate can judge for them."

Again, same case, page 291:

"But the constituency has a greater interest than all others in this question. The rights of the electors of the third congressional district of New York are involved in this controversy, and should not be compromised by any laches, if any exist, for which they are not responsible. It is of more consequence that their voice should have expression here through their lawfully-elected representative, whoever he may be, than that this or that man should enjoy the emoluments or honors of the office."

Also, case of Vallandigham vs. Campbell, (vol. 2, p. 280,) the committee say:

"Neither the committee nor the House is bound by the usual rules and principles of evidence, but should proceed upon more liberal principles in the investigation of truth. They regard a contested election not as a mere private litigation, but a great public inquiry, where the real parties are not so much the returned member and the contestant as the voters of the district."

Also, case of Chapman vs. Ferguson, (vol. 2, p. 268,) the committee say:

"The question to solve is not what these parties have done or omitted to do, but what was the expressed wish of the people of Nebraska as between these candidates at their late election."

It is not Mr. Hunt alone, it is not Mr. Hunt chiefly who is interested in this question. His interest here, in a personal sense I mean, is very much narrowed down. Indeed I may say it amounts to nothing in comparison with the great right of representation which belongs to and inheres in the people of this country. In this instance it belongs to and is the property of the people of this second district of Louisiana. They, and not Mr. Hunt, appear at the bar of this House and demand at our hands righteous judgment in favor of the supremacy of the majority and the maintenance of the right in this great matter of representation. I submit, therefore, Mr. Speaker, that it is a point entirely immaterial to the right decision of this case whether the notice served by Mr. Hunt on Mr. Menard was informal or was not complete. The great fact remains—and gentlemen ought to remember that the great and conclusive fact remains—that Mr. Menard and Mr. Hunt both acted under that notice, both regarding it as legal and proper. They appeared before the Committee of Elections and presented their case and left it with the committee for their adjudication. Are we to be told that on account of a little omission on the part of Mr. Hunt to give Mr. Menard a formal notice of contest, which could have elicited no new testimony or brought forward no new fact, that the House is to insist upon deciding this question on immaterial points? Shall we therefore ignore the manifest justice of the case, ourselves do a great wrong, because another has omitted a mere formal duty, and render a judgment which no testimony in existence or procurable by these parties can justify? I hope not. Such conduct cannot promote the public welfare and would justly subject this House to severe criticism.

I now yield to the gentleman from Vermont.

Mr. POLAND. I desire to offer a substitute for the resolutions of the majority of the committee.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the reported resolutions of the Committee of Elections upon the contested election in the second congressional district of Louisiana be submitted to said committee, with directions to take testimony in reference to the validity of the election in said district, held on the 3d day of November, 1868, and especially as to any improper or any unlawful means used to prevent a fair and free election.

Mr. POLAND. It may be said with truth that the proposition to have this case recommit- ted to the committee for the purpose of having an inquiry and testimony taken in relation to the validity of the election in this case comes at a very late period of the session; that we are so near the close of the session it will be impracticable for the committee to take testimony on that subject and report their conclusions for this Congress to act on. I admit that is entirely true, that it cannot be done; but I move this resolution for the purpose of disposing of this case without deciding upon the questions which the committee have themselves endeavored to decide in their report, and upon which they ask this House to decide in the resolution they have reported. By the report and the resolution the committee have reported they do not propose to give a seat to anybody, they do not propose to take away a seat from anybody, but to say there has been no valid election and no one elected to fill the vacancy occasioned by the death of Mr. Mann, who was legally elected to represent the second district of Louisiana. Therefore the result of a recommitment of the case will be practically the same as if we passed the resolution reported by the committee, and at the same time it will save the House from falling into the dilemma of making what I consider an unsafe and unsound precedent if we take the action which they ask us to take in this case.

If Mr. Menard came here with a certificate from the Governor in due form I should agree with the gentleman from Ohio that gave him a prima facie right to a seat. If the House had said he was entitled to take his seat on that certificate until the contest was determined I should have said they did entirely right, but it would have been contrary to the precedents established in this Congress from the first day down to the present. Almost the very first thing that happened in this Congress was a contest in relation to the seat of a Delegate from Colorado, and this House solemnly decided in that case that the man who had a certificate from the Governor, (who is the person entitled by law to give it,) and that certificate being conceded to be in due form of law, was not prima facie entitled to a seat.

Mr. PAINE. Will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. POLAND. I have only fifteen minutes.

Mr. PAINE. I do not ask more than half a minute.

Mr. POLAND. I cannot yield at all. So that I say in this case we have followed the precedent that we have established during the whole of this session of Congress.

Now, what are the facts in this case as reported by the committee? Although Mr. Menard came here with the certificate from the Governor, the committee say that counting all the votes in that district that were given, the other man who claims the seat, Mr. Hunt, was elected by nearly 10,000 majority. These votes were rejected by the Governor and secretary of State who counted them upon the ground that they were not returns by the proper officers. Both the majority and minority of the committee agree that the Governor made an entire mistake and blunder when he threw out these votes upon the grounds he did—that they were not properly returned. The committee, both the majority and minority, say that the certificate of election should have been given by the Governor to Mr. Hunt; so that he should have been here with the prima facie paper in his pocket, and should have been admitted to take his seat, leaving the other man to be the contestant. But notwithstanding this the committee say, and ask the House to say, that neither of these men was entitled to the seat. Why? Upon the ground that there was no valid election of anybody. In the first place they say that the district which voted for these two men was no district that had a right to fill a vacancy. Why? Upon the ground that its territorial limits had been changed since the election of the original member, Mr. Mann.

Now, I know of no other precedent upon this subject than the one that has been cited from the State of New Hampshire, and the decision in that case was directly the other way. The authority that my friend from Michigan, [Mr. UPSON,] the organ of the committee in this case, cited from that case was the minority report. I remember once getting pretty severely rebuked in a court for having cited the opinion of the minority as being good law. In this case the majority of the committee rely for their authority upon this question upon the minority of a committee of this House, which was not supported by the decision of the House, that made the report in the case from New Hampshire. I agree that in a case like this, where the limits were very considerably changed, where a considerable portion of the present district at the time of the original election belonged to another, there seems to be some incongruity.

But suppose there is a single township set from one district to another, does it prevent either of these districts from filling a vacancy if one occurs during the period for which the man was elected? It seems to me to be entirely clear, as was suggested by the gentleman from Ohio, that unless the Legislature make provision by law that the old district shall continue and that the new districting shall not take effect until some future day, that the old district cannot fill the vacancy; and if a new district cannot do it, it cannot be filled at all. I consider it clear that an election to Congress, whether an original election or to fill a vacancy, must be by an existing congressional district and cannot be done by a district which has ceased to exist, and cannot be participated in by any part of its territory which has ceased to be a part of it. At any rate, however this may be, whichever side may have the weight of argument upon this question, it does not seem to me wise for this House to retrace its steps and reverse its former decision upon any such consideration as we are able to give to the subject now. And it is for the very purpose of preventing the establishment of what I deem to be an unsound precedent upon this subject that I shall ask the House to adopt my substitute, which will achieve all that the committee ask practically in this case without subjecting ourselves to the danger and dilemma of establishing a very bad precedent on this subject.

Mr. Speaker, there is another ground upon which the majority of the committee recommend the adoption of their resolution that neither of these claimants is entitled to the seat. They say that if there was a legal district to make an election to fill this vacancy there was no legal election held in it. Why? They say there was such fraud and violence and intimidation in the district that there was not a free and fair election. Now, there are two objections to that. In the first place, there was no allegation of that kind before the committee by anybody. Nobody alleged it and nobody proved it. Not only was there no allegation on the subject, but there was no proof on the subject. The law in relation to contested elections in Congress puts them upon an analogy with private suits. The law requires that there shall be pleadings. It provides carefully how these pleadings are to be made up to make an issue, and then it provides carefully how and in what time proof shall be taken upon the respective sides to support the affirmative and negative of that issue. It is just as true in relation to a contested election as it is to a suit at law that it is to be determined secundum allegata et probata.

Here we have no issue of that kind before the committee or before the House. We have no proof upon this question before the committee or before the House. Now, what is the proof that the committee have appended to their report? Why, there are two letters from Governor Warmoth to Senator KELLOGG, and one letter from General Buchanan—mere private letters, not even equal to an ex parte affidavit. They are private letters, and they are not official communications either. To be sure, the gentleman who wrote two of them is said to be a Governor, and the one who wrote the other was a general, and they all, I believe, purport to have been written to a Senator. But they are not in any legal sense official communications at all. They are mere private letters. They are of no more authority than if I were to write a private letter making a statement about an election to my friend from Pennsylvania, [Mr. WILLIAMS.] The writers of these letters may be very respectable and worthy gentlemen and entitled to credit, but I do not know that their word is to be taken in a court or in any proceeding where the law requires the proof to be under oath any more than if they were mere private persons; and in these latter days it would not go so far toward helping a witness in court to be a Governor or a Senator as it would at some time, I think, in the history of the Republic. [Laughter.] I quite agree that there is enough in these communications upon which to start an inquiry. There is enough in them to justify this House in directing the committee to inquire into this and to take testimony upon the subject. But I say that these letters, these communications, are not of themselves anything upon which the committee had any right to act as testimony or upon which we have any right to act as testimony. We may send them to the committee and order them to make inquiry and to report in reference to it.

But there is another ground upon which I object to this. These letters say that at the election in Louisiana there was violence, disturbance, intimidation, and that the people could not vote freely and fairly as they desired to. But that did not apply to this district any more than to the rest of the State. It will be borne in mind that this election was upon the very same day, a part of the very same election at which electors were voted for in that State, and the question was raised before this House, and this House solemnly decided by a large majority that it was a legal and valid election and that the electoral votes of that State should be counted, and they were counted. And we had then before us this public history; we had then the same documents; we had possession of all the facts when we voted in reference to the presidential election and its validity that we have before us now in reference to this election. If, now, this House is to stand by this resolution that has been reported by the majority of the committee and say there was no legal and valid election in this district in consequence of intimidation and violence, we are thrown directly back upon our vote which we gave in reference to the electoral vote of that State, and the two decisions will stand in direct conflict with each other.

And therefore the object of asking to have this recommitted to the committee is to get us out of that dilemma. Besides, I would not establish a bad precedent in relation to this change of district. I would not have this House go back upon its record in relation to the validity of the election that was held in the second district of Louisiana on the 8d day of November last. Hence I say, Mr. Speaker, as the action which the majority of the committee propose to the House will give a seat to nobody, will take away a seat from nobody, it is just as safe for the House and will accomplish practically the same result to recommit this subject to the committee as if we should adopt the resolution reported by the majority.

Mr. PAINE. I move to amend the substitute of the gentleman from Vermont by adding the following:

Provided, That J. Willis Menard, holding the certificate from the Governor of the State of Louisiana that he was duly elected as a Representative from the second district of that State, be admitted to a seat in this House pending the consideration of the case.

Mr. Speaker, upon the resolution of the committee and the pending amendments I call the previous question.

Mr. COOK. I would like to offer a substitute for the resolution of the committee.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Wisconsin yield for that purpose?

Mr. PAINE. I cannot yield.

Mr. UPSON. I rise to a point of order, that the amendment of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. PAINE] is not germane to the resolution.

The SPEAKER. The Chair overrules the point of order. The opening sentence of the report in this case reads as follows:

"The Committee of Elections, to whom were referred the petition and papers on behalf of Simon Jones, claiming to have been elected a Representative in the present Congress from the second congressional district of Louisiana, and contesting the right of James Mann to his seat in this House as such Representative from said district; and also the credentials of J. Willis Menard, and the protest and papers of Caleb S. Hunt, each claiming to have been elected a Representative in Congress from said district to fill the vacancy claimed to have been caused by the death of said James Mann, submit the following report."

It thus appears that this branch of the report is based upon the papers presented by J. Willis Menard and Caleb S. Hunt, and therefore, in the opinion of the Chair, anything relating to the right of either of these gentlemen to a seat is in order.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. UPSON] is now entitled to an hour to close the debate.

Mr. UPSON. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SHELLABARGER] desires to be heard in this case. I yield to him ten minutes.

Mr. SHELLABARGER. Mr. Speaker, I would not have sought to say anything about this case did I not apprehend that on account of the novelty of some of the circumstances by which we are surrounded there is danger of our making in this case a precedent that will some time come back to greatly plague us. It is the first time in the history of the Republic when that race which has been for centuries trodden upon by that greatest wrong of modern civilization, slavery, comes here in the person of one of its members and asks that he be admitted to take his place among the law-makers of that Republic which has so long been his oppressor. It is with the most profound regret, I assure you, that I here, in the last hours of my relations with this Congress, am compelled by a sense of duty to refrain from casting my vote, as it would have been my extreme pleasure to cast it, in favor of giving a seat among the law-makers to one of this class of my fellow-countrymen. This inclination of mine thus to vote is I know shared by a large proportion of my fellow-members; and I repeat the expression of my regret that it so happens that in this first instance, and because the first one, one which is to be historical, in which is presented the claim of this race to take its place among those who as part of the people are in part to control the destinies of the country, I am constrained to the belief that it is not wise for us to grant to this claimant the seat.

I shall not go into the discussion of the merits of the case, because I cannot and ought not, as they have been so carefully stated and so well already; but there are just two considerations which seem to me to be absolutely conclusive. One is a consideration which points directly to the proposition submitted by my friend from Wisconsin, [Mr. PAINE.] He would have Mr. Menard sworn in on a prima facie title during the time his contest is to be pending. I should like even to do that if it were right and safe to do so.

Why is not it safe and wise to do so? Mr. Speaker, the answer is just this. There is in the law which controls the primary organization of each House no prima facie case, except that one which controls the Clerk in making up of the roll of the House of Representatives. What is that? In making up the roll of the House of Representatives for the purpose of starting into operation the machinery and powers of each successive Congress, that is a prima facie case, and entitles a claimant to a seat which comes up to the requirements of the act of Congress. This I read, as follows:

"By the act of the second session, Thirty-Ninth Congress, (Session Laws, p. 28,) it is provided:

"That before the first meeting of the next Congress, and of every subsequent Congress, the Clerk of the next preceding House of Representatives shall make a roll of the Representatives-elect, and place thereon the names of all persons claiming seats as Representatives-elect from States which were represented in the next preceding Congress, and of such persons only, and whose credentials show that they were regularly elected in accordance with the laws of their States respectively or the laws of the United States."

Now, Mr. Speaker, the claimant had once that sort of a title to a seat in this House. I state it distinctly and expressly that for the purpose of making up the roll of this House, in the absence of any other evidence than his certificate, he ought to be permitted to participate in the organization of the House and to take his seat here to-day. That I distinctly admit. That being admitted, why do I not favor the proposition of the gentleman from Wisconsin and insist upon Mr. Menard now being sworn in? Mr. Speaker, it is that very same reason upon which you and I and every Republican in this House have again and again acted in refusing to recognize just such prima facie titles, namely, that there are such facts brought to our knowledge in regard to certain of the reconstructed States, and touching the elections therein, that we are demanded by the public safety to take notice of them as historic facts, and to decline to accept such certificates as is usually done. It is upon his knowledge of these historic events that the Clerk of the House of Representatives acts in refusing to enroll certain claimants of seats, and because of these events he ought not, as I trust he will not, place upon the rolls of the Forty-First Congress the name of any man claiming to hold a prima facie title to a seat from the State of Louisiana. Why do I make that remark? Because in that election there were occurrences of which we have not only the right, but which by every principle of congressional as well as common law we are bound to take notice of, and which being noticed destroy that prima facie title. Why they must be noticed is just because they are historical and affect the very being and existence of the Government. Such events need never to be pleaded or proved, and are ever taken notice of by the Parliament. Those facts being taken notice of, then the question comes to us was that a legal election in Louisiana, or was it one which should bind the House of Representatives or its Clerk in making up the rolls for the next Congress to treat each certificate which that election brought into existence as prima facie good? If the proposition of my excellent friend from Wisconsin should prevail and we are to deal with that election—monstrous, cruel, infamous as it was—as a thing having significance and validity enough to make its creations a prima facie title to membership in this House, then we might so treat, in the absence of all other evidence, the certificate of Mr. Menard, which he derives from that election. But, sir, if not, if that election in Louisiana was so monstrous in its wrongs as against the free suffrages of the people as to authorize and require that the Republican Clerk of this House shall not enter upon the rolls of the Forty-First Congress our political opponents who hold certificates just like and as good as this of Mr. Menard's, and this because the election was not an election but a farce or a massacre, then how shall we treat it as a good election for Menard and as giving him a prima facie title?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. UPSON. I will yield to the gentleman until he concludes his remarks.

Mr. SHELLABARGER. We cannot, if we mean to be as we will be consistent to principle, consistent in that fair play which principle always vindicates and demands, we cannot accord prima facie title to the gentleman claiming a seat from Louisiana, as being conferred by such an election as that, and yet withhold that prima facie title held in the certificates of other gentlemen coming from Louisiana, and say that theirs shall not entitle them equally with him. Thus much with regard to Louisiana. But, sir, you have again and again, actuated by this same principle to which I have appealed, said that we may rightly take notice of historical events in the disposing of this prima facie application for seats in the House. We have, I say, in assertion of that principle again and again required the certificates showing, equally with this certificate, a prima facie title to be referred to the Committee of Elections, and have had their report upon the known historic facts before they took their seats. It is because of that, sir, that it is now wise, I submit to my friend, to dispose of this case upon the principle to which this House has so properly again and again appealed; and upon which it has rested the disposition of this very important question.

Mr. PAINE. I ask my friend to give me the floor for a single question.

Mr. SHELLABARGER. Certainly.

Mr. PAINE. The gentleman has referred to the law regulating the entry of the names of members on the roll in the organization of the House. He stated that that was the only law applicable to a case like this. Now, that law was passed, as he and I well remember, at the second session of the Thirty-Ninth Congress. Now, the question I want to ask him is this: has it not always been the recognized law of this House that the certificate of the Governor of a State gives to the person claiming to be elected a prima facie right to a seat here?

Mr. SHELLABARGER. Most certainly. I not only admit it but I stated it and insisted upon it.

Mr. PAINE. My friend misunderstands me. The question is whether this certificate of the Governor of the State has been regarded as constituting a prima facie right which would entitle the Clerk to enter the name of the member, or the person claiming to be such, on the roll upon the opening of the first session of Congress; and whether it has not been the established rule of the House from the commencement of the Government down to the enactment of that law, and since, that the credentials thus furnished by the Governor to a member constitute his prima facie right to a seat on this floor—not merely to have his name placed on the roll, but to take his seat on the floor?

Mr. SHELLABARGER. I will answer my friend so far as my information goes, and if I am wrong I may be corrected by my friend, the chairman of the Committee of Elections. The party holding a certificate which the law of his State made the evidence of his election, whatever that may be, whether a certificate from a Governor or something else, is entitled not only to be enrolled by the Clerk, but to be sworn in in the absence of objections. I believe that is an answer. And all that I have said hitherto before the question was put to me was directed to this single proposition, which I did desire to remind gentlemen of, that in dealing with the case of Louisiana, and every other case where there were such historical facts brought to the notice of the Government itself and of its Congress, experience has shown it to be unsafe to adhere to the practice to which the gentleman appeals, and have adopted the practice, and have referred in such cases such prima facie titles to the Committee of Elections. That is my answer. I now yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts for a question if he desires it.

Mr. DAWES. The gentleman has answered the question I wished to propound. I will add, however, that in the memory of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. PAINE] this present Congress has referred, time and again, the prima facie evidence of which he speaks to the Committee of Elections, pending the examination upon the merits without admitting the gentleman to his seat. Five gentlemen, bringing prima facie evidence to this Congress from the Governor of Kentucky, were not permitted to take their seats until the Committee of Elections reported upon their cases.

A MEMBER. What is the rule about a member taking a seat upon a prima facie certificate when objection is made?

Mr. DAWES. The rule seems to be this: when objection is made to a man's being sworn in upon the presentation of his certificate the House will look at the character of that objection, and if in the opinion of the House it is frivolous they will admit him to his seat and proceed to the examination of the case. If in the opinion of the House it is a serious charge, made in good faith, then it has always been the precedent to refer the prima facie case to the committee. But this single point my friend from Wisconsin [Mr. PAINE] seems to overlook, that in this case we have referred not only the prima facie case but the merits altogether to the Committee of Elections, and the Committee of Elections having passed upon the merits the prima facie case passes out of sight. There is no longer any prima facie case before the House. The case is now before the House upon its merits. Mr. Menard presented his credentials here at the commencement of the session, and if my friend had moved then that he be sworn in as having the prima facie right to the seat it might have been proper; but instead of that the House directed the committee to take all the papers and examine into the merits. The merits are now before the House and the prima facie case has passed out of sight. How can you pass on the prima facie case when the merits are before the House?

Mr. PAINE. With the permission of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SHELLABARGER] I will read from the Journal on the very point referred to by the gentleman from Massachusetts to show him that he is mistaken and that I am right on this point. I read from the Journal of December 18, 1868:

"Mr. SYPHER presented the credentials of J. Willis Menard as a member of this House from the State of Louisiana, to fill the vacancy occasioned by the death of James Mann; which were referred to the Committee of Elections."

And that is the whole of it. Now, he could not have been sworn in then because it was not yet decided whether there was a vacancy or whether Mr. Jones was entitled to the seat, and never until this very hour has there been an opportunity, as my friend from Massachusetts must well know, for this claimant to avail himself of his right to sit here under the prima facie letter given him by the Governor's certificate.

Mr. SHELLABARGER. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Massachusetts, the chairman of the Committee of Elections, has stated the balance of my speech in the remarks which he has made. I am about now to surrender the floor with this additional statement, and it is a reply to the suggestion made by the gentleman from Wisconsin. It is insisted by the gentleman from Wisconsin that we shall now, at this moment, swear in upon the prima facie case, as he calls it, a man who is shown by a report made in obedience to the order of the House not to be entitled to be sworn in at all. Just keep that in mind, and it does seem to me that all question as to what is proper must disappear.

Mr. NORRIS. I would ask the gentleman if his argument would not have led to the rejection of the electoral vote of Louisiana?

Mr. SHELLABARGER. I answer my friend from Alabama no. I cannot go further, because I am holding the floor by the courtesy of another, and I must surrender it. Besides, his question has no very apparent logical connection with what I am now talking about except such connection as I will explain and answer as I proceed, if I have time. I say this in all kindness to my friend.

I was saying that you are asked now to vote to admit Mr. Menard to his seat upon the prima facie title when you have before you the report of the committee whom you have instructed to examine the question of his real title, and that committee has made its report under your order and that report is that he has not a prima facie title. At the very instant when you are swearing in upon a pretended prima facie title this House knows, by a report made on its own order and by unquestioned documentary evidence, that there is no longer either a prima facie or a real title. Both have been swept away. Sir, that will not do. That is the trouble with all this confusion about the prima facie title. We have passed the stage where prima facie titles have play or can be considered. The House cannot ignore the fact that the real and prima facie titles in this case are defeated by the facts now before the House.

Mr. DEWEES. Will the gentleman yield to me for a question?

Mr. SHELLABARGER. Not just now, for I will not be able to say anything that has any sense in it unless I am permitted to finish the connection in which I am making these statements. Now, I have said that you have before you what shows that Mr. Menard has neither a prima facie nor a real title to a seat here. Let me state one single fact which disposes of the real as well as prima facie title to a seat, at least in my own mind. The paper which you referred to your Committee of Elections, and which the committee have reported back, shows that Mr. Menard was overwhelmingly defeated in that portion of the parish of New Orleans that was in the second district—defeated overwhelmingly—defeated by perhaps eight or ten thousand majority. The very documents that you referred to the committee, and which they have brought back to you, show that the votes of that parish were rejected because the returns were made by certain enrolling officers, and for no other reason. The Governor says that he rejected these returns because those officers had no power under the law to make these returns, and that that was the only reason why he rejected those returns. But he admits that an overwhelming majority of the votes cast at that election were for Mr. Hunt and not with Mr. Menard, if these officers could under the law have made these returns properly. But he says there was no law for them to do it. Now, Governor Warmoth had simply overlooked the fact that a little before that election took place a law of the State Legislature was passed expressly authorizing these officers to make these returns. Those returns, then, were legally made. They show Hunt overwhelmingly elected in the new district and in the old district—elected by every possible view of this case and in every aspect of it, provided that was a good election at all or for anybody.

There was therefore absolutely and technically a literal compliance with the law in making those returns. Not only was the law substantially complied with, but the returns were made by the enrolling officers in literal compliance with the law. So that, according to the papers you have referred to us of the Committee of Elections, Mr. Menard was defeated. You sent us those papers for us to examine, as we supposed, for doubtless you sent them to us for some purpose. We examined them and found by that examination that Mr. Menard was defeated. We bring those papers back to you with that statement of what in our opinion those papers proved. And now you say to us that although you referred those papers to us and told us to examine them and give you their full import and effect, and although we have done so and report to you that we have found that Mr. Menard was defeated and that Governor Warmoth simply omitted to read a certain law—when we say to you that there is no doubt that Mr. Menard was overwhelmingly defeated; that there is no room for doubt or hesitation or construction, yet you are called upon here to vote upon a mere prima facie title that the man who was overwhelmingly defeated shall be sworn in as elected, and this after all these facts are fully before and considered by the House.

I care little comparatively about the consequence of this case confined to itself, and I would not on that account have said a word upon it. But, gentlemen, I call upon you to call to mind the consequences of such a proposition as this. In the face of conclusive evidence, not disputed by anybody, that this man is not elected, will you still swear him in to take part in the legislation of the country during all the time which may be occupied in this contest? Carry out such a precedent to its results and I tell you that it may be fatal to the Government itself.

In all these questions which relate to the organization of the House of Representatives and who shall sit here to make our laws, when we toy or trifle with them we are indeed playing with live thunder. It becomes us here to be cautious indeed. Let it be understood by the vote of the House of Representatives to-day that one who is shown by documentary evidence not elected shall still, in the face of such evidence, be sworn in and permitted to take part in making these laws, when confessedly by the very letter of the evidence he has no right here, you have trifled with and stricken down here in this the very sanctuary of the people's power the majesty of that power.

Mr. Speaker, it is not safe to do it, and I hope it will not be done. One word more, and I shall have concluded. I said that this gentleman is not elected. Let me say in conclusion that the evidence including these historical events, which, as I say, we have a right to look at, shows that he would have been elected but for the most infamous wrongs which were on the day of that election witnessed. He ought to be to-day the chosen Representative of that constituency in that district. But, sir, the fact that these outrages defeated his election does not elect him. That is the concluding point to which I beg to bring the remembrance of the House. However infamous this election, or rather this proceeding that defeated all election may have been, while it makes a reason which vindicates the committee in reporting that Mr. Hunt is not elected, so also it makes a reason why Mr. Menard is not; while he has been deprived by murder, assassination, intimidation, and outrage of an election that he ought to have had, yet that fact does not elect him. So we have to dispose of the case; so this committee viewed it, and so we submit it to the far higher wisdom and far better judgment and sense of right of the entire House of Representatives.

Mr. ARNELL. I find myself painfully situated in casting my vote upon this question. My sympathies are all on one side, and my judgment on the other. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SHELLABARGER] has presented the law with the utmost clearness. The facts are beyond doubt, and are these:

First, Mr. Menard was not elected.

Secondly, a free and fair election was not held in this district on the 3d of November. Intimidation and murder kept the colored men from the polls; therefore nothing remains for the House of Representatives but to set the whole election aside.

I regret profoundly that on this occasion, the first in the history of the country where a colored man has presented himself in this Hall and claimed a seat, that I cannot vote for his admission. All my sympathies are with him and his race. I want to help bury out of sight and forever that caste and race hatred that to-day is a stain upon American civilization. Yet, I cannot violate my sense of justice by declaring that Mr. Menard is entitled to a seat in this body when the facts show the contrary to be true.

Thirdly, I cannot recognize as an election a fraud and an unmitigated outrage whereby this claimant was defeated of his seat. To do this would be to fasten calamity upon the colored people of Louisiana whom we wish to aid. Truth is always higher than expediency. God's justice is what we want for these people, full and ample.

And I take this occasion to declare my unaltered and, I trust, my unalterable devotion to the cause of liberty as represented by these poor, suffering, persecuted colored people of the South—many of them my constituents and my friends. When I turn my back or my sympathy upon them, or their cause, may God mercifully forgive me, for they are the truest of the true, unterrified and unshaken in their love and support of the Government, even in the midst of wrong, outrage, and murder.

Mr. KERR. With the permission of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. UPSON] I will now offer the following resolution, which is appended to the report of the minority:

Resolved, That Caleb S. Hunt is entitled to a seat in this House as Representative of the second congressional district of Louisiana, in place of James Mann, deceased.

The SPEAKER. This resolution will be regarded as pending if there be no objection.

There was no objection.

Mr. UPSON. I will now yield to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. McKEE] for two minutes, and after that to his colleague [Mr. BECK] for the same length of time, after which I will call the previous question.

Mr. McKEE. Mr. Speaker, I wish to make only a single remark in reference to the practice of the House in referring cases of this character to the Committee of Elections. I think an examination of the precedents for a period of at least twenty years back will show that in every case where a claimant has come to this House with a certificate properly authenticated he has been admitted and sworn in upon that certificate, unless there has been a specific charge made against him.

As reference has been made to the cases from my own State in the present Congress I desire to read from the proceedings of this House on the 3d of July, 1857, when a question was raised as to the admission of a portion of those who presented themselves as the members-elect from the State of Kentucky. The gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. LOGAN,] when that question was raised, submitted the following resolution:

"Whereas there is good reason to believe that in the election recently held in the State of Kentucky for Representatives to the Fortieth Congress the legal and loyal voters in the several districts in said State have been overawed and prevented from a true expression of their will and choice at the polls by those who have sympathized with or actually participated in the late rebellion, and that such elections were carried by the votes of such disloyal and returned rebels; Therefore,

Be it resolved, That the credentials of all the members elected from the State of Kentucky shall be referred to the Committee of Elections, to report at as early a day as practicable, and pending the report of said committee none of said members shall be allowed to take the oath of office and admitted to seats as such."

Afterward, as the debate progressed, charges and specifications were filed, as the Globe shows, against all those claiming seats from the State of Kentucky except one, and that was the gentleman from the eighth district, [Mr. ADAMS.] The gentleman from Illinois subsequently modified his resolution so as to make the preamble read as follows:

"Whereas there is good reason to believe that in the election recently held in the State of Kentucky for Representatives to the Fortieth Congress the legal and loyal voters in the several districts in said State have been overawed and prevented from a true expression of their will and choice at the polls by those who have sympathized with or actually participated in the late rebellion, and that such elections were carried by the votes of such disloyal and returned rebels; and whereas it is alleged that several of the Representatives-elect from that State are disloyal."

It was upon that charge of disloyalty alone that the credentials of those applicants for seats in this House were referred to the Committee of Elections.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. BECK. This is a controversy in which I take very little interest, considering that the person holds the certificate generally entitling to a seat on this floor, pending a contest; but when the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] was asserting in his argument to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. UPSON] that it had always been the custom in this House to allow the person holding a certificate to take his seat I call attention to the facts in the Kentucky cases, especially my own, not referring especially to those of my colleagues, Messrs. GROVER and JONES, which were substantially similar, as contradicting the position taken by the gentleman from Ohio. It will be found by reference to the Globe of July 3, 1857, that I was not allowed to take my seat, but my credentials were referred to the Committee of Elections, although I held the certificate of the Governor of Kentucky, in proper form, showing a majority of over 8,000 over my principal competitor, and the only objection made was in the statement of General LOGAN, which presented no objection to me, and which read as follows:

"I have no objection to accepting that amendment as a modification of my resolution, inasmuch as I believe that there are no charges against that gentleman. I, however, introduced my resolution for a different purpose from that of attacking any individual. My purpose was to test an important question in this House. There seems, however, to be some nervousness on this subject, and I will therefore accept the amendment and modify my resolution so as to include all the persons claiming seats as Representatives from the State of Kentucky, except the gentleman named in the amendment. I believe there have been charges made against all the others, except one, and he was the partner of John C. Breckinridge in the practice of law. [Laughter.]"

On that statement I and my colleagues were not admitted to our seats, but our credentials were referred to the Committee of Elections by a vote of 67 to 50. Several days afterward objections were filed, but at the time the resolution of reference passed there was no objection of any character against my right except the statement of General LOGAN above referred to. The Globe will verify what I say. For that reason I call the attention of the gentleman from Michigan to it as an answer to the statements of the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. GARFIELD. The gentleman's name was in the resolution that was passed, and that makes my point good.

Mr. BECK. But there was no charge against me, and my prima facie case was unquestioned; and that fact shows that the gentleman's point was not a good one.

Mr. PAINE. I wish the House to go back to the 18th day of last December, and to recall the facts as they then existed in this House in order that we may clear away the mystery which has been thrown around them by gentlemen who have discussed this case. On that day this claimant appeared in this House and asked for his seat. He presented his credentials and laid his case before this House. There was then pending the case of Jones vs. Mann. Mann had been elected and Jones had brought his contest before the House. That contest was then pending. When Menard came with his credentials why did we not swear him in, asks the gentleman from Ohio. We did not know then that there was a vacancy in that district, and that case of Jones vs. Mann was never decided until this very day. What did we do with Menard's credentials? What could we have done? We might have thrown them under the table, or we might have handed them back to him, but none of these things would have been proper, because we had a committee which was the custodian of all such papers. We took that certificate and handed it over to the Committee of Elections, instructing them to inquire into the facts of the case, as appears by the entry in the Journal which I have just read; and while I find no fault with that committee for making this report here to-day I say we have never been concluded by our action from admitting him under this prima facie case. How stands it? It is true the majority report neither is entitled to a seat, but one of the members of the committee [Mr. POLAND] has offered a resolution—for what purpose? For the purpose of inquiring into these facts. I have moved a substitute for his substitute.

Mr. UPSON. He is not a member of the committee, and has not been since the beginning of the session.

Mr. PAINE. I did not know he had left the committee; I knew that he had served on the committee.

The first question occurred on the following resolution, made by Mr. KERR:

Resolved, That Caleb S. Hunt is entitled to a seat in this House as Representative of the second congressional district of Louisiana, in place of James Mann, deceased.

Mr. KERR demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 41, nays 137, not voting 44; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Archer, Baker, Barnes, Barnum, Beck, Boyer, Burr, Cary, Chanler, Eldridge, Fox, Getz, Glossbrenner, Golladay, Grover, Haight, Holman, Asahel W. Hubbard, Richard D. Hubbard, Humphrey, Johnson, Thomas L. Jones, Kerr, Knott, Marshall, McCormick, McCullough, Mungen, Niblack, Nicholson, Phelps, Pruyn, Randall, Ross, Stone, Taber, Van Auker, Van Trump, Wood, Woodward, and Young—41.

NAYS—Messrs. Allison, Anderson, Arnell, Delos R. Ashley, James M. Ashley, Bailey, Baldwin, Banks, Beaman, Beatty, Benton, Bingham, Blackburn, Blair, Boles, Boutwell, Boyden, Bromwell, Broomall, Buckland, Buckley, Benjamin F. Butler, Roderick R. Butler, Calkins, Churchill, Sidney Clarke, Clift, Cobb, Coburn, Cook, Corley, Cornell, Covode, Cullom, Dawes, Deweese, Dickey, Dixon, Dockery, Dodge, Donnelly, Eckley, Eggleston, Ela, Thomas D. Eliot, James T. Elliott, Farnsworth, Ferriss, Ferry, Fields, French, Garfield, Goss, Gove, Gravelly, Hamilton, Harding, Haughey, Hawkins, Heaton, Higby, Hill, Hopkins, Hulburd, Hunter, Ingersoll, Jenckes, Alexander H. Jones, Judd, Julian, Kelley, Kelsey, Ketcham, Kitchen, Koontz, Lash, George V. Lawrence, William Lawrence, Lincoln, Logan, Mallory, Marvin, Maynard, McCarthy, McKee, Mercer, Miller, Moore, Moorhead, Morrell, Mullins, Myers, Newcomb, Norris, O'Neill, Paine, Perham, Peters, Pierce, Pike, Plants, Pomeroy, Price, Prince, Raum, Robinson, Roots, Sawyer, Schenck, Scofield, Selye, Shanks, Shellabarger, Smith, Spalding, Starkweather, Stevens, Stokes, Stover, Taylor, Thomas, John Trimble, Trowbridge, Twichell, Upson, Burt Van Horn, Robert T. Van Horn, Ward, Cadwalader C. Washburn, William B. Washburn, Welker, Whittemore, Thomas Williams, William Williams, John T. Wilson, and Windom—137.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Adams, Ames, Axtell, Benjamin, Blaine, Bowen, Brooks, Reader W. Clarke, Delano, Driggs, Edwards, Griswold, Halsey, Hooper, Hotchkiss, Chester D. Hubbard, Kellogg, Lafflin, Loan, Loughbridge, Lynch, Morrissey, Newsham, Nunn, Orth, Pettis, Pile, Poland, Polsley, Robinson, Sitgreaves, Stewart, Sypher, Taffe, Tift, Lawrence S. Trimble, Van Aernam, Van Wyck, Vidal, Elihu B. Washburne, Henry D. Washburn, James F. Wilson, Stephen F. Wilson, and Woodbridge—44.

So the resolution was disagreed to.

The question occurred on the amendment offered by Mr. PAINE to the amendment offered by Mr. POLAND.

The amendment of Mr. POLAND was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the report and resolutions of the Committee of Elections upon the contested election in the second congressional district in Louisiana be recommitted to said committee, with directions to take testimony in reference to the validity of the election in said district held on the 3d day of November, 1868, and especially as to any improper or unlawful means used to prevent a fair and free election.

The question was on agreeing to the amendment of Mr. PAINE to the foregoing, as follows:

Provided, That J. Willis Menard, holding a certificate from the Governor of the State of Louisiana that he was duly elected as a Representative from the second district of that State, be admitted to a seat in this House pending the consideration of the case.

Mr. PAINE. I demand the yeas and nays on the amendment.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 57, nays 130, not voting 35; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allison, Anderson, James M. Ashley, Baldwin, Beatty, Benton, Broomall, Buckley, Benjamin F. Butler, Calkins, Sidney Clarke, Clift, Cobb, Corley, Cullom, Dickey, Dodge, Donnelly, Driggs, Eggleston, Ela, Thomas D. Wilson, Stephen F. Wilson, and Woodbridge—35.

So the amendment was disagreed to.

Mr. DAWES. I move to lay the whole subject on the table.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. DAWES moved to reconsider the vote just taken; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Leave of absence was granted to Mr. STOKES for to-night on account of sickness; and to Mr. KELLEY on account of sickness in his family.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. GORHAM, its Secretary, informed the House that that body had passed severally with amendments, in which the concurrence of the House was requested, bills and a joint resolution of the House of the following titles:

An act (H. R. No. 1973) in reference to certifying checks by national banks;

An act (H. R. No. 1881) regulating the reports of national banking associations;

An act (H. R. No. 1276) for the sale of the Hot Springs reservation in Arkansas; and

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 211) for the relief of Henry J. Gibbons, late postmaster at St. Johns, Michigan.

The message further announced that the Senate had passed without amendment an act (H. R. No. 1204) to confirm certain private land claims in the State of Missouri.

Also, that the Senate had passed a bill and a joint resolution of the following titles, in which the concurrence of the House was requested:

An act (S. No. 953) for the relief of Blanton Duncan; and Joint resolution (S. No. 165) authorizing the Commissioner of Indian Affairs to appoint guardians or trustees for minor Indian children who may be entitled to pensions or bounties under the existing laws.

PAY OF CONTESTANTS.

Mr. DAWES. I offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Clerk be, and is hereby, directed to pay, under the sanction of the Committee on Accounts, the sum of $2,500 each to Simon Jones and J. Willis Menard, in full for timespent and expenses incurred in contesting the right to a seat in this House as a Representative from Louisiana.

Mr. KERR. Will the gentleman allow it to be amended by inserting the name of Caleb B. Hunt?

Mr. DAWES. The gentleman may offer that as an amendment.

Mr. KERR. I move as an amendment to insert that name.

Mr. DAWES. The gentleman from New York [Mr. CHANLER] desires to make a personal explanation, and I yield to him.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Mr. CHANLER. With the permission of the House, my object in rising at this moment is to refer to what took place at the beginning of the debate on the election case which the House has just disposed of. There was a difference of opinion between the Chair and myself in regard to a certain record, and that difference of opinion has given rise to an assertion on the part of the Chair which I think requires some notice from myself. That there may be no mistake I shall read what I have to say, having drawn it up during the debate on this question. If any errors have occurred, they have not arisen from any improper motive on my part. But what I am about to say is for the purpose of preventing difficulties among gentlemen on this floor which must arise unless this question of veracity between members is settled and the manner of ruling is fixed by the House itself.

The following statement of facts, copied from the Congressional Globe report of the debates of Congress, refers to the difference which has arisen between the Speaker and myself in regard to his ruling as Speaker of the House of Representatives on May 1, 1868, and February 4, 1869.

Mr. Speaker, meaning no disrespect to yourself personally, but as I understand my rights as a member of the House of Representatives, believing that I have in common with all other Representatives on this floor a right to question the ruling of its Presiding Officer by reference to his acts as chosen officer for maintenance of order and for the protection of the rights of its individual members, I did, on this 27th February, in the assertion made by the Chair that the member from Michigan [Mr. UPSON] "should be protected by the Chair," or words to that effect declare, "that I had no doubt that the Speaker would do so as the gentleman belonged to the majority party here," as the Speaker had on a previous occasion ruled to protect a member on that side of the House from a charge against that member's veracity made by members of the minority side. But when a member of the majority made a similar charge against one of the members of the minority the Speaker ruled directly opposite, ruling the following words of the member were in order, namely: "That is not true, and he knows it." The words of the Speaker on that occasion—May 1, 1868—were as follows:

"The Chair thinks that those words are not unparliamentary. If the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. LOGAN] had made use of opprobrious words sometimes used, but which the Chair will not repeat, he would have been out of order. But any gentleman has a right to say a proposition is not true, and possibly that the one making it knew it was not true. The Chair thinks the words used may be severe, but they are not offensive in that sense in which it is forbidden to members to use offensive language toward their fellow-members, and did not seem to be uttered in an offensive tone."

By this ruling it is clear that a certain large license of offensive language is permitted by which one member can charge a fellow-member with uttering an untruth with a knowledge of the untruth, and go on without check or rebuke from the Chair. On a subsequent occasion, in a debate upon an appropriation bill then before the House, a Delegate from one of the Territories was ruled out of order by the Speaker for using similar language in debate. The words having been reduced to writing, were read by the Clerk as follows:

"And after the gentleman having charge of this bill saw fit to silence Delegates here by raising points of order, and making assertions which he knew at the time he made them to be unqualifiedly false—"

"THE SPEAKER. The Chair rules that these words are out of order both as being unparliamentary and as being indecorous."

"Where a member states that what another member has said is not true that is not unparliamentary, because it is possible that the member may have been mistaken. But when a gentleman states that a member on this floor has declared that which he knew to be unqualifiedly false, that is the most insulting language that can be uttered in a parliamentary body."

Mr. Speaker, at this time I refrain from criticising the casuistry which distinguishes the ruling in the first case from the ruling in the second. I claim the right as a member of this body to say that the ruling of the Speaker in these two cases is contradictory and unfounded on any parliamentary practice in this country. Further, I demand the right to point out to the presiding officer of this House, so long as I remain a member here, any error of judgment or ruling, pro and contra, affecting the debate or public business here.

Mr. DICKEY. I rise to a point of order.

Mr. WOOD. My colleague has unanimous consent to proceed.

The SPEAKER. The Chair would ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania, as a personal favor to himself, not to interrupt the gentleman upon the floor in the personal explanation for which he obtained the consent of the House.

Mr. DICKEY. I do not wish to interrupt him in any personal explanation, but I raise the question of order whether it is in order for him to go back to the entire history of the Speaker of this House and to what occurred here before many of us came here?

Mr. WOOD. He had unanimous consent to make a personal explanation.

The SPEAKER. The Chair hopes the gentleman from Pennsylvania will not insist on the point of order.

Mr. DICKEY. At the request of the Speaker I withdraw it.

Mr. CHANLER, (resuming.) The Chair seems to think that such exercise of the right of a member to protest against and criticize its action is disrespectful to himself personally, and calls for the use of language by him which, although in his opinion parliamentary, is in my opinion both unparliamentary and indecorous. From the Speaker's expressed opinion of the latitude allowed in debate and between members here, I am debarred from supposing that he meant any offense in charging that what I said was untrue, as I am informed by a fellow-member he directly did on the occasion referred to, and as the Globe report will show. Among men outside of this House, quite as capable as any one here of fixing the limits and proprieties of language in this House or elsewhere, such language would have been and will always be considered unparliamentary and indecorous without some qualification, and if uttered outside of this House would be answered by a blow.

I will now read, in justification of what I have said, the report of what occurred this morning, which has been furnished me by the reporters for the Globe. What I have said I have said in defense of the privileges of a Representative on this floor, and I now declare to the Speaker, as I did at the commencement of my remarks, that I have no motive whatever to utter anything discourteous to himself or which could impute any wrong motive to him, but simply to discuss with him briefly what he knows I had discussed with him privately at his desk. The effort may have been ill-timed, but the motive was not to give offense to him. I read from the notes of the reporters for the Globe:

"Mr. UPSON. I do not yield to the gentleman.

"Mr. CHANLER. I only wish to say—

"The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. UPSON] declines to yield, and is entitled to be protected against interruption.

"Mr. CHANLER. Of course; protection is always extended on that side.

"The SPEAKER. The remark of the gentleman from New York is not just to the Chair, for the Chair has protected him from interruption when he has declined to yield.

"Mr. CHANLER. When questions of veracity have been raised here I have appealed from the decision of the Chair when that side has been protected and this side punished."

A Democrat, a Delegate upon this side of the House, was brought to the bar of the House and rebuked.

"The SPEAKER. The remarks of the gentleman from New York are not respectful to the Chair; nor are they true.

"Mr. CHANLER. Very well; let it be decided by the record.

With that I leave the subject.

The SPEAKER. The House has heard the "personal explanation" of the gentleman from New York, for which he obtained unanimous consent. As they have seen, it was, instead of a personal explanation, an attack upon the Chair. He asks an opportunity for five minutes to reply. Is there objection?

No objection was made.

The SPEAKER. The report which has been read by the gentleman from New York just before he took his seat, of the occurrences of this morning, shows that that gentleman, when the Chair was endeavoring to protect the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. UPSON] against his interruptions contrary to the rules of the House, while he was persisting in the interruptions, he made a remark to the Chair which the Chair replied was not just in regard to the rulings of the Chair previously. His language in reply, as it fell upon the ear of the Speaker, was: "Upon questions of veracity with the Chair I would appeal to the decision of the House." That was the language of the member, as it fell upon the ear of the Speaker, who regarded it as a reflection upon his veracity, and as intended to be a reflection upon his veracity as the previous remark had obviously been intended to be a reflection upon his impartiality. The Speaker replied: "The language is not respectful to the Chair, nor is it true."

As regards the threat contained in the remarks of the gentleman from New York, or what would seem to be the threat implied in them, if he made the remarks which the Chair understood him to make, the Chair is compelled to say that he made the only response which it became a gentleman to make to such remarks.

The gentleman now cites the decisions of the Chair on two previous occasions. Without referring to the record of those decisions, the Chair is so satisfied that the members of this House will bear testimony to the correctness of his decisions in both of those cases that he is willing to submit the question even to the political associates of the member who now arraigns him.

When the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. LOGAN] was on the floor some time since engaged in discussing a subject then before the House, in the rapidity which always characterizes his remarks he said, in speaking of some gentleman—not showing any acerbity of feeling at all, or any intention to be personally offensive to him—"The remark is not true, and he knows it." For that remark he was called to order by the gentleman from Wisconsin, [Mr. ELDRIDGE.] The very moment he was called to order he said—and the report as published in the Globe will show such to have been the fact—"I intended to say it is not true, and he ought to know it." He qualified his remark on the instant, showing that it was not an intentional reflection upon the veracity of the person to whom he was alluding. He was speaking rapidly at the time, and without any bitterness in tone or manner; and the gentleman from Wisconsin will bear testimony, although the Chair has never spoken to him on the subject, that the statement of the Chair is correct; because the record of the debate shows that when the gentleman from Wisconsin called upon the Chair to rule upon the words used, the gentleman from Illinois twice stated, once immediately upon being called to order, and again after a colloquy between the gentleman from Wisconsin and the Chair, that what he intended to say was that "he ought to know it was not true."

The Chair then ruled as quoted by the gentleman from New York, that the language used by the gentleman from Illinois did not seem to the Chair to be offensive; that the offensive tone has a great deal to do in giving character to the language used, and the prompt explanation of the gentleman from Illinois—this was not said by the Chair at the time he ruled upon his language, but he had it in mind—the prompt explanation of the gentleman from Illinois, saying that he did not mean to say that the person to whom he alluded knew the statement was not true, but that he ought to know it was not true, thus relieving the language of all appearance of offensiveness, induced the Chair to say that the language of the gentleman from Illinois was not to be regarded as offensive. And no appeal was taking from that ruling of the Chair.

In the other case quoted, that of the Delegate from Idaho, he was speaking in the time of the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. BUTLER,] and he had just before used the precise words for which, when used the second time, he was called to order by the Chair. The Delegate said that the gentleman from Massachusetts had sought to silence the Delegates by points of order, and had made statements which he, the gentleman from Massachusetts, knew at the time he made them to be unqualifiedly false. The Chair suffered the remark of the Delegate to pass in the first instance, because he could not catch his precise language. But within one minute afterward he repeated it again, and refused to retract it, saying that he stood by it. The Chair now leaves it, not to his political associates, not to those who have placed him in this position, but he leaves it fearlessly to the political associates of the member who arraigns him, to decide whether there is not the widest possible contrast between the two cases which the gentleman from New York has cited and collocated, for the purpose of attacking for the second time upon the same day the Presiding Officer of the House of which he is a member.

PAY OF CONTESTANTS—AGAIN.

The SPEAKER. The House now resumes the consideration of the resolution of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] relative to the pay of the applicants for the seat as Representative from the second congressional district of Louisiana. The question is now upon the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. KERR] to that resolution.

Mr. DAWES. I accept the amendment as a modification of the resolution.

The question being on agreeing to the resolution as modified,

Mr. HOLMAN. I call for a division on that question.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to postponing the time for taking the recess till this question is disposed of?

Mr. WOOD. I object.

The SPEAKER. The hour for the recess having arrived, this question will go over till Monday next after the morning hour. The House now takes a recess till half past seven o'clock p. m.

EVENING SESSION.

The House resumed its session at half past seven o'clock p. m.

PURCHASE OF ALASKA.

Mr. HULBURD. I present a report from the Committee on Public Expenditures in regard to the alleged corruption in the passage of the bill for the purchase of Alaska. The committee was authorized to report on this subject at any time. I am instructed by the committee to submit the evidence, together with two reports, the members of the committee not being agreed with reference to details.

The SPEAKER. Which gentleman of the committee makes the report of the minority?

Mr. HULBURD. It is not exactly a minority report. The members of the committee concur in the report as prepared by the chairman; but four of them wish to submit something additional, and have signed a minute to that effect.

The SPEAKER. The two reports will be laid on the table and printed.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. HOLMAN, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reports that the committee had examined and found duly enrolled a bill (H. R. No. 1204) to confirm certain private land claims in the State of Missouri; when the Speaker signed the same.

DISBURSEMENTS FOR STATIONERY.

Mr. BROOMALL, by unanimous consent, submitted from the Committee on Accounts a report, in pursuance of the resolution directing the committee to inquire into the disbursements of the contingent fund for stationery; which was ordered to be printed and recommended.

WELLS, FARGO AND COMPANY.

Mr. BROOMALL, from the Committee on Public Expenditures, submitted a report relative to the contract of Wells, Fargo & Co.; which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. BROOMALL. I will move, if there be no objection, that the committee be discharged from the further consideration of the subject.

Mr. COBURN. As one member of the committee I desire to say that the committee are not unanimous on this subject, two or three members dissenting from some of the conclusions of the majority. Though the minority present at this time no minority report, perhaps we may desire to be heard before the committee is discharged. I therefore prefer that the motion of the chairman of the committee should not be acted on at this time.

TEXAS.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of War, transmitting a report of the commander of the fifth military district in regard to the adjournment of the constitutional convention of Texas; which was referred to the Committee on Reconstruction, and ordered to be printed.

RONDOUT HARBOR.

The SPEAKER also, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of War, transmitting, in compliance with House resolution of the 28th ultimo, the report of the chief engineer on the improvement of Rondout harbor; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

TYRRELL'S PATENT HORSE-SHOE.

Mr. VAN HORN, of New York. I ask unanimous consent to submit the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be requested to furnish this House, with as little delay as possible, any and all information he may have or can obtain from the quartermaster general's department in relation to the introduction, use, and benefits of Tyrrell's patent hoof-expanding horse-shoe by his department, how long it has been used if at all, to what extent, and with what success; and whether in his judgment said shoe has merits to entitle it to favorable consideration by the Government.

Mr. SCOFIELD. I object.

SMITHSONIAN REPORT.

Mr. LAFLIN reported from the Committee on Printing the following resolution:

Resolved, That there be printed five thousand extra copies of the report of the Smithsonian Institution, three thousand for the use of the House and two thousand for the Institution, the same to be stereotyped at the expense heretofore provided for.

Mr. HOLMAN. Is this the usual number that has heretofore been ordered to be printed?

Mr. LAFLIN. It is.

The resolution was adopted.

ADVERSE REPORTS.

Mr. CHURCHILL, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported adversely on the following cases; and the same were laid upon the table:

A bill (H. R. No. 697) regulating the terms of the United States district court for the western district of Missouri;

A bill (H. R. No. 20) to amend an act entitled "An act to divide the State of Missouri into two judicial districts, and giving jurisdiction to the district court of the western district of Missouri";

A bill (H. R. No. 279) to provide for the appointment of a judge for the district court of West Tennessee;

A bill (H. R. No. 233) to provide for recording deeds in the clerk's office in the district and circuit courts of the United States;

A bill (H. R. No. 509) to create the southwestern judicial district of Maryland;

A bill (H. R. No. 933) to repeal an act entitled "An act to create the third judicial district of the State of New York," approved April 26, 1865, and to make provision for the trial of causes pending in said court; and

The petition of the members of the bar of Memphis, Tennessee, for the appointment of a judge of the district court of West Tennessee.

KANSAS PACIFIC RAILWAY COMPANY.

Mr. CLARKE, of Kansas. I ask unanimous consent to introduce a joint resolution (H. R. No. 468) authorizing the Union Pacific Railroad Company, eastern division, to change its name to the Kansas Pacific Railway Company. It is merely local in its character.

There was no objection, and the joint resolution was received, read a first and second time, ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. CLARKE, of Kansas, moved to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

NATIONAL LINCOLN MONUMENT ASSOCIATION.

Mr. CULLOM. I ask unanimous consent of the House to take up and pass House bill No. 1831, to authorize the Secretary of War to place at the disposal of the National Lincoln Monument Association at Springfield, Illinois, damaged and captured ordnance. The Committee on Military Affairs have acted on this bill and are in favor of it. These bronze and brass captured and damaged ordnance are such as may be required for casting the principal figures to be incorporated in the monument at Springfield.

Mr. HOLMAN. Has not such a bill already passed?

Mr. CULLOM. That was for the McPherson monument, and not for the Lincoln monument.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. CULLOM moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

TITLE TO LAND WARRANTS.

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Pennsylvania. I move to take from the Speaker's table Senate amendments to House bill No. 568, explanatory of the act entitled "An act declaring the title to land warrants in certain cases."

Mr. HOLMAN. There are quite a number of bills upon the Speaker's table, and I suggest to the gentleman to move that we proceed to the consideration of the business upon the Speaker's table.

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Pennsylvania. There can be no objection to this one.

Mr. HOLMAN. I think all the bills upon the Speaker's table should stand upon the same footing and that none should be given the advantage over others.

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Pennsylvania. I hope the gentleman will withdraw his objection, as I have not troubled the House often.

Mr. HOLMAN. I withdraw the objection in this instance.

There was no objection; and the amendments of the Senate were taken from the Speaker's table and read, as follows:

Insert "whose claims were filed prior to their decease," and strike out "claim" and insert "same;" so it will then read:

That the act entitled "An act declaring the title to land warrants in certain cases," approved June 3, 1858, be so construed and applied as to authorize the legal representatives of deceased claimants whose claims were filed prior to their decease to file the proof necessary to perfect the same.

The amendments of the Senate were concurred in.

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Pennsylvania, moved to reconsider the vote by which the Senate amendments were concurred in; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

INDIAN APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts, moved that the rules be suspended, and that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union for the purpose of considering the amendments of the Senate to the Indian appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. POMEROY in the chair,) and proceeded to the consideration of the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 1738) making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian department, and for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes for the year ending June 30, 1870.

The Clerk read the first amendment of the Senate, namely, to strike out "eleven" and insert "twelve;" so that the clause will read "for pay of twelve superintendents."

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, I propose to discuss these amendments of the Senate at some length. I would not do so were it not that I think a great deal of time will be saved by the committee and by the House in so doing.

This bill is a very important one. As it passed this House it appropriated $2,812,240 12 upon estimates which called for $2,977,982 70. It went to the Senate, and the Committee on Finance of that body added to it $540,963, and the Senate Committee on Indian Affairs also added amendments which called for $3,800,989 99. So that now the bill calls for $6,654,158 11. It will be seen, therefore, that the bill is a very important one in its amount; but it is still more important in the amount which must be called for hereafter if the policy which this bill inaugurates is sanctioned by the House.

I will therefore explain the amendments which make the substantial difference between the present Indian policy which was carried out by the bill of the House and the new policy which is proposed to be set on foot by this peace commission, the expenditures for which are provided for in this bill. Although this bill by its amendments calls for only $4,000,000 extra for this year, yet if these treaties which are thus provided for are sanctioned by this House, and necessary appropriations are made to carry them out, the fiscal year ending July 1, 1871, must have about seven million five hundred thousand dollars, and the next year about ten million dollars, and thus the expenditures will keep on for the next twenty years, averaging from ten to twelve million dollars a year. So that gentlemen will see this is a matter which, if they have any concern for the future of the country, will call for the exercise of very considerable care and judgment in its determination. Indeed, the matter is so important and difficult that the Committee on Appropriations have not been able to come to any conclusion that is satisfactory to themselves, and have instructed me to state the facts to the House and ask for its judgment on the matter. I intend, therefore, to put before the House the facts upon which we have based our action which have come to our knowledge, and then ask the House to determine with great care and deliberation what shall be done, because these amendments in all substantial matters are brought out by the change of the Indian system to which I have alluded.

As you are aware, there were certain Indian treaties in existence up to the year 1865 or 1866. Those treaties were satisfied by about two million dollars. In 1867 the House and Senate established an Indian commission. That commission went on the plains to treat with the wild or roaming Indians who had heretofore led nomadic lives. They made treaties with them which called for the amounts which I have named. I suppose that the best way to examine the subject will be to take a single treaty, a treaty with the Crow Indians for example, which I hold in my hand, and scan its provisions and purport. It was concluded on the 7th of May, 1868, ratified on the 5th of July, 1868, and proclaimed on the 12th of August, 1868. This and kindred treaties were not considered by the Committee on Appropriations when they reported this bill, because the treaties were not sent to them for consideration in time.

Now, this treaty provides in the first place that those Crow Indians, who amount to about three thousand souls, taking the estimated census of 1867, shall have erected for them $29,000 worth of buildings and mills at their agency. Then each head of a family is to have three hundred and sixty acres of land, and each person over the age of eighteen years, whether male or female, who chooses to cultivate land is to have eighty acres. Then there shall be a teacher provided for every thirty children at an expense of, say, $15,000 a year for salary alone. Then every Indian who is the head of a family is to have for the first year seeds and agricultural implements to the amount of $100, and for twenty years thereafter seeds to the amount of twenty five dollars each year. Then, each Indian who cultivates the soil is to have twenty dollars a year and every "roaming Indian," as they are called, those who roam and will not cultivate the soil, is to have ten dollars a year. Then every one of these Indians over four years of age, male and female, is to have a pound of meat and a pound of flour per day at a cost of twenty-five cents per day each, say seventy-five dollars a year. Then, each head of a family is to have a yoke of well-broken oxen, costing in that country about two hundred and fifty dollars each, and a good cow—an "American cow" as contradistinguished from Texas or Mexican cattle—costing from sixty-five to seventy-five dollars. In addition to that, every male person over fourteen years of age is to have a suit of good, substantial woolen clothing, consisting of coat, hat, pantaloons, flannel shirt, and a pair of woolen socks; and each female over twelve years of age is to have a flannel skirt or the goods necessary to make it, a pair of woolen hose, twelve yards of calico, and twelve yards of cotton domestics; and boys and girls under the ages named are to have such cotton and flannel goods as may be needed to make each a suit, together with a pair of woolen hose for each. All this is to continue for thirty years unless it is found best to put this provision into some other shape. In addition, the Indians are to have a blacksmith, with iron and steel, shop and tools, for every one hundred men; a carpenter, an engineer, a physician, a farmer, and a miller to grind their corn, take care of their mills, and help them to build their houses, and mills to saw the lumber.

This is one of, I think, eleven treaties, and those eleven treaties cover perhaps not far from forty-five thousand Indians. When all the Indians are brought in under these treaties it will cost about six or seven million dollars a year to feed them and furnish these supplies. I therefore call the attention of the House to the fact that the question before us is a matter of great gravity. The Indian peace commission have thought that these provisions are necessary in order to have the Indians fed and kept on their reservations and taught agriculture so as to keep them at peace, with the hope in time to render them self-sustaining. It is a policy of peace. It is said by those who claim to be cognizant of this matter and in behalf of the peace commission that this policy, if carried out, will prevent Indian wars.

Mr. WINDOM. I would ask the gentleman to what document he referred in stating the provisions of these treaties?

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I have been reading from the treaty with the Crow Indians.

Mr. WINDOM. Where is that to be found? In the document-room?

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. No, sir; a copy of the treaty was furnished me, but these treaties have not yet been published in book form. The treaties made by the commission are all substantially alike, and I will send the gentleman one.

Now, then, there are those in this House who know more about the Indians than I do and can tell us whether this experiment will likely be a success. I had supposed that an Indian warrior thought it disgraceful to work, and that a man's only occupation was hunting or war, and that the squaws did all the work, yet we have here an experiment to civilize the Indians and set them to work.

In pursuance of this attempt at civilization the Indians have been put by the peace commission upon several reservations, and the commission have selected for those reservations tracts of lands, as a whole, least desirable for cultivation and settlement, in order that the cupidity of white men may not lead them to attempt to follow these Indians upon their reservations and drive them off, as they have been driven from their reservations heretofore. I believe, however, that the peace commission have given the Indians in every instance arable land enough along the streams on their reservations to support all the population that is ever likely to be upon the reservations, because it is a fact not to be disguised that the Indian in civilized life has never shown any capacity of increase of population. I have thus stated the substantial facts and provisions upon which the theory and action of the peace commission rest. It is also said by them and their friends that if we do not feed these Indians and carry out these treaties and keep them on their reservations in this way they will be sure to commit depredations that will lead to war, and that the cost of the Army if we have to fight them will be a great deal more than the cost of feeding them and supplying them with all with which by treaty they are to receive. If there is no other alternative but to fight them—and of that I do not at the present moment give an opinion, but must leave every gentleman to judge for himself—then I agree that war will be very much more expensive. The war which is now being carried on against a few Indians costs a great deal more than all these expenditures, vast as they may seem. But on the other hand a war would terminate some time, but these expenditures must last for a generation and go on increasing as the Indians adopt these or like treaties and come in greater numbers to be fed and supplied with clothing, farms, oxen, cows, and tools.

Before I pass from this subject it is but just that I should call the attention of the House to the fact that each one of these Indians, according to these treaties, is to be provided with means of starting in the world greater than the majority of farmers either in the East or in the West.

Mr. ALLISON. Will the gentleman yield to me for a question or two?

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Certainly.

Mr. ALLISON. I desire to ask the gentleman, in reference to this subject, whether or not those treaties have been made with hostile bands of Indians? If so, whether or not they are more favorable than are existing treaties with peaceable bands of Indians? And whether or not the effect of these treaties, if carried out, will not be to make the Indians that are now peaceable dissatisfied and hostile unless we give the same benefits to the Indians that have hitherto been friendly towards our people?

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I can answer the first two branches of the inquiry of the gentleman, but I cannot now answer the last because that is a matter of judgment and of future experience. As to the first inquiry I will say that these treaties have been made with hostile bands. In regard to the second inquiry I reply that the terms of these treaties are more favorable, if we are to use that term in regard to a treaty where we are attempting to establish a portion of our Indian population in fixed homes as we would in speaking of the terms of a treaty between two nations, these treaties are more favorable than the treaties heretofore made with other Indians. And the proposition is, as I understand it, that all the Indians, except those that have property of their own and who are now substantially brought into the habits of civilization, shall have like treaties made with them and shall receive like treatment from us. We are now considering a part of a system of bringing all the Indians of the United States under the influences of civilization substantially according to the same plan. The plan is to be carried out still further hereafter in relation to all the roving bands of Indians.

But allow me to say that there are some treaties that have been made with friendly Indians, particularly with the Ute Indians and the Navajo Indians, who have always been friendly. In the case of the Navajo Indians, and the action of the Government under the treaty with them, I am bound to report to the House that it has been a most complete success. But they have had no such considerable benefits as those other treaties propose, because they had means of subsisting themselves as soon as they were carried to their old homes, and had lands on which they had worked for many years, and had very considerable manufactures among themselves.

Mr. CLARKE, of Kansas. Will the gentleman yield to me for a question?

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Certainly.

Mr. CLARKE, of Kansas. I would inquire whether or not these Indians with whom these treaties have been made are not still hostile to the people of the United States?

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Some of the Indians with whom these treaties have been made are still hostile to the United States, but the appropriations called for by the treaties with those Indians are not to be paid so long as the Indians remain hostile.

Mr. WINDOM. Let me ask the gentleman another question right at this point.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Very well.

Mr. WINDOM. Are not the Indians with whom treaties have been made and who are now hostile the Indians in regard to whom we have not complied with our treaty stipulations?

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. That is undoubtedly so to some considerable extent.

I want to make a still further statement. This is proposed as a system which shall ultimately embrace all the Indians to the number, I suppose, of two hundred and fifty thousand on our western frontiers. I know the number has been estimated at three hundred thousand but I believe the number is always overestimated, and if all come in it is easy to see what the annual expense will be to feed them only, say at twenty-five cents per day, or $18,750,000.

Now the differences between the House bill and the Senate bill, except in some comparatively unimportant particulars and in regard to some claims that have been tacked on to it in the Senate, comes from the source we have been discussing. And the first question to be settled by us is this: whether the House by appropriations to carry out the provisions of these treaties will sanction this method of dealing with the Indians? If these treaties are to be sanctioned and appropriated for gentlemen will see that it takes from the House the power substantially of legislating on Indian affairs. The Indian agents make treaties, the Commissioner of Indian Affairs makes treaties, the Senate ratify them, and from that hour, if they are to be regarded as the supreme law of the land, and especially if we sanction them, we are bound to make appropriations to carry them out to the letter in a fair and just spirit.

Now, if the House is ever going to adopt a policy on this subject of making treaties with the Indians it ought to be done here and now, whatever that policy may be. To give gentlemen a specimen of the operation of this system I will take the case of General Harney; and if any gentleman wants to follow that case with more careful investigation he will find all the information in a report made by the Committee on Appropriations, House report No. 29, in which the operations of General Harney are stated at length.

Now, General Harney, acting under the peace commission, was sent to the Sioux Indians on the upper Missouri river on the 10th of August last, if I remember aright, with $200,000, and with orders to bring the various bands of the Sioux upon their reservation and supply them temporarily under the provisions of a treaty which had been made with those bands but was not then ratified or published. He proceeded to do so with the $200,000. Having begun the work he spent not only the $200,000 allowed him, but $485,000 more; and before the 1st day of July next will require $205,000 more. He now calls for about seventeen hundred thousand dollars in addition to carry these Sioux through the next year. Of course General Harney had no authority of law to make this great expenditure. There was no appropriation, nor at the time a treaty ratified calling for it; but it was thought by him and his associates best to be done in order to keep the Indians at peace. He has called together on the reservation some nine thousand Sioux Indians. There are twenty-two thousand in all; and as it has cost $2,000,000 to take care of nine thousand Sioux, any one can easily calculate how much it will cost to take care of twenty-two thousand. It can readily be seen, therefore, to what an amount this expenditure must swell in future years. When I state that in my opinion the system will involve an expenditure of eight or ten millions annually I do not overstate the facts. It is appropriations of this class that compose the great bulk of the Senate amendments to this bill.

In order that I may not be misunderstood let me say that I believe General Harney has in his action toward the Sioux attempted to carry out the provisions of the treaties. He has done that which he thought best for the community with perfect good faith and the utmost honesty. I should not have made all the contracts he has made and in the manner in which he has made them. I might perhaps have made worse ones. I do not think they were always economically made or as well made as a man more acquainted with business might have made them. But I want to bear testimony here to the utmost good faith and honesty on the part of General Harney. I doubt whether upon the whole we could have got the thing much better done by any other man. Hence I am justified in saying that General Harney's action, as spread out in the report to which I have called attention, shows us what at the best we may expect from this system in the future.

Mr. BENJAMIN. Before the gentleman sits down I would like him to explain, if he can, amendment No. 117 on page 76.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I will come to that in a moment.

The Committee on Appropriations were unable to come fully to a conclusion as to what they ought to recommend to the House on this subject of carrying out this policy. I have stated the facts that the House may understand the matter and judge for itself. The question that first arises is, will the House sanction this method of dealing with the Indians? Shall we go on with the system here presented or shall we stop? The next question is, shall we be as liberal in our appropriations as the treaties contemplate? Shall we exercise any supervision whatever over this matter? The third question is, what is to be done if we do not sanction this expenditure? That the House might decide these questions the Committee on Appropriations have recommended non-concurrence in all the Senate amendments of this class and submit them to the House. Before we come to vote on the first considerable appropriation to carry out one of these treaties I desire that these questions shall be quite fully discussed, and let the decision upon that be taken as a test question. Having settled what action we shall take on that class of amendments it will be very easy to dispose of this bill. Until the general question has been settled it will be almost impossible to settle these various items by discussing each one of them. They form parts of a system and must be considered as such. There is another class of items to which I wish to call attention. A large number of claims of various sorts have been attached to this bill. There is one to which the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BENJAMIN] just called attention—an old claim which is provided for by treaty. Then there is a class of claims which ought to have gone, in the judgment of the Committee on Appropriations, to the Court of Claims. Then there are certain deficiencies which must be met; and I want to say to the House that most of these can only be settled by a committee of conference, who shall examine them and report such as are just and proper to be provided for.

Mr. Chairman, I want to call the attention of the House to one fact especially. The Committee on Appropriations reported exactly what was appropriated last year for the same kind of expenditures. At that time we then prepared the appropriation bill with great care. It went to the Senate, was there again examined and amended, and again considered here, and afterward went to a committee of conference; and then we consumed the whole of one day and a part each of two others in deciding with particularity how each item should stand. The report of the committee of conference was agreed to by both Houses. When we came to the class of items this year the Committee on Appropriations reported appropriations upon the basis which was so carefully agreed to last year. Let me illustrate for a moment. A great many of the old treaties provided that the United States should provide physicians, blacksmiths, farmers, and the like for the Indians. In some treaties the amount of the salary was fixed in the treaty, and in others it was left discretionary. Wherever the amount was fixed it was always found that the United States could procure a physician, farmer, or mechanic for that sum; but where it was left discretionary we found that the United States had to pay much more. It was the same in the case of the farmer, the blacksmith, the tanner, the millwright, and every other. Wherever the treaty said a farmer at $600 the services of a farmer were secured for that amount; but where it said nothing about it the farmer would cost almost double that sum. So we settled with great care those matters of detail as we thought most economical and best. Then there was another class of expenditures. A large number of expenditures under these treaties are at the pleasure of the President, others are at the pleasure of Congress. Wherever the expenditures were to be at the pleasure of the President or of Congress we examined into them and if we discovered that the need of them had passed entirely away we did not appropriate for them. Some of these treaties go back to the last century. We said that we had no pleasure in some of these provisions and they were cut off.

Now, as I have said, the Committee on Appropriations appropriated this year according to the scale adopted last year, so far as the old treaties were concerned. We did not have most of the new treaties before us. The Senate, I believe, have in almost every instance added on what we have cut off. It has been done with perfect unanimity upon a level plane of amendments. They have brought everything up to the old standard. While they have done that, yet they have paid the Committee on Appropriations the highest compliment any Committee on Appropriations ever before received, for with the exception of clerical errors they have not in the whole one hundred and eighty-seven amendments stricken down as extravagant a single provision which we sent to them. I am quite accurate when I say that they have not stricken out a single dollar which the House appropriated.

Now, if any gentleman of the committee should desire any further explanation I shall be happy to give it if I can.

Mr. WINDOM. Will the gentleman state the amount appropriated to carry out new treaties? I did not catch his former statement.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I will state it again, and especially as a number of members have since come into the House. The bill as it went from the House appropriated $2,312,260. The Senate Committee on Appropriations added $540,963, and the Senate Committee on Indian Affairs $3,800,734 99.

Mr. BENJAMIN. The committee have not heard the gentleman's statement in regard to the amendment. In this particular case are we to pay the Indians for stealing our stock? That is the point.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. It is Senate amendment No. 117, to pay the claim of the Sacs and Foxes against the United States for stealing of stock, per fifteenth article treaty February 18, 1867, $16,400. What is intended is to provide for a case where citizens of the United States are supposed to have stolen the stock of the Sacs and Foxes. You must not ask me to defend the syntax or grammar of the Senate amendment when I have so much else to do.

Mr. BENJAMIN. Has the gentleman any information whether this is to pay for stock we have stolen or stock they have stolen?

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I believe the treaty sets forth the facts with a great deal of accuracy. I will read the article of the treaty:

"Article fifteen of the treaty ratified October 14, 1858.—The claims of the Sacs and Foxes against the United States for stealing stock which have heretofore been adjusted, amounting to $16,400, shall be paid by the United States, and the amount disbursed and expended for the benefit of the tribe in such objects for their improvement and comfort upon the new reservation as the chiefs through their agents desire. And whereas the Indians claim that one full payment due under the previous treaty has never been made to them, it is agreed that a careful examination of the books of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs shall be made, and if any sum is found still due to anybody the same shall be paid to them per capita in the same manner as their annuities are paid."

Mr. GARFIELD. Please enlighten us on this point: if the Indians stole the stock do we pay them?

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. No, sir.

Mr. GARFIELD. Did we steal it from them, or are we now paying our debts?

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Our citizens and our soldiers are claimed to have stolen a large amount of cattle from the Sac and Fox Indians, and that claim has heretofore been adjusted in the Indian Bureau, but now there is a treaty stipulation here to carry out that adjustment by paying the amount.

Mr. LOGAN. The truth is the rebels stole their stock, I suppose, did they not?

Several members here propounded questions attacking the wording of the amendment.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I really cannot answer these questions, and I hope gentlemen upon a matter of so much gravity as this, and with the press of business at this time, will see that it is important that we proceed to the consideration of these very grave matters.

Mr. SHELLABARGER. Will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I will yield to the gentleman one at a time.

Mr. SHELLABARGER. I desire the gentleman before he closes to answer two questions. Perhaps he has already sufficiently answered them, and perhaps not. I am not certain about that. I understand him to state that the main difference between the bill as it comes from the Senate and the bill as it passed the House is in the fact that it makes large appropriations for carrying out about eleven treaties made with different tribes of Indians.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I think that is the number.

Mr. SHELLABARGER. The first question I want to ask is whether the right of the House or the propriety of the House declining to concur in the Senate amendments depends solely upon the right of the House to make appropriations for a treaty which the House thinks the Senate and the Executive ought not to have made? Whether in considering these amendments there is any other discretion or right which the House has in the matter except it be the right to look into the propriety of making a treaty and of providing for its execution by making the requisite appropriations?

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I will give the gentleman all that has occurred to my mind on the subject in our discussions in the committee-room. It was said that all treaties that called for appropriations of money to carry them out are always within the control of the House. For example, suppose we should make a treaty with Russia to purchase Alaska and, as we have a perfect right to do so, suppose we should not appropriate the money to carry out that treaty. That is one of the few privileges which yet are supposed to belong to the House. We have a right at any and all times to say we will or will not appropriate money to carry out a treaty or for any other purpose. That power was exercised by the House of Commons of England many years ago in regard to a treaty between Great Britain and Spain, I believe. The House refusing to appropriate the necessary money and to pass the necessary laws to carry it out, it being a treaty of commerce in regard to revenue; and that treaty remains unexecuted, so far as England is concerned, to-day.

Mr. SHELLABARGER. I agree fully with the statement just made by the gentleman, and by my question I did not mean to indicate that the House was bound to carry out any treaty which required the appropriation of money unless it should deem it wise to do so; but I meant to bring the mind of the committee to the position in which we are at this time and to inquire whether we have any other thing to consider than the question whether it is a treaty fit to be made and carried out? If it is not the gentleman has answered that. I understand that these eleven treaties have been made and proclaimed and that everything has been done as to them that the Senate and the Executive can do, and the only remedy now is for the House to stop right here.

The other question that I wish to ask is what there is, if anything, which has been yielded up by these Indian tribes as consideration for these large stipulations in their favor, except the matter which has been alluded to, namely, that we are to have peace in return for these appropriations and expenditures? Is there anything in the way of relinquishment of reservations of land or anything of that kind that would commend these treaties to our favor?

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. In the treaties made by the peace commission there has been no cession of land, because these Indians were roaming Indians who did not seem to have any fixed habitations or lands they could claim as their own except possessio pedis. In the treaty made with the Ute Indians and in one or two treaties made by Governor Hunt and Kit Carson there has been land ceded, but the general theory upon which the treaties have proceeded is that the Indians shall be got together upon reservations and fed there and kept there and made self-sustaining, if possible, and the consideration they give is peace.

Let me read from one of these treaties the consideration:

"ARTICLE I.

"From this day forward peace between the parties to this treaty shall forever continue. The Government of the United States desires peace and its honor is hereby pledged to keep it. The Indians desire peace and they hereby pledge their honor to maintain it. If bad men among the whites or among other people subject to the authority of the United States shall commit any wrong upon the person or property of the Indians the United States will, upon proof made to the agent and forwarded to the Commissioner of Indian Affairs at Washington city, proceed at once to cause the offender to be arrested and punished according to the laws of the United States, and also reimburse the injured person for the loss sustained.

"If bad men among the Indians shall commit a wrong or depredation upon the person or property of any one, white, black, or Indian, subject to the authority of the United States and at peace therewith, the Indians herein named solemnly agree that they will, on proof made to their agent and notice by him, deliver up the wrongdoer to the United States, to be tried and punished according to its laws; and in case they refuse wilfully so to do, the person injured shall be reimbursed for his loss from the annuities or other moneys due or to become due to them under this or other treaties made with the United States. And the President, on advising with the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, shall prescribe such rules and regulations for ascertaining damages under the provisions of this article as in his judgment may be proper. But no such damages shall be adjusted and paid until thoroughly examined and passed upon by the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, and no one sustaining loss while violating or because of his violating the provisions of this treaty or the laws of the United States shall be reimbursed therefor."

That is the theory of all these treaties. The whole matter resolves itself into this: are we in future to deal with these Indians by treaties and carry out this policy or are we to deal with them in a different manner? I want to impress upon the House once more that this is a very difficult and important question. Many western men tell the committee that if these treaties are not carried out there will be war all along the western border and we shall lose many hundreds of lives, and that one month of war would be destructive to more property than the amount now involved.

Mr. MUNGEN. I desire to ask the gentleman a question in good faith.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I will hear it.

Mr. MUNGEN. I wish to ask whether in any of these amendments the Senate have granted any more than the treaties to which he refers bind us to give the Indians?

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I do not think they have, except perhaps that there has been a little lavishness of appropriation. I will give the gentleman an instance of what I mean. Where a physician is provided for they give him fifteen hundred or two thousand dollars a year when perhaps we might provide one for less.

Mr. MUNGEN. That is a matter outside the treaties. I was speaking of the regular annuities.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. No, sir; they give nothing but what the treaties require.

Mr. MUNGEN. Under the Constitution of the United States these treaties when adopted are something like the laws of the Medes and Persians. Notwithstanding the statement of the gentleman about what has been done by the House of Commons in regard to a treaty between Great Britain and Spain I believe that when a treaty is made by the authorized power of the Government—by the Executive, be he who he may, and ratified by the Senate—that treaty is binding in all of its stipulations upon this House, and that we are under obligations as members of this House to carry it out; and if the gentleman admits that the Senate have asked for nothing more in the shape of annuities for the Indians than the treaties between us and the Indians call for then we are bound to carry out those treaties. I believe that to be so and I intend so to vote.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I want to say right here that there should be no prejudice against any of these treaties because they have been signed by the present President of the United States. He has had nothing to do with them except to do what seemed to be his duty to carry out the wishes of the peace commission sent out to those Indians.

Mr. MUNGEN. Very few of them have been signed by the President.

Mr. ALLISON. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Certainly.

Mr. ALLISON. I desire to know of the gentleman whether these appropriations apply to treaties which have recently been made, and whether we are now called upon for the first time to make appropriations under these treaties?

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. The treaties made by this peace commission, substantially, yes.

Mr. ALLISON. I understand that these treaties run for a long period of time, for many years, and if we enter upon these appropriations now we therefore substantially give the sanction and recognition of the law-making power of the Government to the faithful carrying out of these treaties in the future.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Yes, sir.

Mr. ALLISON. And we would be regarded as having violated these treaties if we fail at any time in the future to make the appropriations called for by them.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Undoubtedly.

Mr. ALLISON. I presume the Committee on Appropriations have made careful examination of this whole subject. I would be glad, therefore, to have the gentleman now in charge of this bill to say to the House what his best judgment is in reference to what should be our action on this whole subject.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I have but three or four minutes left. I want to say exactly this: the subject was so vast in its consequences and of such great moment, involving so many difficulties and such great controversies, that I did not desire, and I do not now desire, to take that very great responsibility. I am only responsible, and so far as I know have relieved myself of it, for the faithful detail of the facts to members of the House. I have stated those facts to them, and now submit it to their decision.

Mr. LOGAN. May I interrupt the gentleman a moment right here?

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Certainly.

Mr. LOGAN. I have listened with a great deal of interest to the remarks of the gentleman. But I have been unable yet to ascertain whether the Committee on Appropriations desire us to vote for these appropriations or not. I want to know whether the Committee on Appropriations desire us to concur or non-concur in the amendments of the Senate to this bill.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. We have reported in favor of non-concurring in all these amendments, for the purpose of bringing the subject before the House. I have stated that in regard to class appropriations, this great question of a policy with the Indians, the Committee on Appropriations felt a delicacy in making any positive recommendation, and in regard to some other of the amendments we have very decided opinions.

Mr. SCOFIELD. Will the gentleman allow me to make a remark at this point?

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Certainly.

Mr. SCOFIELD. Then I would say in reply to the inquiry of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. LOGAN] that I have the honor to be a member of the Committee on Appropriations, and I understand that every member of that committee is most decidedly hostile to the amendments of the Senate, believing that they involve the deepest villainy of anything that has been before this House for a great many years.

[Here the hammer fell.]

The CHAIRMAN. The hour of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BUTLER] has expired.

Mr. BURLEIGH. I desire to make a few remarks upon this subject.

Mr. LOGAN. Will the gentleman allow me to say a few words?

Mr. BURLEIGH. If I can yield to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. LOGAN] without surrendering the floor I will do so.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman can yield and then resume the floor when he chooses to do so.

Mr. BURLEIGH. Then I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. LOGAN. I want to say in response to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SCOFIELD] that I have understood all the time that the Committee on Appropriations have investigated this case and believed that there were frauds covered up in this proposition, and my object was to get that statement before the House. If there are frauds, or if the committee believe there are frauds covered up in this proposition, which I myself believe, I want them to say so to the House and let a committee of conference be appointed to investigate them.

Mr. BURLEIGH. I have listened with a great deal of interest to the remarks of the honorable gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr.

BUTLER] in his discussion of the bill now under consideration. But I do not distinctly understand what the Committee on Appropriations desire the House to do, what action they desire it to take in this matter. Many of the honorable gentleman's remarks appear reasonable, and unmistakably indicate that in this as in every other financial measure with which he has anything to do he has probed it as near to the bottom as his information would admit. That this bill as it came back from the Senate has some imperfections I am free to admit. That some of the amendments made to it in that body appropriate more money than is absolutely necessary for an economical administration of our Indian affairs I do not doubt. But some of the gentleman's statements, I regret to say, do not square with the facts as I know them to exist. I know this is not intentional, for I am free to say that from a close scrutiny of his course as a member of the Committee on Appropriations I have been forced to the conclusion that the public good alone rules his actions here.

But, sir, I do not believe the amount added to the bill by the Senate for the purpose of carrying out the provisions of the treaties made by the peace commissioners, and especially that made with the Sioux nation, is one dollar in excess of the amount absolutely demanded for that purpose. We have been informed that the amount appropriated for carrying into effect this treaty with the Sioux will give to every member of that tribe an outfit better than a majority of white men have when they start out in the world for themselves. Let us bear in mind, sir, that the Sioux nation numbers thirty thousand souls; that they have been the occupants of the country from the British lines to the Republican, from the Mississippi to the base of the Rocky mountains; that their chief subsistence has been upon the buffalo, now fast disappearing before the advance of civilization. They are to-day the most powerful of all the Indian tribes. The Government invaded their country and took possession of their choicest hunting grounds without first treating with them. This it did for the purpose of establishing military posts, building railways and wagon-roads. Thousands and tens of thousands of miners are located in the mountain districts. The result of this contact has been unnumbered outrages upon the persons and property of the Indians; the consequence of these outrages has been our Indian wars.

Now, sir, let us bear in mind that the commissioners of the Government found these Indians in this demoralized condition, naked and suffering from the result of our national faithlessness toward them. They saw that it was not possible to restore and maintain peaceful relations between them and the white population of the West, so long as the two races remained in contact, each contending for the exclusive right to occupy the Indians' country, where they had roamed and enjoyed undisputed possession from time immemorial. Their only remedy was to gather them together, treat with them for their lands, remove and locate them upon reservations where they might live unmolested by white men, and place them in a situation where they can live and learn the habits of civilized life. I ask if there is anything wrong in this? Does not common humanity demand that this mighty nation should do this much for the remaining representatives of the once powerful tribes that formerly possessed every acre of our broad national domain? Would justice to these people be satisfied with anything less than this?

The Indian is a man and a brother; weakened it is true, by our tyrannical power, impoverished by our rapacity, brutalized by our practices, but still one of God's children and entitled to justice at the hands of this Christian nation. The only practical question now worth considering is, shall this Congress extend it to them, or shall this remnant of the race be left to linger and die by our cruelty and neglect?

Gentlemen on the opposite side of this question from myself speak scornfully of the views expressed by the peace commissioners, who were sent to the Indian country by an act of this Congress to ascertain the cause of our past and present troubles with the hostile tribes. They treat with contempt the valuable information which these commissioners obtained there, as well as their subsequent action in negotiating these important treaties of peace and friendship with those people, by which war has ceased and peace is restored between our citizens and every hostile tribe, with which we have kept the faith and fairly carried out our pledges to them.

Let it be remembered, sir, that we have driven these people to the verge of despair and forced them to the very gates of death. By the wise and humane policy adopted by our peace commission—the creature of this Congress, acting under authority of the law which you made for this express purpose—the initiatory steps have been taken which, if carried out in good faith by the Government, will put a stop to our cruel, murderous, brutal Indian wars forever and relieve the national Treasury of a drain of hundreds of millions of dollars. Peace, lasting, permanent peace, will again return to our western Territories, and prosperity will once more smile upon our people.

Now, sir, since so much has been said about the extravagance of these treaties and the lack of wisdom in making them, perhaps it would be well to let the House and the country know who the commissioners were to whom you intrusted this important duty. I say you, for I wish to be understood what I mean when I state that this Congress passed a law creating this commission, and out of the seven commissioners you selected four of its number from civil life and left the President to select the other three from the officers of the Army, and that you appropriated $450,000 to enable these commissioners to make these identical treaties, which have now been ratified by the Senate and proclaimed by the President of the United States and are to-night the supreme law of this land, and Congress is bound to appropriate the necessary money to carry them into effect or admit our national faithlessness and declare the Treasury bankrupt.

The gentlemen selected by Congress for the purpose of negotiating these treaties were Senator HENDERSON, Hon. N. G. Taylor, Commissioner of Indian Affairs, General Sanborne, and Colonel Tappan. Those selected by the President were Lieutenant General Sherman, Major General Harney, and Major General Terry.

These are the persons who were selected to go into the Indian country, ascertain the cause of our Indian difficulties, and to inaugurate and carry into practical operation some plan for their settlement. They are the men of all others who enjoyed your confidence and the confidence of the executive department of the Government, and were selected on account of their integrity, patriotism, and large experience to discharge the duties assigned them. They are all gentlemen of spotless character and large experience in Indian affairs, while several of them have by devotion to their country been awarded a bright place on the page of our country's history which time alone can efface.

These treaties were not negotiated, as some gentlemen suppose, merely to purchase peace with the warlike tribes, but for the right of way through the country occupied by them and for the acquisition of large and extensive territory both on the western prairies and in the rich mining districts of the mountains.

But, sir, we have not kept these treaties; the Indians waited for weeks and months after their stipulations should have been fulfilled; Congress delayed to make the necessary appropriations to carry them into effect, and but for the just and humane course pursued by General Harney in incurring the responsibility of supplying the necessary means of support which had been agreed upon in their treaty the Sioux nation would now be engaged with the southwestern tribes in their war against our people. It is a humiliating confession to make, but I am confident that in no one instance has our Government ever carried out in good faith a treaty made with an Indian tribe, from the time that we treated with the Delawares at Fort Pitt, on the 17th day of September, 1778, to our treaty with the Sioux, in 1868.

Look through the seventh volume of your Statutes-at-Large, and in that volume of our national faithlessness every page is a living record of plighted faith to these people that never has been kept by the Government.

It has been stated that this bill went from this House to the Senate appropriating between two and three million dollars; that it comes back here with amendments by which it is increased to between four and five million dollars, and without any cause for this great increase. But it must be remembered that when this bill was sent from here to the Senate, the Sioux treaty had not been ratified, and it contained no appropriation for carrying its provisions into effect. While the bill was in the hands of the committee that treaty was ratified and proclaimed by the President, and the Senate placed in the bill the $1,700,000 necessary to carry it into effect, and also the $480,000 deficiency, which money is now being used for the Indians who made the treaty, to subsist them until the opening of navigation on the Missouri river.

Again, we are told that notwithstanding these treaties have been concluded by the commissioners, ratified by the Senate, and proclaimed by the President, that the House of Representatives is to be consulted before it will consent to appropriate the necessary means to carry them into effect. The case of Alaska is cited as one in point. There is a wide difference in the two treaties. Alaska was foreign territory, treated for and acquired by the Executive without a word of consultation with Congress, while these treaties were negotiated by a commission which was created by Congress for this express purpose by authority of a positive law, and the necessary amount of money was at the time appropriated to enable the commissioners to discharge the duties assigned them.

These treaties are now before you; they are the supreme law of the land, made by your positive direction, confirmed by the Senate, and proclaimed by the President of the United States. And I ask if there is a lawyer or a statesman here, who in view of these facts will get up here or elsewhere and refuse to appropriate the necessary money to carry out these treaties in good faith?

General Harney, who had been a party to these negotiations, was selected to go up the Missouri and take charge of the Sioux tribes. It was late in the season when he undertook this difficult duty. The Missouri river was so low, the navigation so difficult, that the rates of transportation were more than doubled. All of his machinery, agricultural, and mechanical implements, and provisions, except beef, had to be transported hundreds of miles up the Missouri river in steamers. The prairies had burnt off for several hundred miles; in fact every imaginable obstacle opposed his progress. General Auger had already started Spotted Tail and his bands from the Platte to their new home on the Missouri. The hostile Yantonnais, Blackfeet, Sioux, Brulés, Two Kettles, Onchapas, Minneconjoux, Sans Arcs, Ogallallas, and Cut Head bands had been invited in. Workhouses had to be built, mill erected, and supplies enough got into that remote country to subsist fifteen thousand Indians for six months. A failure to accomplish this would have been a violation of the treaty on the part of the Government and rekindled the Indian war on the Missouri. No man knew this better than General Harney. He realized that the issue of peace and war were in his hands; he took the responsibility and prevented that war.

The flour and beef alone for the support of these Indians for six months would amount to three times the amount placed in his hands.

He had no alternative but to go forward and carry out the plan inaugurated by the peace commissioners or abandon the undertaking altogether. By his determined, persistent efforts in carrying out this great work of pacification, I am confident that has prevented a north-western Indian war that would have cost the Government more than thirty million dollars.

This, sir, has been the result of sending to that country a man of experience and integrity, whose life in the Army, where he has seen more than fifty years of honorable service, much of which has been on our western frontiers, has forced upon the minds of all who knew him, the Indian as well as the white man, that justice and honesty are ingrained into every principle of his nature.

We are told that the peace commissioners were too extravagant, that they promised the Indians too much; but when you come to examine it the amount is really very small indeed. For the first year the amount will not exceed sixty dollars per year to each Indian over four years old, after which time it will not be more than one third of this amount for each member of the tribe.

But what is this insignificant sum when compared with our past policy of fighting them. In 1863 and 1864 the Government expended more than thirty million dollars in carrying on a war with these same Sioux Indians, during the whole of which time our troops did not kill twenty of their warriors, although I believe they slaughtered some seventy peaceable Indians, most of whom were women and helpless children. Whatever opinions others may entertain I know that no such plan of wisdom and economy has ever before been adopted by the Government as this one of feeding and clothing instead of fighting the Indians.

The comparatively small sum called for to carry into effect these treaties for the purposes designed by the commissioners will be better invested and yield larger returns to the Treasury than it would if invested at five hundred per cent. interest. Let this Congress at once appropriate the money asked for to keep our plighted faith with these people and thereby prevent the renewal of hostilities in that country by our faithlessness; let us do justice to these people for once and thereby prevent another Sioux war, which would be so expensive to the Government, so ruinous to our people.

In the Southwest our present war policy is costing the Government more than a thousand dollars per head annually for every Indian, regardless of age or sex; while our peace policy is costing about sixty dollars per head annually for those over four years of age.

Mr. TAFFE. I should like to ask the gentleman whether those thirty thousand Indians under General Harney are upon the old or the new reservation?

Mr. BURLINGHAM. I did not say they were on the one or the other, but I will state for the gentleman's information that nearly all of them are on their new reservation. Let us bear in mind that the hostile Sioux did not ask for this treaty; they have been too successful in the wars which our Government has waged against them to feel that they were either conquered or subdued. It was the United States, through its commissioners, that sued for peace, and not the Indians. In the years 1866 and 1867 alone they captured from our frontier posts and drove off from our settlers more than five million dollars' worth of stock and killed fifty white men for every Indian warrior captured or killed by our troops. It was the United States, by your direction, that surrendered, and not the Sioux. They held their ground and you abandoned your forts and surrendered the Powder river country to them; not that you desired to, but because you could not hold it without incurring an expenditure of life and treasure too great to be thought of.

We should bear in mind that a great deal of the money asked for in this bill for the Sioux is for the purpose of establishing their agencies, erecting permanent buildings, breaking up their fields, and for purchasing farming implements and cattle. These expenditures will not be required after this year.

Full one half of the whole Indian population of the country is now located on reservations, their permanent improvements are completed, while the annual cost of supporting them does not exceed $2,000,000 a year. It is remarked by a gentleman that not one dollar in fifty of the money appropriated ever reaches the Indians. Well, sir, if this be his opinion I would suggest that we employ some honest member of Congress to go out into the Indian country and inspect matters there.

[Laughter.] Let some honest man be sent out there to see that the Indians receive what Congress appropriates for them, and if we cannot find such a man anywhere on this broad earth, let us appeal to the Almighty to send such a one down from the bright regions above to perform this duty for us. [Laughter.]

Fraud, corruption, and robbery of the Indians by their agents have been the curse of the white man ever since I first heard of an Indian agent. Demoralization, licentiousness, debauchery, and murder by our soldiers have been the undying curse of the Indian from the first day that I visited the Indian country to the present; and I assert here that the more honest, upright, and conscientious the Indian agent in the remote West who has charge of a tribe of Indians, especially if he undertakes to prevent drunkenness, debauchery, and vice among them by excluding unprincipled white men, the more will he be slandered and the greater villain will he be regarded.

Mr. Speaker, I have detained the House longer than I intended; and let me say in conclusion that but two ways are left open to us: we have either to feed and clothe or fight these people. Feed and clothe them, keep our treaty obligations, and we shall have uninterrupted peace; fail to do so, and we shall have war, a long, cruel, and interminable war that will only cease by the utter extermination of the entire Indian race. And I ask you, sir, I ask this House and the country, if judging by the lights of past history we are in a condition for this gigantic undertaking? This is not my opinion alone, but the opinion of General Terry, who commands the department of the Northwest; it is the opinion of General Harney, who has had more experience in Indian warfare and in the management of the Indians of the West than any other officer in the Army; and it is the settled belief of more than ninety per cent. of the intelligent men of the West who are most familiar with this subject.

I yield the remainder of my time to the gentleman from Minnesota, [Mr. WINDOM.]

Mr. WINDOM. Mr. Chairman, this is one of the most important questions that has been presented to this Congress. I am not now going to discuss those provisions of the bill referred to by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BUTLER] which make appropriations for certain claims, nor that other provision which seemed to excite the mirth of certain gentlemen about paying the Indians for stealing, but shall confine my remarks to the great question, namely, shall we comply with our treaty stipulations with these Indians or not? Gentlemen stand here on this floor and discuss the question whether the Constitution obliged us to carry out those treaties or not. I apprehend, sir, that the Sioux Indians and the other wild Indians on the plains are not very good constitutional lawyers, and that however we may decide this question of constitutional law it will not obviate the results of a breach of faith on our part. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SCOFIELD] says that these treaties are most unmitigated frauds, or at least that the appropriation made by the Senate of the United States in compliance with them is an unmitigated fraud. Now, Mr. Chairman, I desire to call the attention of the committee for a moment to the circumstances under which these treaties were made, and under which the gentlemen who made the treaties were sent to the Indian country. In July, 1867, an Indian war was being waged upon the plains which according to General Grant's statement, cost $1,000,000 per week, or at the rate of $50,000,000 per annum. With that fact staring us in the face Congress decided that something must be done. The Senate passed a bill naming a certain commission to go to the Indian country and ascertain how, if possible, the causes of the war could be removed and wars obviated in the future. They sent that bill to the House of Representatives and it received our sanction. Now, I desire to inform the House who constituted that commission which the gentleman from Pennsylvania says has been guilty of perpetrating the most shameful frauds upon the country.

Mr. SCOFIELD. I have not said any such thing.

Mr. WINDOM. The gentleman stated in the hearing of the House within the last fifteen minutes that the appropriation made by the Senate to comply with these treaties was a shameful fraud, or words to that effect.

Mr. SCOFIELD. Not at all. I said the Senate amendments. A portion of them are to comply with treaties, but a large portion, and some of the most rascally of them, were put in not even under the authority of treaties.

Mr. WINDOM. Then the gentleman did not apply his remarks to the appropriations to carry out the treaties made by the peace commission?

Mr. SCOFIELD. I applied them to the Senate amendments generally.

Mr. WINDOM. Did he apply them to the Senate amendments to carry out the treaties made by the peace commission?

Mr. SCOFIELD. In part.

Mr. WINDOM. Then the gentleman had as well not have taken my time to contradict me, for he now admits that he did say the appropriations made by the Senate to carry out treaties made by the peace commission are frauds. Why are they frauds? The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BUTLER] does not insist that there is anything in these amendments which is not necessary to carry out these treaties, and yet the gentleman from Pennsylvania says that this is a fraud. I am therefore corroborated rather than contradicted by the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Now, Mr. Chairman, who perpetrated this enormous fraud upon the country? Bear in mind the circumstances under which this peace commission went out. An expenditure at the rate of $50,000,000 a year was depleting the Treasury and something must be done to prevent it. The Senate and House of Representatives united in selecting the best men that could be found in the nation to go out into the Indian country and ascertain what could be done to save us this vast expenditure, and the united wisdom of these two bodies selected the following gentlemen: N. G. Taylor, Commissioner of Indian Affairs; J. B. HENDERSON, Senator of the United States; W. T. Sherman, Lieutenant General of the Army of the United States; William S. Harney, brevet major general, a gentleman who has seen more Indian service than any man on this continent or in the world; John B. Sanborn, another gentleman who has had long experience in the Army and in the Indian country; Alfred H. Terry, brevet major general; S. F. Tappan, and C. C. Augur, brevet major general.

Mr. Chairman, I apprehend that when that commission was appointed there was not a man in this whole land who believed that more honest, more honorable, or a more intelligent commission could possibly be found within the boundaries of the United States. When this commission went out to the Indian country several of them believed in the war policy which has prevailed in this House. They spent a year or more in that country and came back completely converted from that theory to the more sensible one which they recommend in their report. These gentlemen having this matter in special charge, devoting more than a year to its investigation on the ground and among the Indians, after considering the whole question came to the conclusion that the only way to save to the country this great loss of life and treasure is the mode which they have adopted, as expressed in the treaties under consideration.

Mr. DODGE. I desire to ask the gentleman one question. Does the gentleman assert that the members of the commission to which he refers favor to-day the same policy that they supported when those treaties were made? Are they all in favor now of carrying out these treaties and making these appropriations?

Mr. WINDOM. Yes, sir; they are all in favor of it.

Mr. DODGE. Has not General Sherman said that the Indians having gone to war we must whip them before we feed them?

Mr. WINDOM. General Sherman may have made use of such remarks in regard to the Indians in the southern part of the country, with whom we are at war.

Mr. DODGE. Does not this treaty provide for two tribes of the South, the Arapahoes and Cheyennes? Is not a part of this appropriation designed for them?

Mr. WINDOM. It is true, I believe, that with regard to the Indians referred to by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. DODGE] General Sherman has made such a declaration. The gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CLARKE] called the attention of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BUTLER] to the fact that there were certain Indians with whom treaties were made who were to-day at war with us. That is also true. Last summer we were informed that unless money should be appropriated to carry out our treaty stipulations with those very Cheyennes and Arapahoes we should have war with them. We did not make that appropriation and war has followed, as it was then predicted by myself and others that war would follow. And General Sherman has said that he has exhausted the peace policy with those tribes and that we must now fight them. But if we had kept our agreements with them we would, in my opinion, have no war to-day. And I know from personal consultation with General Sherman that he agreed with me in this opinion. However, I was simply calling the attention of the House to the question as to who it was that committed these unmitigated frauds upon the country. I have referred to the character of the men who made the treaties and who are responsible for the frauds, if frauds they be, and to their means of knowing what was best to be done under the circumstances. Now, sir, let me say that the question as to what shall be our Indian policy now meets us face to face. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BUTLER] has very fairly stated the issue before the country to-day. We are called upon to-night and in this Chamber to settle this most important and difficult question. We cannot dodge it. The Senate has tendered to us the issue. Our settlements have pressed the Indian back until he can go no further. One of our railroads already extends across the continent, and others we hope will soon do so. The miner has penetrated every mountain, and on almost every prairie our pioneers and farmers are staking out their homes for settlement and cultivation. The question cannot be longer shirked. We have driven those Indians from the Atlantic sea-board to the mountains and plains of the West. They can go no further. The returning tide of emigration already meets them from the Pacific coast. The march of civilization cannot be and should not be checked. We must provide for the wants of the Indian or fight him, and we must act at once. Our action on this bill will decide that question. It has been asked here to-night whether the Indians have given up any lands? Look over this whole broad country, from the Atlantic to the Rocky mountains, and you behold the lands that those Indians have given up. They are not mere pensioners upon your bounty. You have thus far robbed them of everything. You have made treaties with them and you have violated them. You have made treaties with them ever since the organization of the Government, and I believe the gentleman from Dakota [Mr. BURLEIGH] is not far wrong when he says that you have never kept one of those treaties from that day down to the present time. We have taken from them all they had. A short time ago they had hunting-grounds in the West, but now the iron-horse is heard among them and the buffalo is disappearing. Either those Indians must starve or fight or we must feed them. The issue, then, is fairly and squarely presented to this House and we must meet it. What shall we do?

Now, recurring again to this commission, let me say that we authorized those men to go out to that country and make treaties. They did make those treaties. To illustrate my position, let me refer to the Sioux Indians. The commissioners agreed that those tribes should be brought upon three reservations. They were brought upon them. Less than one year has elapsed since that treaty was made. Those Indians came upon the reservation in obedience to our call. They came there trusting the faith of this great nation. They came there under not merely an implied but an absolute and perfect pledge of faith on the part of the United States—a pledge made not merely by the Senate of the United States and the President, but the positive pledge of this House as well as of the Senate. This House joined in sending the commission to that country. We expressly authorized that commission to make those treaties in order to secure peace. The commission did make those treaties. The Indians, in pursuance of the treaties, came upon the reservations. That was only one year ago. And now the monstrous proposition is entertained by this House to violate our national faith thus solemnly pledged.

We are asked what will be the result. I will tell you what it will be. It will be precisely the same that it has ever been heretofore. Whenever we have violated faith by refusing to pay a dollar justly due we have paid from ten to a thousand dollars as a penalty for such national dishonor.

I know, Mr. Chairman, that the amounts summed up by the gentleman from Massachusetts are startling. I wish we could maintain peace by paying less. I wish we could maintain our faith by paying less. But, sir, these figures are not half so startling as the war accounts brought in to be audited and settled for Indian wars. We are reminded to-night by the gentleman from Massachusetts of the policy pursued by General Harney in feeding the Indians on the Missouri river. We are told that it will cost the Government $650,000 to feed them for a year. Mr. Chairman, there are of those Indians from ten to twelve thousand. We have thus far kept our treaty obligations with them and they have kept their treaty obligations with us, and for a year our expenditures for twelve thousand Indians are about six hundred and fifty thousand dollars. Take the other case in the South; and I am glad that when this issue meets us as it does to-night there stand out so prominently these illustrations of the two policies between which we must choose. The policy pursued in the North under General Harney is the policy I advocate; that pursued in the South with reference to the Arapahoe and Cheyenne Indians is the policy which gentlemen on the other side of this question urge. It is a fortunate thing for us that now when we are called upon to settle this question these illustrations are presented so forcibly. We are asked to-night in this Indian bill to vote about five hundred thousand dollars to carry out the policy pursued by General Harney. We were called upon within the same week to vote as the result of the other policy a deficiency bill amounting to $19,000,000, and I think that at least $15,000,000 of that deficiency was for the Indian war.

Thus in one case we kept our treaty obligations, and it cost us $650,000 all told to take care of twelve thousand Indians. In the other case we violated our word, stood out before the world as faithless to our treaty obligations, and it cost us at least $15,000,000 to take care of not more than six thousand Indians. Honesty is the best policy for nations as well as for individuals, and I beg gentlemen to try the experiment for once with the Indian tribes. Is it not worth while to try it if only for the novelty of the sensation?

Mr. Chairman, these Indians with whom we have been at war are upon the most accessible parts of the country; they are upon the southern plains. If we had done as it is now proposed to do; if we had violated our treaty faith with the Sioux Indians and put them upon the war-path, they would have fled to the mountains of the North, when it would have been impossible for forty thousand men to conquer them. The peace commissioners give us some information as to the success of our Indian wars heretofore. I wish I had more time to read what they say; but I will give a specimen. After speaking of a war that was wholly inexcusable on our part, produced by our breach of faith, they use this language:

"Many will be astonished that a war ensued which cost the Government $30,000,000 and carried conflagration and death to the border settlements. During the spring and summer of 1865 no less than eight thousand troops were withdrawn from the effective forces engaged in suppressing the rebellion to meet this Indian war. The result of the year's campaign satisfied all sensible men that war with Indians was both useless and expensive."

This is in the report which is signed by General Sherman, General Terry, General Sanborn, General Augur, and General Harney. A million dollars for each Indian killed! Yet, sir, we pause to consider the question whether we shall so act as to stir up an Indian war throughout the States and Territories of the West. We are told by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BUTLER] that if we adopt the policy of the Senate amendments it will cost us hereafter at the rate of $12,000,000 per annum. I read recently a carefully prepared statement of what Indian wars heretofore have cost us, and it was there shown that the expense to the Government was more than twenty million dollars a year for the last forty years. I will put it, for the sake of the argument, at only one half of that sum, and say that for the last forty years the Government has expended $10,000,000 a year for Indian wars. Nearly all of those wars might have been avoided if the policy of peace and good faith which is now proposed had been adopted and pursued by the Government. Look, if you please, at the comparative expense of this enormous estimate made by the gentleman from Massachusetts and the expense of carrying on an Indian war. I think the gentleman estimates it one hundred per cent. too high. Six millions will, I am quite sure, much more than cover it. But admit for the present that he is correct. General Sherman stated before the Military Committee, and I think the members of that committee will bear me out in what I am going to state, that to support a regiment of infantry on the plains costs $1,000,000 a year, and to support a regiment of cavalry at least $2,000,000 a year. That being the case it would take but a short Indian war to amount to many times more than would be necessary to carry out these treaty stipulations. What is proposed, therefore, is a matter of the wisest economy, to say nothing about the public faith and the public honor. To carry out these treaty stipulations, therefore, is alike due to the public faith which has been pledged and to the spirit of humanity which ought to actuate the dealings of a powerful republican Government.

The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BUTLER] says if we refuse to make these appropriations, what then? The answer stands out on every page of American history. The "what then" will be a troublesome and expensive Indian war. While I am not a defender of the Indian, still I believe there is not a civilized nation on the face of the earth which would treat the Indians as we have treated them. If any of those nations had made a treaty with us, and that nation had not kept its faith or carried out its obligations under their treaty, neither the gentleman from Massachusetts nor any one now acting with him would hesitate for a moment to say in that event that we should go to war. How, then, can we expect more of savages, who know nothing about international laws? They only know that you have pledged yourself by treaty to give them these provisions for which these appropriations are made, and if you do not give them they know of no other means of obtaining redress except by going to war. And, sir, fight they will if we do not carry out the treaties made with them in 1868; and if they do we will have upon our hands an Indian war which will cost us hundreds of millions of dollars and thousands of lives. I have not had the opportunity to examine any of these treaties until to-night, but I say that it will cost us at least $50,000,000 a year if we shall fail to carry them out. And as I shall not have after this another opportunity to be heard on the Indian question I wish to put upon record this prophecy: that if we shall fail to carry out these treaties such breach of faith will cost us from forty to fifty million dollars a year.

I yield the remainder of my time to the gentleman from California.

Mr. HIGBY. Mr. Chairman, I did not hear all of the remarks which were made by the member from Massachusetts, [Mr. BUTLER,] but I heard part of them, and I heard the question of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. SHELLABARGER.] I have also heard other gentlemen who, whether they addressed the Chair or the committee, have certainly spoken loudly enough to be heard by a large portion of the members of the House. They have told us that the President and Senate had exercised a power in making these treaties which they did not possess under the Constitution. It is the same question which was raised under the treaty with Russia by which we acquired Alaska.

I beg leave to call the attention of the committee to something that we have on the statute-book which goes further to control this House than any arguments that have been made or any question that has been raised with reference to the treaty for the purchase of Alaska. My friend from Minnesota [Mr. WINDOM] has indicated what that is. He has referred to the report made by the commissioners authorized by Congress to go and make the investigation. These commissioners were authorized by act of Congress to do just what they did do. Now, what were they authorized to do? The report begins as follows:

"The undersigned commissioners appointed under the act of Congress approved July 20, 1867, to establish peace with certain hostile Indian tribes were authorized by said act to call together the chiefs and head men of such bands of Indians," &c.

The report goes on to specify what the powers of the commissioners were as conferred by act of Congress, and among other things they were authorized to make treaties with the Indian tribes—not to refer to Congress—that is not the language of the act; but "to make such treaty stipulations, subject to the action of the Senate, as may remove all just causes of complaint on their part." Those are the words of the act. But that it may be better understood I will send the act itself to the Clerk's desk and ask him to read the first section, so that the members of this committee may see where the foundation lies for the action that was taken by the commissioners and by the Senate of the United States.

The Clerk read as follows:

"Be it enacted, &c., That the President of the United States be, and he is hereby, authorized to appoint a commission to consist of three officers of the Army not below the rank of brigadier general, who, together with N. G. Taylor, Commissioner of Indian Affairs; John B. Henderson, chairman of the Committee of Indian Affairs of the Senate; S. S. Tappan, and John B. Sanborn, shall have power and authority to call together the chiefs and head men of such bands or tribes of Indians as are waging war against the United States or committing depredations upon the people thereof, to ascertain the alleged reasons for their acts of hostility, and in their discretion, under the direction of the President, to make and conclude with said bands or tribes such treaty stipulations, subject to the action of the Senate, as may remove all just causes of complaint on their part and at the same time establish security for person and property along the lines of railroad now being constructed to the Pacific and other thoroughfares of travel to the western Territories, and such as will most likely insure civilization for the Indians and peace and safety for the whites."

Mr. HIGBY. Read also the seventh section.

The Clerk read as follows:

"SEC. 7. And be it further enacted, That said commissioners report their doings under this act to the President of the United States, including any such treaties and all correspondence as well as evidence by them taken."

Mr. HIGBY. Thus it appears that all the treaties that were made with these Indians by this commission were made under a law of Congress which this House united with the Senate in enacting, authorizing the treaties to be made by the commissioners and to be submitted to the Senate of the United States—not to the Congress of the United States—for ratification. So that instead of this being done by the treaty-making power that is exercised under the Constitution, in the right to exercise which this House was divided in its expression of opinion one year ago, it is made under a law of Congress approved July 20, 1867, and the action of the Senate with reference to the matter is based upon this law of Congress and not upon the power that body claims to exercise under the Constitution.

Furthermore, the last section which was read by the Clerk shows that the commissioners were not to refer the evidence that they took to Congress at all, but were to submit it, together with the treaties, to the President of the United States, and the whole subject was to be entirely under the control of the President and the Senate of the United States, as regards completing the treaties with the Indian tribes.

If, therefore, I am correct in basing all this proceeding upon this law of Congress, what becomes of the position taken by the member from Massachusetts, [Mr. BUTLER,] and I think I may infer of every member of the Committee on Appropriations, from the remark made by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. SCOFIELD,] as well as the position taken by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SHELLABARGER] in raising the question which he did? This House, together with the Senate, having passed this law and vested this authority to make these treaties where it has, it is too late for this body to undertake to raise the question whether the treaties were properly made.

Now, sir, I do not distinctly understand the insinuation of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. SCOFIELD,] I, however, gathered from the language which he used that some great wrong has been committed in the making of these treaties with the Indians by the Senate and the President of the United States, and that some at least of the amendments made to this bill by the Senate are based upon those treaties. Then, Mr. Chairman, the whole action of the Committee on Appropriations in rejecting all these amendments of the Senate, if a portion of them are for the purpose of carrying out these treaty stipulations, must be entirely erroneous if I am correct as to that law of July 20, 1867; for this House cannot undo that which has been accomplished by the joint action of the Senate and House of Representatives with the approval of the Executive.

Mr. Chairman, there has been a great deal of debate here upon this Indian question, and as upon the 4th of March I cease to be a servant of the people and become one of the sovereigns, and my voice cannot thereafter be raised here, it may be well enough for me to take this, probably the last opportunity I may have, to state that there was a special commission appointed at the close of the Thirty-Eighth Congress, consisting of four members of the House and three of the Senate, to make an investigation into the condition of our Indian affairs. The four members of the House who were upon that commission are still here, but upon the 4th of March next all four of them will cease to be members of Congress. Allow me to state the history of the proceedings of that commission or joint committee of the two Houses. The committee, seven in number—and the last of the three Senators goes out on the 4th of March—after making as thorough an investigation as they could make during the recess, dividing the Indian territory among them and making a personal inspection as far as possible, were unanimous in reporting a bill to Congress. It passed the Senate by a large majority and came to this House. Here it was taken in charge by the Committee on Military Affairs, and without any debate whatever in this House they struck out all after the enacting clause and put in its place a provision transferring the Indian Bureau to the War Department. That was the first movement in the face of the action of the joint committee and of their united judgment as reported to Congress after thorough investigation.

Sir, we have had another demonstration here within the last six weeks in the same direction. It is an effort on the part of this House to transfer the Indian Bureau to the War Department, and that no appropriations for the Indian service shall be made by Congress until the Senate succumbs to the wishes of this House upon the subject, instead of the Senate attempting to force anything upon this House. The Senate had taken the initiative upon this question and sent over here a bill which the joint committee by its unanimous judgment recommended as the best step to be taken in reference to our Indian affairs. I felt it due to that committee that this information should be communicated to the House. It is a fact that they ought to know and understand that the Senate passed that bill and that it came to this House. That bill provided for the appointment of inspectors. It proposed to divide the Indian territory into five districts and appoint three inspectors for each district, to make annual inspections of their districts and report to Congress in reference to their proceedings. That was the united judgment of the committee, but no one member of that committee was allowed to say one word upon the subject at the time and they have had little or no opportunity since. Had that bill passed the House and become a law by receiving the President's signature or being passed over his veto, and had these inspectors been appointed and made their inspection and furnished the information to Congress which they might have furnished, I have not the least doubt that this war which has cost the country millions upon millions might have been avoided. But no; our mouths were shut; no voice could be heard here in favor of that measure; there was but one sentiment prevailing here, and that was in favor of transferring the whole Indian Bureau to the War Department; and we who were upon that committee therefore feel ourselves relieved of all responsibility in regard to this matter.

The War Department is the most costly Department to which our Indian affairs could have been transferred. There is not a particle of doubt upon that point. And such will be the conclusion of members the more they investigate this matter. Those men who have spoken upon this floor, who know more practically about this subject than any others can know, all come to one and the same conclusion in reference to this matter. Do not tell me that it costs less to fight Indians than it does to feed them. One million dollars—what is it the report says? $1,000,000 I think it is—for each Indian who has been captured by the military. And I do not know how many hundreds of thousands and even millions of dollars, besides the lives of our soldiers, it will cost us to hunt these Indians over the wide, wild West.

Mr. WINDOM. I desire to call attention to a fact suggested by my colleague on the Committee on Indian Affairs [Mr. HIGBY] in connection with a fact which I stated a few moments since. I referred you to this peace commission, composed of gentlemen of the highest standing and character in this nation. I stated to you that they are unanimously in favor of this policy which I advocate here to-night. On that point I defy contradiction.

But in 1865 there was another Indian commission, referred to by the gentleman from California. [Mr. HIGBY,] consisting of four members of the House of Representatives and three members of the Senate of the United States. They divided up the Indian country and traveled nearly all over it. They took testimony of Indians in every part of that country; they thoroughly investigated this question, for they were sent out by the House and Senate for the express purpose of investigating it; and when they came back they made the report referred to by the gentleman from California. And in addition to that let me say that there is not one of that commission who is not to-night in favor of the policy advocated by the gentleman from California and myself. Of the members of the two commissions, the one sent out in 1865 and the one sent out in 1868, there is not a dissenting voice on that proposition. And yet in the face of all this testimony, in the face of this high military authority, we are called upon to violate our treaty faith.

The CHAIRMAN. The hour of the gentleman from Dakota [Mr. BURLEIGH] has expired.

Mr. WINDOM. Well, I hope we will now hear from the transfer of the Indian Bureau.

Mr. GARFIELD. I desire to call the attention of this Committee of the Whole to some of the startling facts developed in the bill now under consideration. I have aggregated the figures as furnished by the Committee on Appropriations and I call special attention to them.

At the commencement of this session the Secretary of the Interior, with all the Indian treaties then in existence before him, sent in estimates for appropriations for Indian purposes. The total amount of appropriations asked for in his estimates was $2,977,982, or $2,018 less than $3,000,000.

The Committee of Appropriations and the House of Representatives went over the whole subject and cut down the amount of the estimates about six hundred and fifty thousand dollars, so that the bill as it passed the House granted $2,312,000 for Indian purposes. Now what has happened? The Senate sends the bill back to us with an addition of $1,341,897. In other words, the total appropriations for Indian purposes as the Senate have returned the bill to us are $6,654,000; whereas less than $3,000,000 was asked for by the Secretary of the Interior for all Indian purposes, and less than $2,313,000 was granted by the House in the bill which we sent to the Senate.

Mr. WINDOM. Will the gentleman allow me to ask a question?

Mr. GARFIELD. I prefer not to be interrupted until I have finished my statement, then I will yield for explanations or questions.

Now, I call the attention of members to this startling fact, that the bill before us proposes to appropriate more than twice as much money as the Secretary of the Interior ever asked us to give him for Indian purposes and nearly three times as much as we granted. And on what grounds? Why, we are told that treaties have been made with the Indians. When? A bundle of these treaties are lying before us and I have not yet found one that bears date later than August, 1868. There may be later ones, but I have not seen them. All the provisions of these treaties were known to the Secretary of the Interior long before the commencement of this session of Congress. Now, has anything new transpired since we debated this bill in the House a few weeks ago? Have any new necessities arisen? "The treaties," it is said. But I am told these treaties are old, and since then events have occurred in the Indian country which have made them a stench in the nostrils of the American people. What are they? I have been examining them hastily and I am authorized by that examination to say that nearly one half of all the Indians whom the Senate proposes now to feed and clothe under these sacred treaties of which gentlemen talk have made war upon us since the treaties were made, and have thus broken the last thread of binding authority that the treaties possess. I have here a long list of the names of tribes with whom we have been fighting. It is now proposed, without peace made, without reconciliation, to pay the treasure of the United States into the hands of these warriors who fight us in summer and ask us to feed them in winter.

Mr. WINDOM. Before the gentleman leaves the point to which he has just referred I wish to ask him whether he asks this House to believe that all the Indians with whom treaties have been made are at war with us?

Mr. GARFIELD. I said nearly one half.

Mr. WINDOM. Will the gentleman inform the House what tribes with which we have made treaties are now at war with us?

Mr. GARFIELD. I will name some of them. The southern band of Cheyennes and Arapahoes, the bands of the Ogallalla and Brulé Sioux, led by chiefs whose names are beyond the range of my vocabulary—

Mr. WINDOM. Mr. Chairman—

Mr. GARFIELD. I cannot yield further. I must finish my statement.

I hold in my hand one of these treaties as a specimen of the lot. It is a treaty with the northern Cheyennes and northern Arapahoes, both of which tribes we have been fighting, because they began war upon us; and they are fighting to-day, I believe.

Mr. WINDOM. Will the gentleman yield at this point for a question?

Mr. GARFIELD. Not now. I want to call attention to the provisions of this treaty. According to the sixth article we are bound for the next thirty years to hunt up every male Indian at the age of fourteen and from that time forward for thirty years, and in September of each year we must deliver to that roaming, wild male Indian, what will be a mysterious outfit to many of them, a coat, a hat, a pair of pantaloons, a flannel shirt, and a pair of woolen socks. [Laughter.] If we are fortunate enough to catch this wild man of the desert and can get these unmentionable articles upon him, we shall then have performed that part of our treaty stipulations. But at any rate the articles are all to be purchased and sent out there; and the estimates of their cost, &c., must be made up by the Commissioner of Indian Affairs.

But more than that: we are not to satisfy ourselves with hunting Indian boys; a chase must also be after the fairer sex of that dusky race. Whenever an Indian girl reaches the age of twelve years, the paternal Government, through this Indian Bureau, is to seek her out and deliver over for her sole use and benefit the following named articles: a flannel skirt or the goods necessary to make it, a pair of woolen hose, twelve yards of calico, and twelve yards of cotton domestic. And then for the boys and girls under the ages named, we are to furnish such flannel and cotton goods as may be needed to make each a suit as aforesaid, together with a pair of woolen socks for each:

"And in order that the Commissioner of Indian Affairs may be able to estimate properly for the articles herein named, it shall be the duty of the agent each year to forward him a full and exact census of the Indians, on which the estimates from year to year can be made."

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. With the gentleman's permission I would state a single fact. There is no evidence of any census having yet been taken on which these appropriations are made except of one tribe.

Mr. GARFIELD. We think ourselves happy if the white men of this country can have a census taken once in ten years, but under these treaties we are compelled to take a census of these Indian tribes every year as the basis upon which these appropriations are to be made. Now, in the letter which I presented a few weeks ago in reference to this very matter of taking a census of the Indian tribes it was stated by an officer of high standing that there had been a band of Indians in the Washita country estimated for and paid by the Government as numbering from six to eight thousand, when from his own knowledge they had never reached in any one year a higher number than twenty-five hundred. That is the way the Indian census is likely to be taken. A gentleman near me states that but one census of but one tribe of Indians has ever yet been properly taken.

But this is not all. When you have caught these Indians and imposed trousers upon them and given them each twelve yards of domestic and made all the other comfortable arrangements contemplated in the treaties you have not yet completed your work. The sixth article goes on to declare that in addition to the clothing herein named the sum of ten dollars shall be appropriated annually for any Indian who may be "roaming." If these gay savages of the western plains shall see fit to go "roaming" they are to have ten dollars each in addition to the articles before mentioned. If you can catch him he is still to have ten dollars for "roaming." If any of them shall conclude "no longer to roam," but to settle down somewhere and devote himself to Georgics and Bucolics, they shall have twenty dollars each for thirty years to come.

These are the hospitable arrangements which have been made for the convenience of savages who have massacred in cold blood the defenseless women and children of our white emigrant parties. This is to be the reward of those who danced around the mangled bodies of Forsyth's heroic little band. The murderer of Lieutenant Beecher will be permitted by this bill to take out of the United States Treasury his portion of the money which we are now asked to appropriate to keep a treaty made with him before he went to war.

Mr. WINDOM. Not one dollar is to go to that tribe of Indians.

Mr. GARFIELD. Why, say these gentlemen, treaties are sacred, and must be respected!

Mr. WINDOM. I am sure the gentleman does not mean to misrepresent the facts; and he will let me say that not one dollar will go to the tribe of Indians to which he has referred.

Mr. GARFIELD. I do not yield. A large number of gentlemen were unwilling to recognize the Alaska treaty after it had been solemnly ratified by the Senate. They did not hold themselves bound by the treaty. Some of us, on the contrary, felt a moral obligation in view of the fact that we had treated with a great and friendly Power to pay the money, although we did it with much reluctance. Many of the same men who were vehement in their denunciation of the Alaska treaty, and who stood by the Treasury with heroic virtue, now shudder with horror at the idea of breaking faith with these Indians. If there is anything in our policy more absurd than the rest it is the getting up these solemn farces of entering into treaty stipulations with these roving bands of savage Indians and treating them as nations, the majesty of this Republic stooping to send out ambassadors to sit in council with painted savages, our wards, and make solemn treaties as though we were treating with sovereign nations! That is the feast to which we are invited. This new batch of treaties is brought in and we are asked to bind ourselves to make heavy appropriations for thirty years to come. Then we have thrown in appropriations for old State claims as if for the purpose of catching votes. Here is a provision for the payment of a little claim to the State of Iowa:

To supply deficiency of appropriation to pay for depredations committed by Indians in northwestern Iowa in the year 1857, $10,906 34.

But this does not say to whom it is to be paid. It appears to be a little sop thrown to Iowa, and of course it is expected that the delegation from Iowa will defend the claims of their State. I have no fear that they will be caught by this device—

Mr. PRICE. The gentleman ought to know from reading that that it does not go to Indians, but to white men whose families have been destroyed and whose property has been taken.

Mr. GARFIELD. I find on the next page a nice little sop to the State of Minnesota. In addition to the $117,000 paid to that State the provisions of the deficiency bill of 1863 are to be extended to cover $12,000 more to be paid out under an act entitled "An act to amend an act," &c., to appropriate something passed six or seven years ago. If anybody understands what all that means from the reading of it let him explain it. It evidently is designed to cover something under its verbiage, such is the nice little intimation to the patriotic members from Minnesota that they must stand by their State.

How many other sops like this can be found scattered through the bill I do not know. We are invited to do a patriotic work in the hundred and seventy-fourth amendment, where we are called upon for the payment of $5,000 for the distribution of medals bearing the portrait of General Grant.

Mr. WINDOM. That comes from the Military Committee I suppose. [Laughter.]

Mr. GARFIELD. I suppose it is intended to touch the hearts of the military members of the House. How exceeding grateful they should be for this opportunity to perpetuate in bronze the face of the President of the United States.

Mr. PRICE. I desire to ask the gentleman if this hundred and seventy-fourth amendment in reference to the medals is not approved by the Committee on Appropriations?

Mr. GARFIELD. That I do not know.

Mr. PRICE. I think you will find it is.

Mr. GARFIELD. Quien sabe? On the seventy-fourth page is this item:

Three thousand seven hundred dollars being a balance of interest at five per cent. per month on $39,950 held by the United States July, 1857, invested in Kansas bonds in December, 1861.

My friend from Kansas [Mr. CLARKE] may perhaps become a convert to this modest interest account—

A MEMBER. Do I understand the gentleman to say five per cent. per month?

Mr. GARFIELD. Yes, sir; that is the rate of interest stuck in here in this Indian appropriation bill, sixty per cent. per annum, calling upon the shy State of Kansas for her vote in carrying this bill through the House. I congratulate myself on one thing. When this bill passed the House I reluctantly came to the conclusion that it was my duty to vote against it even in the modest form it then assumed; and I then declared I would not vote to send another dollar of public money through the channels of the Indian Bureau. I am glad I took the ground I did; I am confirmed in the wisdom of that determination by the exhibition we have seen to-night of the character of the amendments to this bill, and unless gentlemen can show us how it is that we are to pay $3,000,000 more than we were asked to pay by the officers in charge of this department I shall vote to lay the whole bill and amendments on the table. I now yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. LOGAN. Mr. Chairman, this discussion has gone on at some length, and I shall therefore detain the House but a short time. I desire to draw the attention of the House to one point, and it is this: the Committee on Appropriations reported to this House a certain bill called the Indian appropriation bill. They refused to recognize those treaties in their appropriations. In fact there was no estimate made for them from the Indian Bureau. They refused also to recognize certain claims that were presented to the committee. The bill went to the Senate, and there these claims were put into it.

Now there has been very little said in the argument here on either side in reference to the claims that have been made here outside of those arising under the treaty stipulations. I do not understand these claims. I do not know anything about them. I want the Committee on Appropriations, or somebody else, to explain them so that we may vote for or against them understandingly.

A word now in reference to these "treaties," as they are called. My theory has always been, and I maintain it now, that the idea of this Government making treaties with bands of wild and roving Indians is simply preposterous and ridiculous. It is not good judgment or statesmanship; it is mere child's play, nothing more and nothing less. The gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. WINDOM] has called the attention of the House to the names of the men who made these treaties. Sir, that makes no difference. If they made the treaties by direction of others they had nothing else to do. I do not know about that. But it is quite immaterial what generals or what commission made these treaties or where they are from or what their names are. Whoever they were they made a most ridiculous treaty, and one that was not worthy of gentlemen who consider themselves statesmen in this present age.

Now, in my opinion we have a right to refuse to make these appropriations. The gentleman from California [Mr. HIGBY] says that we have no right to refuse to make the appropriations necessary to carry out these treaties, because the treaties were made in pursuance of a law on the statute-book. True, they were made in pursuance of a statute, but does not the gentleman from California know that in a treaty, as in all other contracts, there are two parties required to act in order that the bargain may be made binding? Does he not know that since these treaties have been made a portion of the men with whom they were made have forfeited not only their rights under the treaties but all right to protection from the Government of the United States by making savage war upon the citizens of this Government? Will any lawyer get up here and say that this House must appropriate money to fulfill the stipulations of a treaty where that treaty has been made with a band of Indians, and that band of Indians, after the treaty has been made, have made war upon the citizens of the Government?

Mr. HIGBY. That is affirmed on the one side and denied on the other.

Mr. LOGAN. Well, if there is any doubt whether these Indians are at war with the Government or not we ought to pause before we appropriate the money; we ought to know whether they are or are not. I call the attention of gentlemen to the war that was going on a short time ago under General Sheridan down in Kansas and what is known as the Indian country. Was not that war with a portion of the Indians of the Sioux tribe with whom one of these treaties was made?

Mr. WINDOM. Will the gentleman allow me to answer his question?

Mr. LOGAN. The gentleman has had his hour. I am making a statement now.

Mr. WINDOM. Will the gentleman permit an answer to his own question?

Mr. LOGAN. I will answer the question myself for him. I think I can answer it better than he can. I appeal to the intelligence of the House to take the report of General Sheridan, or the report of General Sherman, or the report of General Custer, or the report of any officer who has made an official report to the War Department, and what do you find? You find that we are at war to-day with the very tribes of Indians with whom these pretended treaties were made and for whom you desire us to appropriate millions of money to-day.

Mr. WINDOM. The gentleman does not want any information upon that subject, I apprehend.

Mr. LOGAN. Mr. Chairman, I am always somewhat amused rather than edified when any question in reference to the Indians is up in this House. It is the most sensitive thing in the world. Why, I do not know and cannot tell. The gentleman from Dakota [Mr. BURLEIGH] jumps up and the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. WINDOM] jumps up and the gentleman from California [Mr. HIGBY] jumps up, and the members and Delegates from all the extreme western States get excited. Some of them have perhaps been Indian agents. I do not know how that is; I cannot tell.

Mr. HIGBY. If the gentleman does not know then he should not insinuate.

Mr. LOGAN. I say perhaps they have.

Mr. HIGBY. You say you do not know.

Mr. LOGAN. No, I do not know. One gentleman says that he was. I ask the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. TAFPE] if he ever was an Indian agent?

Mr. TAFPE. I was.

Mr. LOGAN. I said perhaps it was so, and now the gentleman says it is true. But I do not impute dishonesty to him because he was an Indian agent.

Now I say to members here, especially to the gentleman from Dakota, [Mr. BURLEIGH], the gentleman from California, [Mr. HIGBY], and the gentleman from Minnesota, [Mr. WINDOM], if we appropriate this money to carry out these treaties I want the gentlemen who advocate it to be appointed agents to carry out its provisions. I believe the gentlemen I have referred to are all to go out of Congress at the end of this session. I want General Grant to appoint them to carry out these treaties.

Then I want to see Mr. Mix on a high horse, booted and spurred, with a big cocked hat on, with a bucktail in it, chasing the fourteen year old buck Indians across the plains for the purpose of catching them and putting blue breeches on them, [laughter;] and I want to see all these gentlemen engaged in this same business. And as the occupation will last for thirty years under these treaties, they would have ample time to become thoroughly proficient in it. What a grand sight it would be to see them in full operation upon the western plains! [Laughter.] You see the dust rising in a great cloud in the distance, and ask what it all means? What is the cause of all that excitement and turmoil? The answer comes, it is the gentleman from Minnesota, dressed up as an Indian agent, on a high horse, with a big red feather in his cap, and the gentleman from California is with him in the same costume, each with a lasso in his hand. What is the lasso for? To lasso Indian boys in order that they may put blue breeches on them. [Great laughter.] That would be carrying out these treaties, and it would be a beautiful sight. I will not say anything about the gentlemen chasing down the other Indians who are not to wear blue breeches. [Shouts of laughter.] And another thing would be most highly interesting. I would like to see the gentlemen from Dakota and California and Minnesota delivering this yoke of oxen to one of the wild Comanches and showing him how to use them, teaching him all the mysteries of geeing and hawing, how to hitch them to the plow or the cart, and all that kind of thing. The Comanche would no doubt be hugely delighted, and would not fail to appreciate the kindness thus shown to him.

It reminds me of a story I once heard of a southern planter. He concluded that he could save a great deal of expense if he could get monkeys to pick his cotton, as they were very imitative and do not require much in the way of clothing. [Laughter.] So he went off to a monkey country, obtained a large number of them, brought them home with him, and turned them loose in his cotton fields. They picked cotton elegantly; they did it much more rapidly than his slaves had done. But then came the difficulty. After they had picked the cotton he could not get them to bring it to the gin-house, but they scattered it all around again by all sorts of mischievous pranks. He soon found that his monkeys were more trouble and expense than his slaves, for it required two men to watch one monkey and keep him properly at work. And so it would be with these Indians and the oxen you propose to give them. You would have to employ at least two Indian agents to teach one Indian how to manage and work his oxen and to keep him at it. Talk about these Comanches and Apaches and other Indians working oxen! It is sheer nonsense.

Many years ago when I was a boy I was in the Indian country myself, but I did not learn near as much about the Indians as these gentlemen seem to know. I was out there performing a very small part in an Indian war—not an Indian war either, because there was no war; but we were out on the frontiers, and once in a while we had a fight with the Indians; sometimes we whipped them, sometimes they whipped us. But in all my service in that country I never saw a Comanche who I would trust with a yoke of oxen, expecting him to work them.

Mr. BURLEIGH. Did you ever find one who would trust you with a yoke of oxen? [Laughter.]

Mr. LOGAN. Of course not, and I would not have them do so. Now let me tell Mr. BURLEIGH exactly what would happen in this case. He will go out there for the purpose of delivering these oxen. He is a very honest man no doubt, but he is also a very wealthy man. Having gone out there at a time when land could be very easily got, he owns about ninety thousand acres of land in that country; perhaps more, not less. Being a very wealthy man he of course does not want to make anything off of the Indians. But I will tell you who will make off of them. One of the gentlemen perhaps that will furnish to the Indian agents a great many yoke of oxen, a great many cows, a great many pairs of pantaloons, a great many coats, a great many stove-pipe hats. Now, what a beautiful sight it would be to see an Indian walking about wearing a stove-pipe hat before he has got on his breeches, [laughter] the stove-pipe hat having been furnished to him by this gentleman from the Territory of Dakota. The next day another gentleman—no kin of course to the Indian agent—comes along and offers the fellow a tin cup for his hat. The Indian will of course prefer to have the tin cup, for he knows what use to make of that, but a hat he never wore in his life and he has no use for it. He sells his hat for a tin cup worth about five cents. From another boy this gentleman buys his yoke of oxen for a little pony worth about ten dollars, and from another he buys his breeches for a bow and arrow.

Mr. BURLEIGH. How would a white man get a bow and arrow?

Mr. LOGAN. Why, a man who has lived so long among the Indians as the gentleman from Dakota [Mr. BURLEIGH] has ought to be able to make a bow and arrow. If not, he has learned but little by being there. [Laughter.]

Now, it does strike me that these Indian treaties are most ridiculous things to be advocated by sensible men. Yet we are asked to appropriate money to buy for these Indians stove-pipe hats, woolen stockings, red flannel shirts, &c. Red flannel shirts are a good thing for the Indians to have. I think they would like them. I once saw a red flannel shirt presented to an Indian down in the mountainous region close to where the gentleman from California resides. What did the Indian do with it? He went home, of course, and put it on. He came back with the shirt on. And how had he it on? He had torn it all into little strips about three quarters of an inch wide; he had tied a part of them around his legs just above the knees; another part he had tied to the tuft of hair on his head; he had tied three or four around each arm, and the remainder were flowing down behind like great long feathers. [Laughter.] That was the way he preferred to wear a shirt. He undoubtedly looked very handsome; he was magnificently decorated, resembling in appearance one of these Friesland chickens, though not having quite so many feathers.

In that way will be expended the money we are now asked to appropriate. I do not think we ought to be asked to make any such appropriation. At least I am not willing to vote for it. If gentlemen will show that the appropriation is for the purpose of sustaining Indians who are partially civilized, who are at least so far civilized that they can eat corn bread, flour, pork, beef, or anything of the kind, and will stay upon the reservations and do it, I will make no objection.

Mr. BURLEIGH. I want to enlighten you. Mr. LOGAN. I need no enlightenment, but I propose to enlighten you. [Laughter.]

Mr. WINDOM. I hope the gentleman will yield to me for a question.

Mr. BURLEIGH. I do not think the gentleman can enlighten me.

Mr. LOGAN. Perhaps that is impossible.

Mr. WINDOM. If we go out on the plains to scare Indians will the gentleman go along as a clown? [Laughter.]

Mr. LOGAN. No, sir; I will not, and I will tell you why. Clowns are cheap now, as the gentleman knows, and I am not a cheap one. The gentleman can be employed as he is so soon to be out of service here, and I do not suppose it will cost much to get his services. But I will tell you what I will do and what kind of employment the gentleman can have. If he will get himself into a suit of soldier's clothes I will go with him and teach him how to kill these marauding Indians.

Mr. WINDOM. Will you charge $1,000,000 for each one you kill?

Mr. LOGAN. I will not charge one cent. I never charged anything and I never killed any one, and I am certain that the gentleman never will. [Laughter.] I do not know why the gentleman should think that he could employ me as a clown.

Mr. WINDOM. Because you have the capacity.

Mr. LOGAN. I never saw a circus in my life without a clown.

Mr. WINDOM. You would be necessary.

Mr. LOGAN. I am necessary in this House, and they cannot spare me for one moment; but the people have spared the gentleman. [Laughter.] It is all well enough for the gentleman to attempt to draw us away from the subject now before us; but I do not intend to be drawn away from it.

Mr. BURLEIGH rose.

Mr. LOGAN. I cannot yield any further. These gentlemen have been so long out among the Indians that they have forgotten how to behave themselves. There is not a woman in the Sioux camp but has better manners than the gentleman from Dakota. [Laughter.]

Now, let us get back to these treaties. The gentlemen say that if we make these treaties with the Indians and keep them we can do away with the Army which is now costing us so much money. There was an attempt made to reduce the Army, not long ago; but I did not see any earnest effort on the part of the House to effect any such salutary reform. The Army has not been reduced. Where, then, are we to keep it if the argument of gentlemen be a good one? Is it to be kept around Washington city?

Mr. BURLEIGH. Not in the Indian country.

Mr. LOGAN. So that the Indian agents out there should not be disturbed, so that they should remain unmolested to make war and then settle it by a new batch of treaties like the ones we now have before us? Shall we leave them to go out and catch a Comanche chief with a few ragged followers, put a stove-pipe hat on his head and a pair of leather moccasins on his feet, and then bring him here to Washington to make a treaty at the Indian Bureau under which millions of dollars are to be paid out of the Treasury? The gentleman says he never saw Comanche Indians. I do not doubt it, and I do not think he ever will. He has been among the Indians, however, and he knows how these things are done.

Whenever they get a little hungry, as they call it, whenever they have a desire to get up another treaty, they divide themselves into bands and separate and go off roving and marauding under different names. Soon what is called an Indian war springs up, and they get a new treaty and new gifts, so that frequently the same tribe is drawing money out of the Treasury under more than one treaty. If we sus-tain the policy proposed in the treaties before us we will only be pursuing the same ridiculous and wasteful expenditure of money. For one I am not willing to vote money for any such purpose. I am in favor of doing justice, but I am not in favor of any absurd extravagance; and I shall therefore cast my vote to non-concur in the amendments of the Senate. [Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. CLARKE, of Kansas, obtained the floor, but yielded to

Mr. SCOTFIELD, who moved that the committee arise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. POMEROY reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had, according to order, had under consideration the amendments of the Senate to House bill No. 1738, making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian department, and for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes for the year ending 30th June, 1870, and had come to no resolution thereon.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

Mr. WILSON, of Pennsylvania, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the committee had examined and found truly enrolled a bill (H. R. No. 568) explanatory of the act entitled "An act declaring the title to land warrants in certain cases;" when the Speaker signed the same.

INAUGURATION CEREMONIES.

Mr. PAINE. I ask unanimous consent to offer for adoption the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be requested to deliver to the mayor of the city of Washington, for the use of such volunteer military organizations as shall take part in the inauguration ceremonies on the 4th of March next, four thousand muskets with equipments and accoutrements, six brass field-pieces with caissons, equipments, and accoutrements, and a suitable number of infantry, cavalry, and artillery flags, taking such security as he may deem proper for the careful preservation and prompt return of said property.

Mr. RANDALL. I suggest that this will have to be made a joint resolution, as there is a law preventing the Secretary of War from loaning flags or anything else.

Mr. PAINE. Then I will withdraw so much of it as relates to flags, as there will not be time to get a joint resolution passed.

Mr. ROSS. What object is there in having muskets at the inauguration?

Mr. PAINE. I will explain in a word. There are many military organizations in this District and to my knowledge that have no muskets. They will parade on that day if they have the arms.

Mr. ROSS. Cannot they parade without the muskets?

Mr. PAINE. I will make it a joint resolution.

The joint resolution (H. R. No. 469) granting the use of arms, &c., for the military organizations which shall take part in the inauguration ceremonies on the 4th of March, 1869, was read a first, second, and third time, and passed.

Mr. PAINE moved to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

CONTRACTS FOR STATIONERY.

Mr. BROOMALL entered a motion to reconsider the vote by which the report on the subject of contracts for stationery was ordered to be recommitted.

ADVERSE REPORTS.

Mr. MILLER, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, reported adversely on the following cases; and they were laid on the table:

The petition of D. W. Sims, for relief;

The petition of Thaddens Wetmore, of St. Louis, for increase of pension;

The petition of Mary I. Clark for a pension, [the same having been allowed by the Commissioner of Pensions, the papers in the case were withdrawn:]

A bill (H. R. No. 1694) granting a pension to Christina Arnell;

The petition of Eliza Ann Upright; and
The petition of Ernest Betbury.

PAY OF A DECEASED MEMBER.

Mr. ARNELL. I ask unanimous consent to offer for adoption the following resolution reported from the Committee on Accounts:

Resolved, That the Clerk of the House of Representatives be, and is hereby, authorized to pay out of the contingent fund of the House to Mrs. James Hinds, widow of Hon. James Hinds, member of this Congress from the second district of Arkansas, assassinated on the 22d of October, 1868, his salary from the aforesaid day until the close of this session of Congress.

Mr. ROSS and Mr. BECK objected.

Mr. HOLMAN moved that the House adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and thereupon (at ten o'clock and thirty minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following petitions, &c., were presented under the rule, and referred to the appropriate committees:

By the SPEAKER: The petition of Thomas Allan, of Atlanta, Georgia, to be relieved from political disabilities incurred by participation in the rebellion.

By Mr. BEATTY: The memorial of J. F. Harcourt and 237 others, citizens of Ohio, praying such an alteration in the Constitution of the United States as shall acknowledge Almighty God as the source of all authority and power in civil government, the Lord Jesus Christ as the Ruler among the nations, and His revealed will as of supreme authority.

By Mr. CALLIS: A memorial signed by Hon. Thomas M. Peters and 78 others, asking for an increase of representation in the Congress of the United States from the State of Alabama in consequence of the extension of the elective franchise to the recently emancipated slaves of said State whereby the basis of representation has been greatly enlarged in said State, which State has not at this time the just representation to which it is entitled by virtue of its voting population.

By Mr. ELIOT, of Massachusetts: The petition of Chester Snow and others, citizens of Massachusetts, praying for the removal of obstructions at Hell Gate.

By Mr. GOSS: The petition of L. Miles Gentry, a citizen of South Carolina, for the removal of political disabilities.

Also, the petition of R. C. Pool, a citizen of South Carolina, for the removal of political disabilities.

Also, the petition of J. M. Elford, a citizen of South Carolina, for the removal of political disabilities.

By Mr. TWICHELL: Eight petitions from Norfolk county, Massachusetts, for the right of suffrage for women.

By Mr. WILSON, of Iowa: The petition of Mary S. Stewart and over 2,000 others, residents of Washington county, Iowa, praying for an amendment of the Constitution of the United States, acknowledging Almighty God as the source of all authority and power in civil government, &c.

IN SENATE.

MONDAY, March 1, 1869.

Prayer by Rev. E. H. GRAY, D. D.

On motion of Mr. TRUMBULL, and by unanimous consent, the reading of the Journal of Saturday last was dispensed with.

CREDENTIALS.

Mr. BAYARD presented the credentials of Hon. Thomas F. Bayard, elected by the Legislature of Delaware a Senator from that State for the term commencing March 4, 1869; which were read, and ordered to be filed.

Mr. VAN WINKLE presented the credentials of Hon. Arthur I. Foreman, elected by the Legislature of West Virginia a Senator from that State for the term commencing on March 4, 1869; which were read, and ordered to be filed.

Mr. MORTON presented the credentials of Hon. William G. Brownlow, elected by the Legislature of Tennessee a Senator from that State for the term commencing March 4, 1869; which were read, and ordered to be filed.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. MORGAN presented a petition of citizens of New York and citizens of New Jersey, praying for such an amendment to the Constitution of the United States as will recognize the obligations of the Christian religion; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. CONNESS. I present the memorial of a committee of the Workingmen's Assembly of the District of Columbia, respectfully submitting to the Senate and House of Representatives that they have been deprived of the proper benefit of the law passed at the last session of Congress known as the eight-hour law, and asking that the laws in that regard may be corrected by additional legislation. It is signed by a committee, E. MacMurray, George O. Cook, and D. McCathran. I move that the memorial be laid on the table, while the bill is in the same position.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. KELLOGG presented resolutions of the Chamber of Commerce of New Orleans, Louisiana, protesting against any further extension of that section of the bankrupt act known as the fifty per cent. provision; which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

IMPRISONMENT WITH HARD LABOR.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate bill No. 726. It is a short bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It requires unanimous consent to consider the bill now. Is there any objection?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. No. 726) to authorize imprisonment with hard labor as a punishment in certain cases. It provides that in all cases where any court of the United States is authorized, upon conviction, to impose sentence of imprisonment, but where the law does not provide for imprisonment at hard labor, it shall be discretionary with the court to impose sentence of imprisonment either with or without hard labor. This act is to take effect upon its passage, but nothing contained in it is to be held to apply to offenses already committed.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

RIGHTS OF MARRIED WOMEN.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate bill No. 177.

By unanimous consent the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. No. 177) regulating the rights of property of married women in the District of Columbia.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I suppose it is only necessary to read the amendment of the committee, as it is a substitute for the original bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The reading of the original bill will be omitted unless it is called for by some Senator.

The Secretary read the amendment reported by the Committee on the Judiciary, which was to strike out all after the enacting clause of the original bill and to insert:

That in the District of Columbia the right of any married woman to any property, personal or real, belonging to her at the time of marriage or acquired during marriage in any other way than by gift or conveyance from her husband to the prejudice of his creditors shall be as absolute as if she were femme sole, and shall not be subject to the disposal of her husband nor be liable for his debts, but such married woman may convey, devise, and bequeath the same, or any interest therein, in the same manner and with like effect as if she were unmarried.

Sec. 2 And be it further enacted, That any married woman may contract and sue and be sued in her own name in all matters having relation to her sole and separate property in the same manner as if she were unmarried, but neither her husband nor his property shall be bound by any such contract nor liable for any recovery against her in any such suit, but judgment may be enforced by execution against her sole and separate estate in the same manner as if she were sole.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in. The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, was read the third time, and passed.

CHARLES C. COOK.

Mr. SPRAGUE. I move that the Senate take up for consideration House bill No. 1877. It is a bill which was accidentally omitted the other day when bills from the Military Committee were under consideration.

By unanimous consent the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. No. 1877) for the relief of the heirs and legal representatives of Charles C. Cook, deceased. It directs the Paymaster General to pay to the heirs or legal representatives of Charles C. Cook, deceased, formerly of company C, seventy-seventh regiment Pennsylvania volunteers, the full pay and allowances of a second lieutenant of infantry from the 1st of November, 1861, until the 6th of November, 1864, when he died from wounds received in battle, deducting therefrom, however, such sums as may have been already paid to him for his military services during that period.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

SCOUTS IN ALABAMA.

Mr. SPRAGUE. I have another bill from the same committee which I should like to have passed now. I move that the Senate take up House bill No. 1879.

By unanimous consent the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. No. 1879) for the relief of certain companies of scouts and guides organized in Alabama. The bill provides that Captain H. J. Springfield's company of scouts and guides, numbering forty two officers and men, and Captain John B. Kennamer's company of scouts and guides, numbering thirty-three officers and men, organized in northern Alabama, under orders of Brigadier General Gordon Granger, commanding the district of northern Alabama, approved by Major General George H. Thomas, commanding the department of the Cumberland, shall be entitled to receive pay for their services from the date when they respectively joined such companies to the date when they were relieved from duty respectively, at the price fixed by order of General Thomas, to wit: captains, three dollars; lieutenants, two dollars; sergeants, one dollar and fifty cents; and privates, one dollar per day; the value of the clothing received by each of the scouts and guides to be deducted from the amount due them respectively. And if either of the scouts or guides is dead, or shall die before receiving the amount due him, his heirs or other legal representatives are to be entitled to receive it. In auditing and paying the foregoing accounts the rolls of the companies now on file in the office of the Adjutant General of the Army are to be the data to guide the accounting officers; and the claims when audited are to be paid by the Paymaster General out of any money heretofore appropriated or that may hereafter be appropriated for the pay of the Army.

The Committee on Military Affairs reported the bill with amendments. The first amendment was in line seven to strike out "Gordon" before "Granger" and to insert "R. S.;" so that it will read "R. S. Granger."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to insert as an additional section the following:

And be it further enacted, That all other companies or parts of companies of scouts and guides organized and employed by General R. S. Granger under authority of or by the approval of Major General George H. Thomas, commanding department of the Cumberland, be entitled to the same relief as provided for the companies named in the first section of this act. Provided, however, That before such payment satisfactory evidence of service shall be furnished by claimants and approved by the Secretary of War.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GRIMES. When were these scouts employed?

Mr. SPRAGUE. During the war.

Mr. GRIMES. What time during the war?

Mr. SPRAGUE. In the latter part, toward the close.

Mr. GRIMES. I should like to know when these scouts were employed and mustered into the service. Were they ever mustered into the service?

Mr. SPRAGUE. The reports from the Department indicate that they were employed regularly. The reports from the Department are here before the Senate showing that they were regularly employed and ought to be paid.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in. It was ordered that the amendments be engrossed and the bill read a third time. The bill was read the third time, and passed.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. STEWART. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill No. 1880, to relieve certain persons therein named from the legal and political disabilities imposed by the fourteenth amendment of the Constitution of the United States, and for other purposes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It requires unanimous consent to consider the bill at this time.

Mr. DRAKE. I object.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection being made, it goes over.

Mr. RAMSEY. If that bill is to go over, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate bill No. 956.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Will not a vote of the Senate take up the bill indicated by the Senator from Nevada?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Not in the morning hour. The morning business is not yet gone through with.

Mr. TRUMBULL. But the Senator from Minnesota is asking to take up another bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is for the Senate to determine whether it shall be taken up or not.

Mr. TRUMBULL. If there is no objection of course it can be taken up.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. One objection carries it over.

Mr. RAMSEY. Then I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate bill No. 956.

Mr. STEWART. I hope the bill to which I have referred will be taken up.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There is an objection to it, which carries it over for the morning hour.

Mr. RAMSEY. Then I press my motion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Minnesota asks unanimous consent to take up Senate bill No. 956, to establish and declare the railroad and bridges of the New Orleans, Mobile, and Chattanooga Railroad Company, as hereafter constructed westward from the city of New Orleans, a post road, and for other purposes.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Then an objection carries the bill of the Senator from Nevada over?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Of course it does; or any other bill.

Mr. GRIMES. Does the rule exclude the taking up of bills on motion after the morning business, the presentation of petitions, reports of committees, and bills, is concluded?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair thinks not.

Mr. STEWART. If there are any petitions or memorials or bills to introduce I will give way.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Senators immediately on the assembling of the Senate began to call up bills. A few petitions were offered. Reports are in order if there be no farther petitions.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I desire to make some reports.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will receive them.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. WILLIAMS, from the Committee on Private Land Claims, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 1206) to restore to certain parties their rights under the laws and treaties of the United States, asked to be discharged from its further consideration; which was agreed to.

He also, from the same committee, to whom were referred the following memorial, petitions, and resolution, asked to be discharged from their further consideration; which was agreed to:

The petition of Jessie Benton Frémont, praying for the restitution of property in San Francisco belonging to her, illegally held since October, 1863, by the United States Government;

The petition of Meta Nimity, praying to be allowed to redeem her property sold for taxes;

A resolution of the Legislature of Oregon, in favor of granting and confirming to that State a certain piece of land known as the southeast quarter of section seventeen, township nine south, range forty east of Willamette meridian, with full power in the State to convey the land to Royal Augustus Pearce, resident on the land;

A petition of citizens of Washington county, Missouri, praying that the land known as the Spanish claim of Moses Austin may be disposed of to actual settlers under the homestead law;

The petition of the trustees of the town of Potosi, Missouri, praying for the confirmation of the title to the land on which that town is situated; and

The memorial of Jonathan Crews, as attorney and agent for the heirs and Francis Renault, alias Urno, and Antoine Renault, deceased, praying the passage of an act authorizing the heirs to locate four hundred acres of land each on any land not appropriated or located in the old donation tract in the Vincennes land district.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 485) providing for the examination of the claim of J. Mariano Bonilla to the rancho "La Cuesta," in the State of California, asked to be discharged from its further consideration; which was agreed to.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 513) concerning land claims in the State of Arkansas, asked to be discharged from its further consideration; which was agreed to.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 244) relative to the La Junta land grant in New Mexico, asked to be discharged from its further consideration; which was agreed to.

Mr. WILLIAMS, from the Committee on Finance, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 824) relative to the refining of gold and silver bullion at the Mint of the United States and branches, asked to be discharged from its further consideration; which was agreed to.

Mr. SHERMAN. I am directed by the Committee on Finance, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 968) for the coinage of nickel-copper pieces of five cents and under, to state that the committee are equally divided on the subject, and therefore I report back the bill to the Senate.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine, from the Committee on Appropriations, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 1672) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1870, reported it with amendments.

Mr. SUMNER, from the Committee on Foreign Relations, to whom was referred the petition of Jonathan Elliot, late commercial agent of the United States at San Domingo and Porto Plata, praying compensation for services rendered and reimbursement for money expended in negotiating a treaty with the Dominican republic in the year 1856, submitted an adverse report; which was ordered to be printed.

He also, from the same committee, to whom were referred the following bills and resolutions, asked to be discharged from their further consideration; which was agreed to:

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 454) concerning the payment of claims made by foreign Governments against the United States for property destroyed by the armies of the United States;

A bill (S. No. 578) to regulate trade between the United States and the British North American Provinces, and for other purposes;

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 46) respecting the proposed confederation of provinces on the northern frontier of the United States;

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 254) for the protection of American interests in the Gulf of St. Lawrence;

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 138) requesting the President to intercede with her Majesty the Queen of Great Britain to secure the speedy release of Robert Lynch, now imprisoned in the province of Canada;

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 139) requesting the President to intercede for the release of American citizens imprisoned in Great Britain and Ireland on insufficient grounds; and

A bill (H. R. No. 763) for the relief of American citizens abroad.

He also, from the same committee, to whom were referred the following message, petitions, memorials, and resolutions, asked to be discharged from their further consideration; which was agreed to:

A message of the President of the United States, communicating correspondence relative to an alleged practice of the Danish authorities to banish convicts to this country;

A message of the President of the United States, communicating, in compliance with a resolution of the Senate, information in respect to the action of the mixed commission for the adjustment of claims by citizens of the United States against the Government of Venezuela;

A memorial of claimants against the Government of Venezuela, praying that the Government of the United States pay them the amount allowed them by the commission;

A resolution directing the committee to inquire into the expediency of negotiating a treaty with Great Britain, regulating our trade, &c., with Canada;

A message of the President of the United States, communicating, in compliance with a resolution of the Senate of the 5th of February last, correspondence upon the subject of the murder by the inhabitants of the Island of Formosa of the ship's company of the American bark Rover;

A message from the President of the United States, communicating, in compliance with a resolution of the Senate of the 21st of February last, information in relation to the abduction of one Allan McDonald from the township of Moore, in Canada;

The petition of John P. Brown, praying an increase of compensation as secretary and dragoman to the legation at Constantinople;

The petition of John Warren, a citizen of the United States, now a convict in an English prison under sentence as a Fenian, asking the interposition of the Government in his behalf;

A petition of merchants of Philadelphia, in favor of the renewal of reciprocity treaty with Canada;

Two petitions of citizens of Boston, one petition of citizens of New York, one petition of members of the New York Produce Exchange, and two petitions of citizens of the United States, praying that a reciprocity treaty may be made with the Dominion of Canada and the British provinces;

Resolutions of the Board of Trade of Charleston, South Carolina, in favor of the protection of private property at sea during war;

Three memorials of merchants and ship-owners of Boston, Massachusetts, praying such action as will declare and establish as a principle governing the relations of the United States with other nations at peace with this country, but which as between themselves may have been at war, that when hostilities shall have ceased for a period of time so as to raise the presumption that they will not be renewed the state of war shall be deemed at an end, so far as the citizens of the United States are concerned;

A resolution of the Maine Legislature, requesting their Senators and Representatives in Congress to bring before that body the necessity of obtaining aid for the railroads and for an examination of the harbors of that State, so as to provide efficient means for its defense;

Resolutions of the Maine Legislature, sympathizing with the Cretans in their struggle for independence; and Resolutions of the Board of Trade of Providence, Rhode Island, on the subject of the immunity of private property at sea in time of war.

Mr. RAMSEY, from the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 2006) to establish certain post roads, reported it with amendments.

He also, from the same committee, reported a joint resolution (S. R. No. 244) for the relief of John Wightman, of Meadville, Pennsylvania; which was read, and passed to a second reading.

Mr. ANTHONY. The Committee on Printing, to whom was referred a bill (H. R. No. 1601) to provide stationery for Congress and the several Departments, and for other purposes, have instructed me to report it back without amendment and recommend its passage. If the Senate was not so thin I should ask to take up the bill now. I give notice that I shall do so in the course of the day.

Mr. CONNESS. Let it be taken up now.

Mr. ANTHONY. I should like to have it taken up; but I do not wish to have it acted upon in the absence of so many Senators. It makes considerable changes in the mode of providing stationery, and I think it makes a very great saving to the Government; I know it does.

Mr. CONNESS. Now is the time to pass it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Reports from committees are still in order. If there be no reports, then the introduction of bills is in order.

Mr. CONNESS. I hope we shall give immediate consideration to the bill just reported by the Senator from Rhode Island if there is no objection.

Mr. MORTON. I object.

SMITHSONIAN REPORT.

Mr. ANTHONY. I am instructed by the Committee on Printing, to whom was referred a resolution to print additional copies of the report of the Smithsonian Institution for the year 1868, to report it back without amendment, and I ask for its present consideration. It is the usual resolution that is passed every year.

The resolution was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That five thousand copies of the report of the Smithsonian Institution for the year 1868 be printed, three thousand for the use of the Senate and two thousand for the institution, and that said report be stereotyped: Provided, That the aggregate number of pages of said report shall not exceed four hundred and fifty without illustrations, except those furnished by the institution.

AMENDMENTS TO APPROPRIATION BILLS.

Mr. ANTHONY and Mr. FERRY submitted amendments intended to be proposed to the bill (H. R. No. 1672) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1870; which were referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

MISSISSIPPI VALLEY.

Mr. RAMSEY submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be directed to communicate to Congress the report of Brigadier General B. S. Roberts to the Secretary of War on the subject of using the surplus waters of the upper lakes to make the upper Mississippi, Illinois, and Ohio rivers more navigable, and his plan for reclaiming the waste lands of the Mississippi basin.

REMOVAL OF DISABILITIES.

Mr. STEWART. I move that the bill (H. R. No. 1880) to relieve certain persons therein named from their legal and political disabilities imposed by the fourteenth amendment of the Constitution of the United States, and for other purposes, be taken up and disposed of, in order that it may go back to the House with our amendments.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The Committee on the Judiciary reported the bill with amendments. The first amendment was in line seventeen to strike out the word "and," and in line eighteen to insert the words "and John R. Tompkins, of Mobile."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in line twenty-three to insert the names of S. L. Griffith and P. O. Hooper, of Pulaski county, Arkansas.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Unless there be some objection, I hope the vote will be taken on all the amendments reported by the committee at once.

Mr. CONNESS. There is an amendment on the fourth page that I wish to amend before it is voted upon.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the committee.

Mr. CONNESS. That is subject to amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is.

Mr. CONNESS. I move to amend the amendment by striking out the name of "Asa Rogers," in line seventy on page 4.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I hope that will not be done.

Mr. STEWART. There has been a great contest over that name on both sides, and I have received a great many protests on the subject. I shall not object to striking it out. I leave it entirely to the Senate. He is one of the judges of Virginia. On the one hand he is represented as being a very estimable and necessary man in his office; and on the other hand he is represented as being entirely opposed to reconstruction. These different assertions are made by every credible persons on both sides. The committee put the name in; and I am here neither to advocate its staying in or its striking out or taking any decided ground about it. It is a matter of very great doubt in my mind.

Mr. CONNESS. I have information upon which I implicitly rely as to the unfitness of this man for this favor, and there can be no doubt in regard to the source of my information. I hope he will be left out.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I hope that name will not be stricken out. I have seen several gentlemen in regard to this person. The papers are in the hands of the Senator from Nevada, who had charge of the subject.

Mr. STEWART. I have not the papers here in regard to this case. They are very voluminous.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Some persons came to see me in reference to this case, but there are so many of these cases that I am unable to state all the facts in any particular case without referring to the papers. I know I have seen some papers from Virginia in reference to this particular case, and if the Senator from Nevada will refer to the papers I think it will appear that the Senators from West Virginia indorse him. I did not hear what the Senator from California said, what the point was that was made upon this person.

Mr. CONNESS. The point is that he is an arrant rebel, that he is unfit again to be trusted, certainly at this time, with the privileges of citizenship, that he should remain under his disabilities. He holds an office in the State of Virginia. His case, as stated by the member of the Judiciary Committee, the Senator from Nevada, who has this subject in charge, is one of doubt as presented to the committee, statements being made on both sides; of course this is a class of cases which will always have two sides.

Mr. HOWARD. If the Senator from California will allow me to say a word in regard to Mr. Rogers, I understand he is the second auditor of the State of Virginia.

Mr. CONNESS. He is.

Mr. HOWARD. And I am informed by a very credible source that he says all he wishes his disabilities to be relieved for is to enable him to hold the office which he has now got; that he is not a Union man, and does not profess to be a Union man, and never did. I think if that is the motive which induces him to apply for relief from disabilities he ought to be accommodated, over the left.

Mr. CONNESS. Of course I can have no motive as against this man at all any more than any other person named in this bill; but there is no doubt in my mind, from my source of information—I know the source well—with regard to the unfitness of this man for the privilege proposed to be extended to him. I have no doubt that the statement made by the honorable Senator from Michigan with regard to him is entirely correct.

Mr. TRUMBULL. There must be a mistake about that, because we require a statement in writing from these parties themselves. The papers in this case are in the hands of the Senator from Nevada, and there are so many of them that I am unable to distinguish between them. I recollect something about this case. But I will say to the Senator from Michigan that there is a written application by this party himself. We have not put the name of anybody into the bill who does not state that he asks to be relieved from his political disabilities and promise to sustain the Government and to recognize the condition of things as they exist as binding upon him; and that is wholly inconsistent with the statement that he merely asked to be relieved in order to be able to hold the office. We have not put any man in the bill who simply asked to be relieved for the purpose of holding office. This matter was investigated in the committee; and I think it would be well to have the application read. I think this is one of the cases about which the Senators from West Virginia made a statement. I am not sure about that. I am told it is not. I ask the Senators from West Virginia if they do not know about this case?

Mr. WILLEY. I know the general reputation of Mr. Rogers very well before the war as a man of high character and standing and influential position in Virginia. About his connection with the war or his status during the war I have no knowledge whatever and know nothing about the facts. The papers in regard to his case have never been in my hands, nor have I had occasion to make a personal examination of them; but as to his general character and reputation and standing and propriety of conduct before the war I do not know of any man who stood higher or maintained a higher social position. I have heard of rumors in regard to his status during the war, of which I know nothing personally. Nor have I had it within my power to make an examination into the facts alluded to. That is all I can state in regard to the case.

Mr. FERRY. I hope that the name of this gentleman will not be stricken out of this bill. It is of course evident that he must have been implicated in the rebellion from the very fact that he asks to be relieved of the disabilities which were produced by such implication. We have the testimony of the Senator from West Virginia that he is a gentleman of high character and standing, and of the chairman of the Judiciary Committee that he has filed with the committee his petition acquiescing in the existing state of things as binding and as final. Now, the fact is just this, as I have observed with regard to a great many of these applications for the removal of disabilities, if the applicant is a person holding a civil office there are in the community in which he resides other persons who want the office that he holds, and just so soon as it is ascertained that a person holding a civil office has made an application to Congress for the removal of his disabilities those that desire his office come or send here and prefer charges of the most outrageous character against every such individual. I have known cases myself where gentlemen of high standing, whose only implication in the rebellion was the act of voting for an ordinance of secession, who were between sixty and seventy years of age, whom I personally know acquiesce in the existing condition of things and desire the restoration of harmony to the country upon the existing basis, upon applying here to have their disabilities removed, they holding an office at the time, statements such as are preferred against Mr. Rogers have been preferred by interested persons for the very purpose of keeping them under disabilities, causing them to be removed from office, and thereby procuring a vacancy into which some of those persons may be placed. I suspect remonstrances of the kind which are presented in this case.

Mr. HOWARD. I take the liberty of sending to the Chair a letter dated "Rooms Grant and Colfax Association, Richmond, February 27, 1869," and ask to have it read. It is very short.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

ROOMS GRANT AND COLFAX ASSOCIATION,
RICHMOND, VIRGINIA, February 27, 1869.

SIR: At a meeting of this association, held this evening, the following resolutions were unanimously adopted:

Resolved, That this association earnestly protest against the removal of disabilities from office-holders who have, in violation of the constitutional amendment, held and used their positions against a proper reconstruction of this State; and especially would this association protest against such removal from Judge John A. Meredith, William A. Charters, Asa Rogers, and William F. Taylor, being convinced that they are not fit subjects for such clemency, but that it would be dangerous and tend to encourage disloyalty.

Resolved, That a copy of the above resolution be forwarded to prominent Republican Senators and Representatives in Congress and to the Reconstruction Committee.

Very respectfully,

GEORGE RYE,
President.
G. L. RICHARDS,
Secretary.

Hon. Z. CHANDLER.

Mr. CONNESS. The Senator from Connecticut undertakes to render the testimony presented in regard to the disloyalty of this man inapplicable to the case by throwing a suspicion upon it because this party holds a civil office. Now, sir, I take it there are men in those States whose testimony we should accept without aspersing it and them by attributing motives of that kind. If the honorable Senator knows a case where a man is governed by motives of that character it is well to state it. I might as well say that the honorable Senator's opposition to this amendment comes from his known position, he being in favor of relieving all rebels from all disability whatever. But I did not bring that into the argument of this case. There is positive testimony that this is an unfit man to whom to extend again at this time the privileges of citizenship which he once possessed and threw off, making himself an enemy of the country and of society. As I before observed there can be no motive on the part of Senators here opposing the removal of disabilities from any particular person. I hold in my hand a letter touching this man. I do not see fit to occupy the time by reading it, but I know the writer and I believe his statement. I know him well. I believe him to be a man without guile, of good character, a patriot; and I think we can afford to let Mr. Rogers remain in his present position for some little time to come.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I am exceedingly glad that the Senator from Michigan has sent this paper to the desk to be read. It shows, and I wish Senators to see, the position that the Senate of the United States and the Congress of the United States are to be placed in according to the theory of my friend from Michigan. If the Congress of the United States is to be made the mere registrar of a Grant and Colfax club in the city of Richmond I think Congress had best adjourn. I will read this paper and I will show upon what the objection is made to the removal of the disabilities of this individual. It is simply a political club in the city of Richmond, and they state not one fact against the person whose disabilities they modestly ask Congress not to remove because the Grant and Colfax club of the city of Richmond advise that it should not be done. Now, let us see what they say:

"ROOMS GRANT AND COLFAX ASSOCIATION,
RICHMOND, VIRGINIA, February 27, 1869.

"At a meeting of this association, held this evening, the following resolutions were unanimously adopted."

This is signed by George Rye, president, and G. L. Richards, secretary. Who was at the meeting whom they represented, how extensive the meeting was we have no information whatever. What was their resolution?

Resolved, That this association earnestly protest against the removal of disabilities from office-holders."

I suppose they want the offices themselves. Mr. TIPTON. They have a right to have them.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Suppose the people do not think proper to elect them; suppose the people of Virginia think proper to elect somebody else; has the Grant and Colfax Club a right to have them? Does the Senator from Nebraska mean to say that they have a right to have them in defiance of the people?

Mr. HOWARD. They have undoubtedly.

Mr. TRUMBULL. They have undoubtedly the Senator from Michigan thinks. If the people think proper to elect a man who does not belong to the Grant and Colfax Club in the State of Nebraska, does the Senator from Nebraska rise here and say they shall not be permitted to do it? Is that the doctrine?

Mr. TIPTON. Will the gentleman allow me to answer that now?

Mr. TRUMBULL. Certainly.

Mr. TIPTON. I will say that if the people of the State of Nebraska should elect a man who is so far yet steeped in rebellion as that he is distasteful to a minority of the people of the State of Nebraska—a very small and insignificant minority—and if he cannot hold that office until he is qualified by the Republican representatives of the United States, I as one of them will never permit that majority of the people of Nebraska to be heard in his favor while I can control it in favor of a minority of the loyal people in the Senate of the United States.

Mr. TRUMBULL. The Senator would override a majority of the people in his State and deny to them the right to elect, a person to office whom they think proper to elect, and he would remove no political disabilities at all, as I understand him. He puts it upon the ground that he will not relieve the political disabilities of a person whom the people want to serve them where they know him, are acquainted with him, and have thought he was the most proper man.

Mr. TIPTON. I say that where the opinion of the minority of the loyal people of that State and the opinion of the Representatives of the loyal people in Congress have to be united for his exclusion he is excluded by the will of the majority of the people of this country.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Then a minority of the people of the locality that have a right to elect have a right to dictate who the officers shall be, and the people of the other States are to come in from a distance and control that majority. What becomes of your local organizations? What becomes of your organization in the State of Nebraska when a majority of the people of the United States think you ought to have a different government in Nebraska? Then you will unite with the minority of the people of Nebraska and a majority out of Nebraska to put into Nebraska such a government as a minority of the people there and a majority outside of it say they shall have. I will do no such thing for my State.

Mr. WILSON. That is not the question.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Let us see what the question is. An objection is made to the removal of the disabilities of Mr. Rogers on this paper. I will read it to the Senator from Massachusetts and let us see what it is:

Resolved, That this association earnestly protest against the removal of disabilities from officeholders who have in violation of the constitutional amendment held and used their positions against a proper reconstruction of this State."

They decide what a proper reconstruction is—and especially would this association protest against such removal from Judge John A. Meredith, William A. Charters, Asa Rogers, and William F. Taylor, being convinced that they are not fit subjects for such clemency, but that it would be dangerous and tend to encourage disloyalty.

Resolved, That a copy of the above resolution be forwarded to prominent Republican Senators and Representatives in Congress and to the Reconstruction Committee."

Do they state any facts? Not one. They say that these parties have been against a proper reconstruction. What is a proper reconstruction? Are they to decide that question for the Senate of the United States? They say they are convinced "that they are not fit subjects for such clemency." The Senate of the United States has not anything to do with it, I suppose, as the Grant and Colfax Association at Richmond is convinced that they are not proper subjects for clemency. Does that satisfy my friend from Michigan? Is my friend from Michigan, in all seriousness, satisfied with that because they say they are not satisfied? Is that any reason why the political disabilities should not be removed? If this Grant and Colfax Association had stated some facts, something that these parties had done—

Mr. CHANDLER. They are rebels; that is all.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Of course they were rebels. My friend from Michigan understands that. We do not remove disabilities from anybody else. Of course the Senator understands perfectly well that nobody is to have his disabilities removed unless he has been a rebel.

Mr. CHANDLER. They are unrepentant rebels.

Mr. TRUMBULL. They do not say that. It is not stated that Mr. Rogers is a rebel yet. They say that he is an unfit person in their opinion. If we are to take the opinion of that association as to who is fit that is the end of the case. Undoubtedly these parties were rebels; and the constitutional amendment is intended to apply to that class of persons and to authorize the removal of disabilities from that class of persons.

The reason that I have said what I have is, that I was called upon personally by some gentlemen in whom I have the utmost confidence, who represented to me that this was a proper person whose disabilities should be removed. The fact that he holds an office may be a reason in the opinion of the Grant and Colfax Association why his disabilities should not be removed, for doubtless they have in their association persons who would like to take his office.

Mr. WILLIAMS. What office is that?

Mr. TRUMBULL. It was stated that he was the second auditor of the State of Virginia.

Mr. PERRY. He was elected before the political disabilities supervened by virtue of the act, and has just continued along.

Mr. TRUMBULL. He was elected by the registered voters, I suppose, in Virginia.

Mr. CONNESS. By Andrew Johnson's voters.

Mr. TRUMBULL. They were registered under our laws, I take it.

Mr. CONNESS. Not at all.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Was he not elected under the Peirpoint constitution?

Mr. HOWARD. Under the constitution of May 29, 1865.

Mr. CONNESS. Under the Johnson programme.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I do not know how he was elected; but the constitutional government which has prevailed in Virginia is the one first adopted in West Virginia.

Mr. FERRY. When he was elected and assumed office he was under no disability whatever. He merely held right along since this disability supervened, and it is desirable for the interests of the community and the State that this disability should be removed from a gentleman whom the Senator from West Virginia declares to be a gentleman of high standing and character, and who has presented an application here announcing his willingness to acquiesce in and support the existing order of things.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I will not take up time about it; but I think the Senate should have something more than a statement such as this to induce them to strike a name out of the bill.

Mr. TIPTON. I desire to say in regard to this question that I, too, have been approached by gentlemen in whose honor and integrity I confide, and they have brought me to the conclusion that this party is not entitled to this gratuity at the hands of the Congress or the Government of the United States. The honorable Senator from Illinois seems to predicate much of his argument on the fact that written applications come here from the parties themselves. Now, Mr. President, if parties should come here without written applications of their own, but indorsed and presented because in their profession they have shown a repentant spirit, I would in that case, perhaps, vote for the removal of their disabilities. But for a man who raised his hand against the Government of the United States to present an application in his own writing at this early day for the removal of his disabilities, it is a crime in him until his probation has satisfied his loyal neighbors to ask any such privilege at the hands of the Government of the United States. His loyal neighbors may sneer at him, but his loyal neighbors shall not be sneered at with impunity in the Senate of the United States.

To whom shall I go but to the Grant and Colfax clubs of Virginia and of the whole country for information in regard to the removal of the disabilities of men who have been in the rebellion? We went to the Grant and Colfax men—I mean the loyal men of those States—for aid and comfort during the rebellion and it is natural that we should go to them now. I do go to the Grant and Colfax men, not because that is the name of their organization, but because they represent the loyal element of the country from which they write. I say again that where a man is a repentant rebel he will not ask so early any participation in the active labors of supporting Government in the United States. Find me a rebel who has repented and he says himself, "My crimes have been of such a magnitude that it is not right and proper that I should force myself upon the men who have had to spend their money and their blood to subjugate me, and therefore I will as an honest man show by my works and by submission to the Constitution and by submission to the law that I have repented." I say when a man writes his own petition and presents it here, with me it is prima facie evidence that he is yet a rebel and a scoundrel, and has no claim to the clemency of my Government, that Government that poured out the blood of its loyal people to sustain our institutions. There may be possibly one honest man out of a hundred among them. Let him bide his time. Let him wait, as his fathers waited and showed their patriotism. Let him wait as his neighbors have waited and shown their devotion to the country before he comes here and himself comes to the conclusion that he par excellence is worthy to receive the clemency of the men who gave their brothers and their sons and their fathers to subjugate him in the days of his infamous treachery. His own petition, forsooth! That is the greatest crime of all. Let him stand until his neighbors bring him here and until they forgive him, and then I will forgive him, and not before.

Mr. HOWARD. I do not wish to protract this debate; but I really feel it my duty to say one word in behalf of the Grant and Colfax Club of Richmond, Virginia. I understood the letter which was read on this occasion not as conclusive and absolutely infallible evidence, as the Senator from Illinois seems to have treated it, but as some evidence to show the impropriety of removing disabilities from this Mr. Rogers. I take it that the honorable Senator from Illinois will not deny that even the Grant and Colfax Club of Richmond, Virginia, possess the right of making representations and presenting petitions and memorials even to the Senate of the United States, although what they say may be deserving of very little regard on the part of the honorable Senator. I presented their representation with this view as evidence, so far as it shall go, to satisfy the Senate of the impropriety of removing disabilities from Mr. Rogers.

But I do not by any means confine myself to the statement of the Grant and Colfax Club as to the character of Mr. Rogers. I have information from other sources in regard to that gentleman—sources from which I learn that he is an unfit person to receive this favor which he now asks at our hands. He has been all along, I have been informed, a bitter rebel in act and in heart, and that the sole motive which now prompts him to ask to have his disability removed is his desire to hold the office of which he is in possession.

Mr. CONNESS. And wrongfully in possession.

Mr. HOWARD. And wrongfully and unconstitutionally in possession, as the Senator from Illinois very well knows, because the Senator cannot have forgotten that long since the people of the United States ratified the fourteenth amendment of the Constitution, which excludes from the right of holding office just such men as this Asa Rogers appears to be. Of course he is under the disability created by that amendment; otherwise his name would not be in this bill. That is conceded.

Now, sir, if that is his sole motive, as appears to be the case, if he merely wishes to continue in the possession of the office which he thus illegally holds, I think it exhibits on his part some want of modesty, not to say of patriotism and fidelity to the country; and I cannot vote for any man who is actuated by any such motive as seems to actuate Mr. Rogers.

There are other names in this bill to which I shall object, and I hope my objection will be sustained by my honorable friend from Illinois. I shall object to the removal of the disabilities of Matthew Harrison and Andrew Jackson Bradfield, of Loudoun county, Virginia; W. R. Millan, of Fairfax; and John J. Chew, of Spottsylvania county, and various others contained in the amendment of the committee; and at the proper time I shall move to expunge their names from the record for the same reason.

Mr. CONKLING. I desire to say a word about this matter, and I feel bound to say it because I am in some sort responsible for the presence of this name which it is proposed to strike out. The objections which I hear assigned, particularly by the honorable Senator from Michigan, seem to me rather applicable to bills of this sort and to the generality of names which they have contained and to the mode of proceeding in regard to them than to the particular name at which they are aimed. I have never been in committee or in the Senate one of those filled with the most alacrity on this subject. On the contrary I have thought there ought to be some established mode of investigating applications of this sort; that there should be restrictions provided and some mode of sifting all applications, to the end that it need not be so hap-hazard as it must be in spite of all personal effort to investigate it. Therefore I have a good deal of sympathy with the suggestion which I hear made now as applicable to Mr. Rogers.

I differ, however, with the Senator from Nebraska in supposing that the application by the man himself, with a frank statement on paper of his wish to have his disabilities removed and his willingness to stand to and abide by the terms which Congress have seen fit to impose, warrants his being characterized as a scoundrel, as I understood the Senator to suggest.

Mr. WILSON. That is the best evidence we can have of his integrity.

Mr. CONKLING. As the honorable Senator from Massachusetts suggests to me and as I have always thought it is one of the best evidences we can have of his fitness to be relieved and of his willingness to abide by the terms we have required, and especially as in the case of this man when the application comes from a man high in tone and high in character as I understand Mr. Rogers to be. If the person in question were, aside from his application, a scoundrel; if he were known to the Senate to be a man whose veracity was entitled to no respect then very likely such an application as this ought to be treated as of no weight. This man, however, for reasons which actuated me in proposing his name, is not I think of that character. I have taken some pains to investigate the case of Mr. Rogers. I hear, as has been stated by the Senator from West Virginia, that he is a man of high character, a man of probity and respectability, aside from his political opinions; and I hear further from informants respected, I think if I should mention them by the entire Senate, that Mr. Rogers is, especially by comparison with many others who have been relieved, a man fit to be the recipient of this clemency.

Now, Mr. President, if we are to retreat from our position, if we are to cease to remove disabilities altogether in the manner which has heretofore been observed, so be it; but if not, and if the other names included in the pending bill are to pass with or without objection, I insist upon it, upon the facts as I understand them, that it would be an arbitrary and unwise discrimination, one to be regretted, if we should strike out Asa Rogers. We are told he took office. I understand he took it when there was no disability in his way in that regard, and I understand that on his part there is in rather a remarkable degree an absence of those things which in other cases have constituted an objection. Therefore I hope that his name will not be stricken out unless on the adoption of a policy which is to go to the root of the whole matter and say that nobody shall be relieved hereafter until we have established particular modes of proceeding to ascertain the propriety of that action.

Mr. SAWYER. Mr. President, I trust that this name will not be stricken out, not because I know anything specially about Mr. Rogers except so far as has been stated on the floor of the Senate, but because of the general principle. I believe in all cases of doubt we should be in favor of that man who personally applies to have his disabilities removed. It seems to be assumed by certain Senators that the only proper parties from whom disabilities should be removed are those whom the Republicans in their neighborhood indicate as proper for such relief. I do not hold this opinion. On the other hand I believe it to be radically wrong and greatly impolitic. I believe that this idea that we shall hold the disabilities which are imposed by the fourteenth amendment over the respectable men of the South for an indefinite period to be a wrong idea, one calculated to do us mischief there, one which has done us mischief in the past; and that wherever any man of hitherto good character who is under disability comes forward and asks the Congress of the United States to relieve him from his disabilities the Government is stronger for doing it instead of weaker. Where any man has been complicated with rebellion to the Government since its reestablishment in 1865, where he has been privy or accessory to the acts of violence and outrage which have taken place in those States, I will be as slow as any other person to relieve his disabilities; but where he shows himself ready to accept the governments that have been established there, where he recognizes the existing state of things as the state of things which is to last and under which he is to live, I hold it to be an unwise policy, a narrow policy, a short-sighted policy to keep him under disability; but that, on the other hand, wise forecast requires that we should do all we can to conciliate that class of moderate men, men of conservative views—I speak of the word “conservative” in a good sense and not a bad one—men of conservative views with regard to the Government of the United States as exercised in those States. I trust, therefore, that as this is clearly a case where there are two opinions, and some of the most respectable opinions are in favor of the relief of this gentleman, the name will not be stricken out.

Mr. NYE. It is well known to the Senate that I have not been among the most anxious to relieve these men from disabilities; and yet there is a thing of public notoriety, and therefore I have a right to speak of it in this case, that it seems to me that it is due to the Senate should be made known. The Governor of the State of Virginia and the secretary of State or treasurer, I forget which, but it can be ascertained by reference to the Virginia statute, and the auditor represents the interest of the State of Virginia, which amounts to three fifths, in her great lines of railroads constructed in that State. It is charged that the Governor of that State has entered into an arrangement to sell the interest of the State in these railroads to outside individuals. This man Rogers, a native Virginian, desirous to protect the interests of the State in these roads, amounting to many million dollars, will not consent; and therefore they desire to keep him under the ban so that he will be removed, for the purpose of bringing about, if what is charged is true, one of the most nefarious things that have been concocted in this country. He stands there in defense of the rights of Virginia against men who, as is claimed, are desirous to dispose of the interests of that State, and for that reason they desire to get rid of him. If that is the case I protest against the Senate of the United States becoming a party to any such thing.

Mr. WILSON. Have you reason to believe that is so?

Mr. NYE. I have information that leads me to believe it is so; I have seen affidavits in relation to it, and there are persons here in this city now representing to the incoming President, the present commander of the Armies of the United States, that it should not be done. I hope therefore we shall not be swift here to declare that this man shall not have his disabilities removed if he is standing up there with the laudable purpose of defending the substantial and material interests of his own State. Of this fact I have been informed this morning, and I have seen some papers that will be made public to-day, I have no doubt. I hope, therefore, the Senate will not reject this application, but leave it at least to be considered hereafter.

Now, sir, I have one word more to say. I do not comprehend the Christian logic of the honorable member from Nebraska, [Mr. Tipton.] I cannot comprehend how it is sinful for a man to ask God or man to pardon his sins, and I do not see any good reason why he should not ask for himself. I think that the honorable Senator from Nebraska when he comes to review that logic will find that it is unsound. We are directed in the Bible to ask and we shall receive, to knock and it shall be opened unto us, but there is no promise that it shall be opened to anybody else who knocks for us or that we shall be forgiven if anybody else asks for us. We ask these things for ourselves, and I call the honorable Senator from Nebraska's attention to the fact that he had better review his Christian logic; it will not do for an enlightened Senator. Now, sir, I have said all I desired to say.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President, if any case has been sustained before the committee this case of Mr. Rogers has been. His petition states, in speaking of the consequences of the rebellion, “I accepted the result, received pardon from the President, took the oath of allegiance anew, and am now as loyal to the Constitution and Government of the United States as any man.”

The Senator from West Virginia [Mr. WILEY] certifies over his signature, “My information and belief are that this gentleman is worthy of the exemption he asks.” The Secretary of War, General Schofield, says, “From personal acquaintance with Mr. Rogers I have no hesitation in recommending the removal of his political disabilities and selection in office.” General Stoneman writes to the General of the Army, “recommending the removal of political disabilities in this case,” and also in the case of William C. Wickham. Then, we have a letter from the district attorney, who was nominated to and who was confirmed by the Senate, recommending the same thing; and then a petition from a number of the loyal citizens of Virginia to the same effect. If, when we have the renewed oath of allegiance of the applicant, the recommendation of the Secretary of War, of leading members of the political party in Virginia, of the Senator from West Virginia, all this is not evidence sufficient when there is no evidence to the contrary to remove political disabilities, you can hardly ever expect to have a case presented to the Senate.

Mr. CONNESS. Mr. President, I accept the statement as made by the honorable Senator from New Jersey. I think it makes out a case; and if such statement had been made by the honorable Senator from Illinois in lieu of the aspersions cast on loyal men in that State I should have been glad to accept it from him.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I stated that we had the papers, but I had them not in my possession, and I sent for them.

Mr. CONNESS. I am speaking not of what the Senator did not state, but of what he did state, and I say he cast aspersions on loyal men.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I am not quite willing that the Senator from California shall charge me with making aspersions on loyal men. I have done no such thing. I said that—

Mr. CONNESS. I have the floor.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from California is entitled to the floor.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Go on, sir.

Mr. CONNESS. I shall not give way to a lecture. I will give way if the honorable Senator wishes to make an explanation.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I can take my time to reply.

Mr. CONNESS. Very well, sir. What I meant by aspersions was the sneers of the honorable Senator at the Grant and Colfax Club. Does the Senator deny that he sneered at them? The tones of his voice were eloquent in that direction. I am not quick to do anything at the instance of political or other clubs. I did not go upon the testimony of that club in what I said; but I do think, with great deference and respect to my friend from Illinois, that those men have a right to make requests here without being held up to public scorn for doing it, and that upon a subject of this kind they have a right to be heard and treated with consideration. My purpose in rising, upon the statement made by the Senator from New Jersey, which seems to comprehend the facts of this case, was to withdraw the amendment which I had moved.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I shall say but a word after what the Senator from California has said, and would not say one word except that his remarks, whether intentional or not, would have a tendency to place me in a false position. The statement that I made was not a sneering statement at loyal men. What I stated was that the committee had this application before it, and had recommendations, but I had not the papers before me, that there were many cases, and I was unable to state the particular facts, but that I had assurances from reliable men that this was a proper case for relief. In the meantime, I sent for the papers and handed them over to the Senator from New Jersey, who has presented them, and they are satisfactory, I am glad to say, to the Senator from California. And this only shows how the Senator from California is misled by just such a proceeding as this of a Grant and Colfax club. I did not sneer at the loyal men. The position I took was that the Senate should not be prejudiced in its action on removing political disabilities by the opinions of a political organization. If they state facts for our government, of course they are entitled to consideration, not because they are a Grant and Colfax club, but because they present facts which should govern us in the decision we are to make.

But I do not wish to take up time about it. I only wish to disavow any design or intent (and I do not think my language warrants it) of reflecting upon men because they belong to a Grant and Colfax organization. I am very glad they do belong to it, but I do not wish to be governed by their opinions merely.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The time fixed for the special order has arrived.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the Speaker of the House of Representatives had signed an enrolled bill (H. R. No. 568) explanatory of the act entitled “An act declaring the title to land warrants in certain cases;” and an enrolled joint resolution (H. R. No. 469) granting the use of military equipments for the inauguration ceremonies; and they were thereupon signed by the President pro tempore.

PRESIDENTIAL APPROVALS.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. WILLIAM G. MOORE, his Secretary, announced that the President had on this day signed and approved the following enrolled bills:

A bill (S. No. 467) to confirm an entry of land by Moses F. Shinn; and

A bill (S. No. 968) to authorize certain banks named therein to change their names.

MISSION AT MADRID.

Mr. CONKLING submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested, if in his opinion compatible with the public interest, to transmit to the Senate copies of all correspondence on file in the State Department between the minister of the United States at Madrid and the secretary of the legation at the same place within the last two years.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed a joint resolution suspending the sixteenth and seventeenth joint resolutions of the two Houses during the remaining term of this Congress, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

The Senate subsequently concurred in the resolution.

The message further announced that the House had passed the following bill and joint resolution, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

A bill (H. R. No. 2014) in relation to bridges over the Ohio river; and

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 470) in reference to the proper completion of the Pacific railroads and branches.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the enrolled joint resolution (H. R. No. 466) donating condemned cannon and muskets for the McPHERSON monument; and it was thereupon signed by the President pro tempore.

PAY OF COMMITTEE CLERKS.

Mr. CONNESS submitted the following resolution for consideration:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate be, and he is hereby, authorized to pay to the committee clerks their per diem salary from September 22 to November 11, 1868.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a message from the President of the United States, returning, in compliance with a resolution of the Senate of the 27th ultimo, the resolution of the Senate of the 25th ultimo calling for a statement of internal revenue stamps issued by the Government since July 1, 1862; which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented a message from the President of the United States, communicating correspondence concerning a decree made by the United States chargé d'affaires in China on 1st of June last, prohibiting steamers sailing under the flag of the United States from using or passing through the Straw Shoe channel on the Yangtze river; which was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

He also laid before the Senate a letter from the Secretary of the Interior, recommending an appropriation of $929 50 to enable him to pay for the rent of rooms used for the executive work of the Pension Office outside of the Interior Department; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The bill (H. R. No. 2014) in relation to bridges over the Ohio river was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

The joint resolution (H. R. No. 470) in reference to the proper completion of the Pacific railroads and branches was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Pacific Railroads.

ARMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The hour fixed for the special order of the day—half past twelve o'clock—having arrived, the bill (H. R. No. 1803) making appropriations for the support of the Army for the year ending June 30, 1870, is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole; and the pending question is on an amendment offered by the Senator from Rhode Island, [Mr. SPRAGUE,] to add to the bill a new section, which will be read.

The proposed section was read, as follows:

And be it further enacted, That the public domain within the jurisdiction of the United States other than that guaranteed by treaty to Indian tribes or otherwise heretofore granted by law be, and it is hereby, declared the sole property of the United States, and all occupants thereof are hereby declared subject to the laws of the United States.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I do not see on a slight examination of that amendment that it really changes the principle of law applicable to the public domain. It simply declares our sole right to the public domain. I believe the general policy of law is that the Government of the United States is supreme over all its territories. At the same time we have recognized a qualified possessory right in the Indian tribes. I do not understand that this declaration presented by the Senator from Rhode Island changes the general principle of American law; but there is one other point where perhaps it makes a change in our policy, and that is it subjects all the occupants of the public domain—having reference chiefly I suppose to the Indian tribes—to the jurisdiction of the United States. In that single particular perhaps I think it does change the principles of our law, or at any rate our policy heretofore. I suppose that may be the object of the Senator. I do not know, if any declaration so general in its character is proper to be put upon an appropriation bill, that this is particularly objectionable. Certainly in my view of it that it runs exactly in harmony with the law to a certain extent, I should not object to that part of it; nor do I know exactly that it is objectionable to subject all the occupants of the public domain to the civil and political jurisdiction of the Government of the United States.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I should like to hear an explanation of the amendment. I am not quite able to understand its meaning and effect, and I should be glad to hear the Senator who offers it explain it.

Mr. SPRAGUE. Examining the bill under consideration by the Senate, I notice $8,000,000 and $15,000,000 devoted to the transportation of troops and incidental expenses connected with the movements of the Army, or Army occupation and operations, and I have noticed from time to time constant negotiations with Indian tribes by which public lands said to belong to the United States go into the possession of railroad companies or into the possession it may be of the United States. The object of this amendment is simply to declare that all property not now under treaty stipulation and not heretofore granted to Indian tribes, or having heretofore been obtained from Indian tribes and granted to railroad companies and others, shall belong and be understood to be the property of the United States with this in view: that hereafter there shall be no treaties with Indian tribes for lands except those tribes with whom we now have treaty arrangements. If we can get lands from those we have heretofore made treaties with by which we have guaranteed full possession of the lands to them, that may be a legitimate practice and it may be a legitimate object of negotiation; but I desire that hereafter the Commissioner of Indian Affairs or the Secretary of the Interior shall not buy from Indians land throughout this western continent. I do not wish our officers to go to hunting out wild Indian tribes or their chiefs or head men and negotiating and paying the money of the people of the United States to them for lands when we have, as in this bill, paid for them through the operations of the Army. It is intended to do away with these treaties, and in my judgment it is a wise provision. It interferes with nobody's rights and privileges, and will prevent the injurious influences that flow out of our Indian operations.

Mr. GHIMES. The effect of this amendment as described by the Senator who offered it is much more extensive in its scope than I supposed it was from a casual reading of it. It is neither more nor less, according to his statement, than an attempt to change the whole policy of the Government on the subject of Indian affairs and its future transactions with the Indians by a simple amendment on an Army appropriation bill—an amendment not proceeding from the Indian Committee or from any committee, so far as I know. It may be wise to do this; but I suggest that it is hardly wise for us to do it on a bill of this kind and at this time; the inevitable result of it will be to lose the bill entirely.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I think the amendment is objectionable in its present form because it proposes to extend the laws of the United States over all the Indian tribes in the country and make the individual Indians belonging to tribes subject to the laws of the United States.

Mr. SPRAGUE. Only the wild Indians; it does not apply to lands now occupied by Indian tribes with whom the United States are in treaty relations.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I understand that the effect of this amendment would be to extend the laws of the United States to the Indians upon all the public lands of the United States, and it seems to me that the effect will be to interfere with the tribal organizations of these Indians. Heretofore where there is a tribe of Indians organized, wild Indians upon the public lands, the settlement of all questions and difficulties that arise among that tribe is left to the authorities of the tribe, and the United States does not attempt to interfere in the settlement or adjustment of those difficulties. Suppose, to illustrate, that one Indian kills another where there is a tribe of Indians organized according to their usages and practices upon some part of the public domain. Will not this amendment make it necessary that the United States shall prosecute the Indian who has killed the other in the courts of the country, and so undertake to interfere with the government of these respective tribes, and will it not devolve upon the Government of the United States a very great amount of trouble and expense which the Government would not otherwise incur? I do not know that I have any particular objection to the amendment as far as the words "property of the United States" are concerned, and I move to amend the amendment by striking out "and all occupants thereon are hereby declared subject to the laws of the United States;" so that if amended in that way it will read:

That the public domain within the jurisdiction of the United States, other than that guaranteed by treaty to Indian tribes or otherwise heretofore granted by law, be, and it is hereby, declared the sole property of the United States.

I should be apprehensive that unless this amendment that I propose is adopted it would lead the Government into inextricable difficulty with the different tribes that are found in various parts of the country.

Mr. SPRAGUE. I have no objection to that amendment prevailing. The words which the Senator from Oregon moves to strike out were put on at the suggestion of a prominent member of the Indian Committee of the Senate. I do not think they are necessary, and I agree to the modification.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. POMEROY in the chair.) The amendment of the Senator from Rhode Island will be reported, as modified.

The Chief Clerk read the amendment, as modified, as follows:

And be it further enacted, That the public domain within the jurisdiction of the United States other than that granted by treaty to Indian tribes or otherwise heretofore granted by law be, and it is hereby declared, the sole property of the United States.

Mr. HOWARD. I suppose that to be the case already. The public domain of the United States is the public domain of the United States; and I should really like to understand from some gentleman familiar with that very recondite principle of law what the meaning of this amendment is. I should like to understand from the chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs what it means. I do not see the necessity of incorporating such a truism as that into a statute.

Mr. CORBETT. I do not understand that this amendment originates with the Committee on Indian Affairs; it comes from the Senator from Rhode Island, who is not a member of that committee.

Mr. HOWARD. I beg pardon of the committee, then.

Mr. SPRAGUE. It is not in the mere words of the amendment that I desire to impress my conviction of its importance upon the Senate, but it is to assert that the public lands of the United States belong not to two or three hundred thousand wild Indians, who are now recognized as holding this property, and with whom the time of the Senate is occupied night after night and day after day in considering treaties for their lands. What is the nature of a treaty with an Indian tribe except it is to obtain from them lands? A large portion of this appropriation bill is devoted to appropriations for the movement of your armies, by which and through which these treaties are made for these lands. When an individual expends money he expects something in return; and so it should be with the nation. But, sir, I have very little hope of succeeding with any provision calculated to protect the public property of the United States and prevent its going into the possession of companies and corporations, and then those concerns being consolidated into great powers, as seems to be the course of things now in this country. There is a great tendency to monopolies, commencing, it may be, with the lands of the United States, and going through every known occupation and operation of the people. I have very little hope that it can be stopped by law, but it is my design by this amendment to assert that this land, which we have heretofore been engaged in purchasing after conquering, shall, by the provisions of these appropriations, become the property of the United States without further treaty, without further expenditure of money, and that those who are on them—the wild Indians, uncontrolled and governed by no law—may be controlled and governed by the law that is put in operation by the movements of the Army as determined by those appropriations.

Mr. HOWARD. I do not know, sir, that this amendment is of much importance one way or the other, but it strikes me as introducing into our legal code a principle which has not hitherto been recognized by the United States, a principle which is, in my view, an anomaly not founded exactly in justice, according to my imperfect vision. There are still vast tracts of country within the jurisdictional limits of the United States occupied by wild Indians who exist in the shape of tribes with whom we are in the habit of almost daily diplomatic intercourse—tribes which we recognize as possessing certain national powers. Even the Constitution itself recognizes the Indian tribes as nations or communities capable of entering into treaties with the United States. That has always been the practice of the Government up to this day. Whatever injury or injustice may have been done to the Indians heretofore in our past history—and those injuries have doubtless upon occasion been great and flagrant, as I admit—still we have recognized the Indian tribes as political bodies possessing certain elements of national independence. If they had not been so regarded by the framers of the Constitution they would not have been careful to insert a clause in the Constitution authorizing us to enter into treaties with Indian tribes, as is done in express terms.

Now, sir, the law which has prevailed in relation to Indians from the time of the discovery of the continent down to the present time is, in general terms, this: the Indian tribes are recognized as possessing the right of occupancy of the soil where they subsist, and all the right acquired by the Government of the United States or of any European nation over them was the right of preemption to their lands. It is not, perhaps, strictly true to say that the nations of Europe and the United States have recognized in the Indian tribes the fee-simple title of their lands, but all our history shows that we have regarded them as entitled to the right of occupancy until they had parted with that right by a formal treaty of cession. This amendment, however, declares that all territory lying within the United States which has not been ceded by the Indian tribes to the United States, which lies wild and unoccupied by white men, shall be the absolute property of the United States. I think that is the language of the amendment. If I am wrong I would thank the Chair to correct me. Is not the expression "absolute property?"

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Not "absolute." Let the amendment be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be read.

The Chief Clerk read the amendment, as follows:

And be it further enacted, That the public domain within the jurisdiction of the United States, other than that guaranteed by treaty to Indian tribes or otherwise heretofore granted by law, be, and it is hereby, declared the sole property of the United States.

Mr. HOWARD. "Sole property." There is not much difference, I am not sure that there is any appreciable difference between the two expressions, "absolute property," which is the phrase I used, and "sole property" which is the language of the amendment. Now, sir, I can never give my consent to such a proposition as that. I think that under the laws of nations and under the Constitution land which has not been ceded by the Indians to the United States and which lies in its original wilderness of nature is not the sole property of the United States, and we cannot make it so by an act of Congress without a gross usurpation of the rights of the Indians recognized by our own Constitution as well as by the principles of humanity upon which this Government has ever endeavored to act toward the Indian tribes. I object therefore to the enactment of the clause which seems to usurp a title, a jurisdiction, and a property, so to speak, which has never been recognized in the United States.

Mr. HARLAN. I am inclined to think that it is doubtful whether the amendment ought to be adopted. I do not know how it might affect the right of preemptors to go on to Indian reservations, nor do I know how it might affect railroad grants or the rights of railroad companies that have grants to take up lands now within the possessory limits of Indian tribes—lands for which they have no paper title whatever. I see no good that could grow out of it, but possibly considerable danger to the rights of Indian tribes who may be holding lands without any paper title whatever. I think it is too important to come in in this way without examination by some committee of the Senate.

Mr. HOWARD. I think so.

Mr. SPRAGUE. One object that I had in proposing the amendment was for the benefit of the Indian tribes themselves, for it has become a public scandal that of the money appropriated to carry into effect the Indian treaties little or none of it reaches the tribes themselves. The United States Government is satisfied when it has paid the money, and from that time thereafter the Indians may starve or be destroyed; the Government cares not. I do not intend by this amendment to take away one dollar of money that it is proper to expend in the care and in the protection of the Indian tribes; but it is my object that at first these lands, under cover of a dodge, shall not be stolen, and that after that the money which is appropriated for that stealing shall go to the tribes themselves for their protection, security, and benefit. This amendment may not have all the elements necessary to carry that object into effect; but it is pertinent. Every child who can read a newspaper knows that our Indians in the West are first recognized as nation: and then are destroyed by citizens of the United States, whose doings are connived at by the operations of the Government of the United States. I have occupied a seat here and witnessed that kind of operation with disgust. I see here in your appropriation bills large appropriations for the movements of your armies in the West toward occupying the lands in the interior of this country and in the center of this continent, and we are soon to take possession of Alaska. There hundreds of millions of the people's money are to be appropriated in treaties for the repurchase of that territory, to be received by whom? By the Indians? No, sir; by those who go to Alaska and make the treaties with the Indians—the lobbyists who are concerned in such operations. These are the men who are to receive the people's money for lands that we assume to purchase from the Indians.

Mr. HARLAN. I have no doubt that the Senator's purpose was patriotic and in every sense honorable to his head and heart; but I can think of cases where this amendment might operate directly to the reverse of what the Senator intends. The amendment declares, if I have understood its reading correctly, that all public lands not ceded to Indians by treaty, or declared to be theirs by law, shall become public domain. Now, there are Indian tribes who are settled on lands set apart by the President of the United States by a simple executive order; and I am not sure but that there are others located on what are called reserves by orders from the Interior Department who are not supported directly by any law or any treaty stipulation.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Will the Senator yield to me for a moment?

Mr. HARLAN. Certainly.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I appeal to my friend from Rhode Island, as this is a declaration of a principle of law which does not seem to be entirely germane to this bill to withdraw it. I should take it as a favor if he would withdraw it now and offer it at some other time on some other bill.

Mr. SPRAGUE. My object has been attained, and I withdraw the amendment.

Mr. WILSON. I move to amend the bill by inserting the following additional section:

And be it further enacted, That officers of the Army when retired on account of wounds or other disability received in the volunteer service shall be retired under the same conditions as though they had been serving in the regular Army at the time such wounds or disability were received.

Mr. GRIMES. What is the effect of that?

Mr. WILSON. The effect is to put the men who have served in the volunteer service, and have been wounded or broken down in the service on the same footing that they would be if they had been serving in the regular Army. We have some such officers. In fact very many regular Army officers were wounded in the volunteer service, and we have some such officers who have been appointed in the Veteran Reserve corps, whose wounds after healing up have reopened so that they are in a condition where it is proper that they should be retired. This puts them on the same footing with other officers.

Mr. GRIMES. What is that? Full pay?

Mr. WILSON. The same as to other officers who are retired. There should not be any discrimination made against them, because they received their wounds or disabilities in the service of the country.

Mr. GRIMES. How much additional pay will it give?

Mr. WILSON. Take the case of an officer in the Army who two years ago, when we increased the regular Army, was appointed from the volunteer service. He was wounded badly, perhaps, and put in the Veteran Reserve corps. Now he can be mustered out of service without having any pay. That has been the construction. I want to put him on the same footing as though his wounds were received in the regular line of the Army. I think it is right and proper.

Mr. CORBETT. I ask the Senator from Massachusetts if this affects any other officers than those appointed in the Veteran Reserve corps?

Mr. WILSON. I do not know that it affects any other officers than those in the Veteran Reserve corps; but if there are any volunteer officers who have received wounds who have been appointed into the regular Army from the volunteers, and their wounds should break out afresh, or they should in consequence of them become unfit for service, so that they ought to be retired, they should be retired on the same footing with officers who were wounded in the regular service.

Mr. CORBETT. It leaves out the officers who may be wounded and may now be unable to do any service who have not been appointed in the Veteran Reserve corps. It does not give them any pay.

Mr. GRIMES. No; and that is the inequitable thing about it. To-day out of all the officers in the volunteer service of the United States during the war who were wounded there have been selected enough to officer four regiments of the Veteran Reserve corps. They were generally wounded men, but they were selected not merely because they were wounded and disabled officers, but because they were friends of men who had influence. They would ordinarily go on to the retired list when they became entirely disabled and get half pay. Now, it is proposed that they shall all be retired with full pay. That is the meaning of it; but there is no proposition to pay the man who was in the volunteer service but who was not a favorite so as to be promoted into the Veteran Reserve corps anything additional to the pittance of a pension he is drawing under your pension laws.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I wish to ask a question of the Senator from Massachusetts as to the effect of this amendment. Suppose an officer to hold the rank of captain in the regular Army and the rank of major general in the volunteer forces, if he is retired under this section may he not take his choice and be retired as a major general with the pay of major general instead of that of captain?

Mr. GRIMES. Certainly.

Mr. WILSON. Oh, no.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I understand the Senator from Massachusetts not to give his assent to that proposition, but it seems to me the amendment is susceptible of that construction.

Mr. GRIMES. By reference to the one hundred and fiftieth page of the Army Register it will be seen exactly what this proposes to do. Here is a list of "officers retired upon the full pay and rank of the command held by them when wounded, in conformity with sections sixteen and seventeen of the act of August 8, 1861, and section thirty-two of the act of July 13, 1866." A man who held the rank of brigadier general in the volunteer forces up to the close of the war and then was appointed to a captaincy in the Veteran Reserve corps, would be retired under this amendment according to the rank he held at the time he was wounded.

Mr. CORBETT. He would receive half pay according to that rank, so that if he was a brigadier he would receive half a brigadier's pay, while if he served as a brigadier and did not get into the Veteran Reserve corps he would receive only a pension of thirty dollars a month. One gets $360 a year, while the other who is able to secure a position in the Veteran Reserve corps gets perhaps $2,000 a year. It seems to me that is unjust. There ought to be some uniformity in this matter, and the provision we make ought to apply as well to those who have not been assigned to the Veteran Reserve corps as to those who have.

Mr. WILSON. I withdraw the amendment for the present.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. POMEROY.) The question is on concurring in the amendments made as in Committee of the Whole; and the question will be taken on all the amendments collectively unless some Senator desires a separate vote.

Mr. MORTON. I move to strike out so much of the amendment offered by the Senator from Massachusetts from the Military Committee as refers to brigadier generals.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator then desires a separate vote on that particular amendment?

Mr. MORTON. Yes, sir.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That amendment will be excepted from the general vote of concurrence.

The other amendments were concurred in.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment reserved at the suggestion of the Senator from Indiana will now be read.

The amendment was read, being to add to the bill:

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That the President is hereby authorized and directed to reduce the Army of the United States as rapidly as the interests of the public service will permit, in the manner and to the extent hereinafter specified. The number of infantry regiments shall be reduced to thirty by consolidation, and no more enlistments shall be made into the infantry or artillery until the number of enlisted men in each regiment falls below the minimum number prescribed by law, and thereafter the number of enlisted men shall not exceed the minimum; and no appointment of brigadier general shall be made until the number be reduced to less than eight, and thereafter there shall be but eight brigadier generals in the Army.

Mr. MORTON. I move to amend the amendment by striking out the words "and no appointments of brigadier generals shall be made until the number be reduced to less than eight, and thereafter there shall be but eight brigadier generals in the Army."

By the section the reduction of the Army is left entirely to the discretion of the President, and it is proper also to leave to the President the discretion of filling these vacancies or not. The chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs will make no objection to my amendment.

Mr. CONNESS. The effect of the proposition I understand to be to leave the number of brigadier generals as at present authorized by law.

Mr. MORTON. Yes, sir; and to leave it in the discretion of the President whether he will fill up any vacancies.

Mr. CONKLING. The Senator from Indiana may or may not remember that on a recent day the Senate by a very large vote adopted a provision not only in harmony with this clause as it stands, but going somewhat further—a provision recalling, I might say withdrawing altogether the power to fill up the two existing vacancies in the grade of brigadier general until the further direction of Congress. It was then the clear judgment of this body that the action I speak of should be taken. I do not remember whether the Senator from Indiana was in his seat or not. The provision which it is proposed to strike out, although it does not go so far, is in harmony with that action; and now the Senator proposes to obliterate this so as entirely to dispense so far with all idea of reduction of the Army. I hope it will not be stricken out.

Mr. MORTON. That bill has not become a law.

Mr. CONKLING. I think it has become a law.

Mr. MORTON. There are reasons why I think this provision ought to be stricken out and the matter left to the discretion of the President to determine whether he will fill these vacancies or not. The reduction of the Army is left in his discretion. He may have occasion to reduce it in the next year or two or he may not. It has therefore been wisely concluded to leave with him the solution of that question, and it should be left with him to determine the question whether these vacancies be filled or not. He may find it important to fill these vacancies, and I think it very likely he will. It is for that reason I move to strike out that clause so as to leave it with the President as the rest is left with the President.

Mr. CONKLING. Consistency throughout would be perhaps too much to exact even from a body so eminent as this; but I submit to the Senator from Indiana and the Senate that it would look very strange, it would be a curious specimen of legislation if on the statute-book, divided in date by only a few days, should be found two enactments, one providing absolutely that the grade of brigadier general should not be filled until Congress should hereafter see fit, and the other a few days later, not only obliterating that provision, but standing against, as far as it indicates at all, all reduction by Congress of the Army in that regard. It would be a very broad intimation, I submit, to the President, not that he was to exercise his discretion, but that Congress reversing its judgment, although within a few days, had come to the conclusion that the time had arrived when these vacancies ought to be filled up. I am sure the honorable Senator from Indiana does not mean that; and unless we have lights on that subject which we had not the other day when the action to which I refer took place, we ought not to reverse it.

Since this suggestion was made a Senator asks me in conversation whether the action I speak of was anything more than a direction in reference to the particular persons then nominated. I will say that I refer to no action in executive session, but to a provision incorporated in a bill reported from the Committee on Military Affairs which declared as a proviso, in so many words, that no nomination whatever, no appointment at all, should be made to fill existing vacancies in the grade of brigadier general until Congress should in future so provide.

Mr. MORTON. If the Senator is right about that I ask him what is the use of reenacting it? If that has already been declared by law why reenact it in this section? What I propose simply leaves silence on the subject. If that which he refers to has become a law it does not affect it one way or the other. It is wholly unnecessary to reenact what he says has already been effected; but I think the Senator is mistaken on that point. I hope the section will be stricken out. I do not know what law the Senator refers to. I was not present when it was enacted and have no knowledge of it; but if he is right about it, then it is unnecessary to reenact it, and striking this clause out will simply leave the amendment offered by the Senator from Massachusetts silent on the subject and will not affect the other provision at all; it certainly will not repeal it.

Mr. FERRY. I hope that this clause will not be stricken out of the bill. It seems to me that any one conversant with the present and prospective condition of the Army must be fully aware that it is and will be unnecessary to fill the two vacancies existing in the office of brigadier general. All of us know that in the demand now so prevalent in the country for retrenchment, perhaps the strongest element is a demand for retrenchment in the expenditures of the Army, and the proposition to strike out this clause is substantially a proposition to create two more insecure life offices. I shall be unwilling that this clause shall be stricken out without a division upon the yeas and nays.

Mr. MORTON. If it has been already enacted, as the Senator from New York says it has, it would be a rather remarkable operation that striking out this clause and leaving the section silent would repeal the other act. I confess I cannot understand that. It simply leaves this section silent on this point. The Senator from Connecticut says it is well understood that these vacancies need not be filled. I submit to my friend that the General of the Army and the President of the United States who will soon be inaugurated, will understand that necessity quite as well as he or I, and if he should think it necessary to fill these vacancies he should have the power to do it. If he thinks it unnecessary he will not do it. We have left the question of reducing the Army from forty thousand down to about twenty-five thousand with him; we have left it to his decision, and why not leave to him this question just as well? If he is competent to decide the one he is just as competent to decide the other.

Mr. FERRY. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Before the vote is taken on this amendment I should like to be informed as to whether or not there has been a bill passed at this session declaring that there shall not be any more than eight brigadier generals in the Army. I think we ought to know that fact so that we can act understandingly on this amendment. If such a law has been passed, there is certainly no objection to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Indiana. If there is no such law, then it may be a question as to whether it is not advisable to enact such a law so as to restrict the number of brigadier generals to eight. But there seems to be a controversy about that, and the whole question turns upon that fact. I wish to be advised, if anybody can inform me, as to the exact condition of this question now at this time before the vote is taken on this amendment. I would ask the Senator from New York what information he can give on that subject as to whether or not any bill has passed restricting the number of brigadier generals to eight.

Mr. CONKLING. I drew the amendment myself—and that is the reason I have my mind upon it—at the suggestion of the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs. The amendment, as well as I can remember the words—I will not be sure of them, but I can repeat the substance—was to this effect: "And provided further, that no appointment shall be made to fill the existing vacancies in the grade of brigadier general of the Army until Congress shall otherwise direct," or "until this provision shall be repealed"—the precise phraseology I am not sure of.

Mr. MORTON. What bill did it go into?

Mr. CONKLING. Into an Army bill reported from the Committee on Military Affairs of this body.

Mr. WILLIAMS. But it has not yet been acted on by the other House.

Mr. CONKLING. That I cannot be sure of.

Mr. FERRY. It is not yet a law.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 12, nays 39; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Abbott, Cole, Kellogg, McDonald, Morrill of Maine, Morton, Osborn, Pomeroy, Robertson, Ross, Van Winkle, and Warner—12.

NAYS—Messrs. Cameron, Cattell, Conkling, Conness, Corbett, Cragin, Davis, Dixon, Ferry, Fessenden, Frelinghuysen, Grimes, Harlan, Harris, Hendricks, Howard, McCreery, Morgan, Morrill of Vermont, Norton, Patterson of New Hampshire, Patterson of Tennessee, Ramsey, Rice, Sherman, Sprague, Sumner, Vickers, Willey, and Williams—39.

ABSENT—Messrs. Anthony, Bayard, Buckalew, Chandler, Doolittle, Drake, Edmunds, Fowler, Henderson, Howe, Nye, Pool, Saulsbury, Sawyer, Spencer, Stewart, Thayer, Tipton, Trumbull, Wade, Welch, Whyte, Wilson, and Yates—24.

So the amendment to the amendment was rejected.

Mr. NORTON. I move to amend the amendment by striking out after the word "hereby," in line two, down to the word "permit," in line four, and to insert the words "directed and required to reduce the Army of the United States;" so as to make it read:

That the President is hereby directed and required to reduce the Army of the United States in the manner and to the extent hereafter specified, &c.

The amendment as it stands leaves the reduction of the Army discretionary with the President. He may reduce it or not as he pleases. The country very evidently and Congress desire the reduction of the Army. All there is in the Constitution of the United States on the subject, with the exception of the single fact that the President shall be Commander-in-Chief, is left with Congress. Congress has the power to raise armies, the power to declare war, the power to provide and maintain a Navy, and to make rules for the government and regulation of the land and naval forces, and all there is in the power of the General Government with reference to an Army is with Congress, except, as I said before, the fact that the President is Commander-in-Chief. No one can question but that the country expects, desires, and needs a large and an actual reduction of the Army. With the view, then, to bring that about, and not leave it to the discretion of any man whether this reduction shall take place or not, I move this amendment, and upon it I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 9, nays 37; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Davis, Dixon, Doolittle, Hendricks, McCreery, Norton, Patterson of Tennessee, Sumner, and Vickers—9.

NAYS—Messrs. Anthony, Cameron, Cole, Conkling, Conness, Corbett, Drake, Ferry, Fessenden, Frelinghuysen, Grimes, Harlan, Harris, Howard, Howe, Kellogg, Morgan, Morrill of Maine, Morrill of Vermont, Morton, Osborn, Patterson of New Hampshire, Pomeroy, Ramsey, Robertson, Ross, Sawyer, Sprague, Stewart, Thayer, Trumbull, Van Winkle, Warner, Welch, Willey, Williams, and Wilson—37.

ABSENT—Messrs. Abbott, Bayard, Buckalew, Chandler, Cragin, Edmunds, Fowler, Henderson, McDonald, Nye, Pool, Rice, Saulsbury, Sherman, Spencer, Tipton, Wade, Whyte, and Yates—20.

So the amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on concurring in the amendment made as in Committee of the Whole.

The amendment was concurred in.

Mr. RAMSEY. I offer an amendment to insert a new item to be added to the first section:

For the purpose of cutting out a road from Duluth, in the Bois  Fort Indian reservation, in Minnesota, there is hereby appropriated the sum of $10,000, to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of War.

I explained this proposition to the Senate some time ago on another bill. I hope they will recollect what I then said. This is a body of Indians, six or seven hundred in number, located on the Bois  Fort reservation, in the northeastern part of Minnesota, back from the lake or from any water communication or from any road some one hundred miles. Their annuities are extremely small, but still, for the lack of roads and the lack of water communication the agent is compelled to bring them down to the towns on the lake to pay their annuities, and as a consequence everything is there squandered. A little contribution from the national Treasury of this kind would relieve the Indians in their little means as well as in their morals.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. What committee does it come from?

Mr. RAMSEY. It is recommended by the Committee on Military Affairs.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SUMNER. I now renew the motion I made in committee. It is on the desk of the Secretary.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. The amendment is to add the following as an additional section:

And be it further enacted, That the Secretary of the Treasury be authorized and required to audit and fix the interest accounts of Maine and Massachusetts for advances made by Massachusetts, then including Maine, for the United States during the war of 1812-15 with Great Britain, upon the basis that the claim for these advances belonged after the separation of the two States one third to Maine and two thirds to Massachusetts, and reckoning interest at six per cent. per annum, and that he is hereby authorized and directed to pay to Maine and Massachusetts out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated such sums as he shall ascertain to be due to these States as herein directed to be audited and fixed: Provided, That in lieu of payment in money the Secretary of the Treasury may at his discretion issue to these States bonds of the United States, payable in thirty years, bearing interest at the rate of six per centum per annum, payable semi-annually the principal and interest—

Mr. CONKLING. I raise a question of order, and I object to the reading of this amendment. I inquire of the Chair if this is not the amendment which the Senate by a vote determined to be out of order on this bill. If it is, until that action is reversed, I object to its being read or entertained.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understands it is the same amendment.

Mr. CONKLING. Then I ask the Chair to decide whether, it having been determined by the Senate and announced by the Presiding Officer to be out of order, it is in order to offer it?

Mr. SUMNER. At the second stage of the bill? Yes.

Mr. CONKLING. At the second stage of the bill! I wonder if the Senator from Massachusetts is serious in that.

Mr. SUMNER. Certainly.

Mr. CONKLING. Suppose it had not been left to the Senate, and the Chair alone had decided that a certain amendment, because, if you please, it was not germane, or for any other reason, was not in order upon a certain bill, would it be any more in order at one stage than at another? If the objection was that that was not the stage some other stage might make it in order; but when the objection is that the rule of the Senate prevents its being offered at all as an amendment to this bill what difference does it make what the stage is at which it is offered, first or last?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senate has not decided the question; but the Senate as in Committee of the Whole decided the question.

Mr. SHERMAN. A question of order is never referred to a committee. The Senate, as the Senate of the United States, decided the question that this was not admissible. It was not referred to a committee at all; the bill was in committee; but the Senate have decided deliberately; and now the question is whether the Chair will carry out the vote of the Senate and enforce the order of the Senate. This, it seems to me, is the question.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Ohio make the point of order on the question whether it is proper to consider in the Senate what was considered as in Committee of the Whole?

Mr. SHERMAN. That point of order was made the other day, and was decided by the Senate. As a matter of course, it is the duty of the Chair to execute that decision of the Senate. It so strikes me.

Mr. SUMNER. But I would ask whether the Senate may not five minutes after it has ruled one way rule the other way? It may reconsider its action. It may in a fuller light say that it has ruled wrongly, and rule differently.

Mr. SHERMAN. The Senator can undoubtedly move to reconsider; but until that is done I appeal to the Senator from Massachusetts on this question of order, until the Senate does reconsider its action is not the Chair bound to enforce the order of the Senate that this is a private claim without putting a Senator again to the necessity of making the point of order?

Mr. SUMNER. I beg pardon of the Senator. The Chair may do now as the Chair did formerly, refer it to the Senate. The question raised is in order to defeat the proposition. It has been voted on once in Committee of the Whole; but it may be raised in the Senate and voted upon again; and how often does it occur that an objection made in the committee is not continued in the Senate? Again and again propositions that fail in the committee are carried in the Senate; and I think that this may be in the end no exception to that rule which occurs so often. I see no reason why the Senate should not act directly upon this now that it is moved again as it acted directly before. The question now is a new one. Because the Senate has decided a rule of order one way yesterday that is no reason why a proposition should be excluded in conformity with that decision. The whole question is open again to another vote.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I believe the rule is, as a rule of practice in the Senate, that a proposition moved once upon a bill and rejected cannot be offered again until that decision has been reversed; but that does not apply to the same proposition when offered in Committee of the Whole and again offered in the Senate. If this had been offered in the Senate once and objected to and ruled out, taking the substance of it, it could not be offered again until that decision was reconsidered. There is the distinction between the Senate and the committee. Nothing done in committee is binding upon the Senate. We act upon bills in committee for that very reason, that it shall not be considered binding until we get into the Senate. The same proposition, in totidem verbis, is offered over again without objection simply because the action of the Committee of the Whole is, just like the action of a committee, out of this body instead of in it.

Mr. MORTON. I ask the Senator if the decision of a point of order in committee is ever binding in the Senate?

Mr. FESSENDEN. That is what I was coming to. How you can make a distinction between a point of order and a proposition acted upon severally in the committee and in the House I cannot understand. The idea of our acting in committee is that nothing done there is binding conclusively upon a bill, because we must get into the Senate before the action is conclusive. It is not a Senate when we are acting upon a bill the first time, and it is so considered. That rule has precisely the same application to a point of order raised as it has to a proposition made, and it is for the purpose that I have spoken of and to accomplish the object I have referred to. Therefore the point taken by the Senator from New York, enforced by the Senator from Ohio is an entirely new point of order. I never have heard it raised before. You must come to the question of the capacity in which we were acting and not the proposition. The capacity in which we were acting at the time was as a committee of the Senate; now we are acting as a Senate, and that makes the difference.

Mr. CONKLING. The point suggested by the honorable Senator from Maine is a point which at least we can appreciate. It is very hard to appreciate the suggestion which was made before. This question of order was acted upon once under the rule of the Senate. It was the right of any member of the body within the period prescribed to move to reconsider. That no member of the body did, and the time has elapsed. Now, when the honorable Senator from Massachusetts says the question having been passed upon one way may be determined at another time in another way, he makes a remark applicable perhaps to almost everything but a question of order; not applicable to a question of order unless disorder and chaos is to be the aim of the body. The Presiding Officer had the right, and chose to exercise the right, of submitting this question to the Senate. There I agree with the Senator from Ohio, because the rule which enabled him to do this provides:

"The Presiding Officer may call for the sense of the Senate on any question of order."

That was the "sense" in fact and the "sense" expressed as I understand it, albeit at the moment the bill as to which the question arose resided in Committee of the Whole. Now what is the meaning of this rule, and what was the object of the Presiding Officer in submitting the question? In order that the Chair might be advised upon a question either doubtful or enlisting so much interest in the body that he preferred not himself alone to determine it, he submitted the question to the body.

No matter now whether the point be well taken or not by the Senator from Maine, that you can distinguish between the Senate and the Committee of the Whole, to the same body in fact and in substance the Presiding Officer submitted the question for what? In order that he might determine the judgment, the collected judgment of that body upon the question of order. Now, sir, suppose he had the right—physically of course he would have the right, but suppose he would have the right beyond that—to submit it over again, ought he to do it? Would it be anything less than frivolous for him to do it? This question of order was discussed at length the other day and determined by the same body, no matter under which name, in which the proposition is presented again. It was determined in that way; and I ask without any disrespect to Senators is it not frivolous that a Presiding Officer should refuse to execute the order and judgment of the Senate and should fall back upon the rule, and say "I will submit this again, twenty times in a day or in a session if it is renewed so often?"

I submit that the whole mission of the rule is to enable the Chair to advise himself of the construction which the Senate will put on the rule. Of that opportunity the Chair availed himself, and it cost a good deal of the time of this body. The question was answered upon the yeas and nays. It is presented again, not only the same question technically, but literally the same question. Now, while it may be that the Chair can say, "I choose again, although I have been once advised, to betake myself to the Senate and to commit this question to the decision of the Senate," I humbly submit that no discreet and firm Presiding Officer would do any such thing, because he would know that the rule had been once satisfied; that he had been once emphatically informed of the judgment of the Senate in reference to the application of that rule to the case in hand, and so he would stand to and abide by that judgment. Therefore I submit the point, and I ask the present occupant of the Chair to execute the determination of the Senate.

Mr. MORTON. It is rather a remarkable doctrine that a decision of a point of order last Friday is to be binding on the Senate for all time. The Senate had a right to reverse that decision an hour afterward or the next day or at any time. If that vote had established a new general rule which was to be incorporated in our collection of rules that would be a different thing; but it was simply a decision of a point of order for the time being, which the Senate might reverse in the next ten minutes if it thought better of it. Now, the idea is that the vote on last Friday is to be binding on the Senate for all time; for if it is binding upon us to-day it is binding upon us at the next session and the following session.

Mr. CONKLING. I ask the honorable Senator to allow me to correct him. I have heard no such suggestion. My point is that it is the duty of the Chair, I submit now, to hold the Senate to its ruling. If the Senator chooses to appeal from that ruling and the Senate chooses to reverse it so be it. My point is that in the first instance it is the discreet and fair duty of the Chair to enforce the determination of the Senate.

Mr. MORTON. I understood the Senator to make the argument that the decision was by the same body in committee as in the Senate, and that it was binding; but as his argument now simply goes to the instruction of the Chair as to what the Chair ought to do in the premises I do not wish to enter into the controversy between the Chair and the Senator from New York, and therefore shall say no more upon it.

Mr. SUMNER. Had the President of the Senate himself expressed an opinion on this question of order I can imagine he might feel personally and officially bound by it; but he did no such thing. He submitted the question to the Senate, and it was then passed upon by the yeas and nays. It is within the recollection of the Senate that there was not a large attendance; at least many Senators interested in this question were, within my knowledge, absent from their places. Now, what is more common in the business of the Senate, I would say almost every day, when a measure has been hastily acted upon and Senators are out of their places, than to present it again at a later stage of the discussion in order to have the advantage of another decision? That is all that it is now proposed to do.

But I understand the Senator from New York to suggest or to insist that a law was adopted like that of the Medes and Persians the other day, irrevocable. It might have been reconsidered, according to the Senator, had a motion to reconsider been properly made within the time in which such motions may be made; but according to his argument the question cannot be submitted at the next stage of the bill. To that I have to reply that the rule of the Senate is general and universal. When a bill reaches the second stage it is open to amendment precisely as it was in committee, nor can any proposition which was in order in committee be otherwise than in order before the Senate. No vote of the Senate in committee can tie the hands of the Senate afterward, when the bill is at the next stage. But the argument of the Senator from New York assumes the contrary. He would tie up the Senate forevermore. He would limit the powers of the Senate at the second stage of the bill by the ruling that he would have always. Sir, I insist that the powers of the Senate at the second stage are universal. Let the motion be made, and it is open to every question, to every privilege, and to every acceptance that it could enjoy at the first stage; and that, I insist, is the case now.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. (Mr. POMEROY.) This debate is considered as being proceeded with by unanimous consent.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I cannot entirely agree with the Senator from New York that it is not competent and in order now to make the proposition which has been made; but when the proposition is made as a matter of course the Chair will decide it out of order, because the Chair has taken the sense of the Senate, not as the Senator from Indiana suggests, that that vote of the Senate made a new rule of order; but it was an adjudication that the existing general rules of order did govern this particular case, and that under the general rules the proposition is out of order. Then, if the friends of the measure desire to do so, they can appeal from the decision of the Chair, and the question will be put to the Senate whether the decision of the Chair shall stand as the sense of the Senate. The point of order being now raised, as it has been by the Senator from Ohio, I respectfully submit that it is the duty of the Chair, in view of what has transpired and in accordance with the expressed sense of the Senate, to declare it out of order. Then let an appeal be taken if it is desired, and the question can be decided.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understands the question of order to be the one submitted by the Senator from New York. The Chair did not understand the Senator from Ohio to submit a question of order. The question of order submitted by the Senator from New York is not whether this amendment is germane to the appropriation bill or not, but it is precisely this: whether the decision of the Senate on a question of order while considering a bill as in Committee of the Whole is binding upon the Senate when that bill is being considered in the Senate?

Mr. CONKLING. I beg pardon of the Chair; that was not the point.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Will the Senator state his point? That is the way the Chair understood it.

Mr. CONKLING. I raise the point of order that under the thirtieth rule this amendment is not in order; and I remind the Chair that that has been the construction of the rule by the Senate in this very case; or, if there be a distinction, then by the Committee of the Whole in this very case. But my point is upon the rule, and that this amendment is not in order.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will state the question. The Chair understood the Senator's point of order to be that the amendment is not in order to the appropriation bill—the same point of order that was made when we were in Committee of the Whole. This debate, it is understood, is proceeded with by the unanimous consent of the Senate.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I do not desire to debate it, but simply to add that the Senate decided that this amendment was not in order under the rules of the Senate to a bill of this sort, it being a private claim proposed upon a general appropriation bill. Now, the argument of the Senator from New York is, that the Senate having decided it, the question being now made to the Chair, the Chair is bound by the ruling of the Senate.

Mr. CONKLING. Until the Senate reverses it.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Until the Senate reverses it; and it is not a question of judgment for the Chair except to carry out the ruling of the Senate. The point made in Committee of the Whole was that this proposition was not in order to the bill, not the question whether it was in order in committee, but whether it was in order under the rules of the Senate to the bill. That being decided, of course it is conclusive upon the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair thinks that under the practice of the Senate all propositions that are submitted to the Senate as in Committee of the Whole, if they are rejected in Committee of the Whole, may be renewed in the Senate. At any rate the Senate was about equally divided upon this question, and the present occupant of the Chair being here but for the moment, does not think it his duty to decide any question upon mere technicalities. He will therefore take the sense of the Senate upon the question whether it is in order to move the amendment suggested by the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. SUMNER. On that question I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. SUMNER. Before the vote is taken I desire to call attention to two additional precedents bearing on this case. One will be found in the Congressional Globe, third session, Thirty-Fourth Congress, page 1046. It was where an amendment was moved to pay the State of Arkansas for expenses incurred in 1849. It was on the Army appropriation bill. Mr. Hunter, chairman of the Finance Committee, said as follows—I quote his precise words:

"This amendment proposes an appropriation for a claim of a State, and should go on some other bill than the Army bill."

It will be observed that Mr. Hunter's objection was, not that the motion was out of order on a general appropriation bill or because it came from a State, but that it was out of place on the Army bill. He did not call it a private bill. Now, what was said by the chairman of the Military Committee at the time, Mr. Welser? Here are his words:

"I do not know where this amendment could be placed except upon the Army bill. It is for the payment of military service."

The amendment was then agreed to without a decision. That appears in the Globe. Then there is another case which I have before me—

Mr. TRUMBULL. I rise to a question of order. I understand it to be the rule of the Senate that all questions of order are to be decided without debate. The Chair would so decide if it were submitted to him; and now, as it is submitted to the Senate, I insist that the Senate must decide this question of order without debate.

Mr. SUMNER. I have no desire to say anything more. The other day we discussed it at great length. I am merely adducing some additional precedents. I am perfectly willing to have a vote.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. All questions of order submitted to the Chair must be decided without debate.

Mr. SUMNER. Very well; I ask for a vote.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It has been the custom; however, when a question is submitted to the Senate for the Senate to take the privilege of debating it.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I should like to make an inquiry. Is this the identical question which was decided the other day that we are now to decide upon, or is it a question whether or not the Senate is bound by the decision of the Senate in committee?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understands this to be the identical question decided in Committee of the Whole whether the amendment is germane to the bill, and whether it can be put on an appropriation bill under the thirtieth rule of the Senate.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 25, nays 20; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Abbott, Anthony, Cameron, Corbett, Cragin, Doolittle, Fessenden, Fowler, Harlan, McDonald, Morrill of Maine, Morton, Norton, Nye, Osborn, Patterson of New Hampshire, Ramsey, Rice, Ross, Sawyer, Spencer, Sumner, Tipton, Warner, and Wilson—25.

NAYS—Messrs. Buckalew, Chandler, Conkling, Davis, Drake, Ferry, Frelighuysen, Grimes, Henderson, Hendricks, McCreery, Morgan, Morrill of Vermont, Patterson of Tennessee, Robertson, Sherman, Trumbull, Van Winkle, Willey, and Williams—20.

ABSENT—Messrs. Bayard, Cattell, Cole, Conness, Dixon, Edmunds, Harris, Howard, Howe, Kellogg, Pomeroy, Pool, Saulsbury, Sprague, Stewart, Thayer, Vickers, Wade, Welch, Whyte, and Yates—21.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senate decide that the amendment is in order.

Mr. GRIMES. Questions of order having been disposed of, I suppose now this proposition stands upon its own merits.

Mr. President, there are some exceedingly interesting things in connection with this proposition, some exceedingly interesting developments that have been made in regard to it, and there are some that have not yet been made, which I wish the Senate and the country to learn.

In the first place, it will be particularly pleasant to know how the claim originated. According to the history I have read I had supposed that Massachusetts was not exceedingly enthusiastic in favor of the war of 1812-15. At any rate it took that State forty-seven years to convince Congress that she had made any advances at all, according to the statements that have been made both by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. SUMNER] and the Senator from New Hampshire, [Mr. PATTERSON], who is in part the representative of this claim on this floor; for they say that the principal of the claim was not paid until 1859. At that time the Government of the United States settled finally as it supposed with the States of Massachusetts and Maine. There was no claim preferred by either of those States, so far as the record appears and so far as has been stated by either of the Senators who have advocated the claim, on the subject of interest. The matter of interest was an afterthought. It was never presented by these exceedingly patriotic States, these States that claim to have suffered so much in behalf of the country during the war, until about five or six years ago in the midst of the civil war, when the energies of the country were crippled for the want of money. Then it was that through the instrumentality of some gentlemen who represented a railroad company in the State of Maine that has since disseminated its influences into Ohio and Pennsylvania, the States of Maine and Massachusetts appeared before the country claiming a payment for interest upon the advances that they had made of money during the war of 1812-14.

Then, Mr. President, there are some exceedingly interesting things in connection with the way in which the matter has been conducted here. When this claim came to the Senate, instead of being referred to the Committee on Claims or the Committee on Military Affairs to investigate a question of this sort, as would be the ordinary course of proceeding, it seems to have been referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, where there happen—which does not occur in any other case in connection with any of our committees—to be a Senator from the State of Massachusetts, another one from the State of Maine, and another from the neighboring State of New Hampshire. I know how that is said to have occurred. The States of Maine and Massachusetts had several claims. They were combined in one petition. They were sent to committees while they were in that combination. All the claims have been allowed except this particular one, which did not relate to anything that had arisen under the Ashburton treaty, but related to an entirely separate and independent matter. At the instance of the Senator from Massachusetts, I believe, it was referred to his committee.

Mr. SUMNER. No; I beg your pardon. I had nothing to do with the reference.

Mr. GRIMES. Well, at the instance of some gentleman who was in favor of this claim it was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations. That committee has not honored us or enlightened us with a report on the subject. We do not know anything about the facts. One gentleman who has talked to us in favor of the claim tells us that there is a precedent, and only one; and that is the precedent of the State of Maryland. Another one, the Senator from New Hampshire, [Mr. PATTERSON], who is also a member of that committee, says that there are several States that have been allowed interest on their claims, and that one of them is his own State of New Hampshire, and that Maine should be allowed interest in this instance. Where are the facts? Why do they not put themselves on the record on that subject? Why was it referred to the committee but for the committee to give us the enlightened judgment of that collective body? We have nothing that goes on record to show what the facts are.

It is true that this matter was referred to a committee in the House of Representatives in the Thirty-Eighth or Thirty-Ninth Congress. I have taken the trouble to examine their report. Five of the members of that committee united generally in favor of a claim of interest. At that time, I believe, it was understood that this interest amounted to only $170,000. Four gentlemen of the committee united in an opinion saying that it was wholly unauthorized and unexampled for a State to demand a claim of this kind. The majority of the committee, of which the Senator from New Hampshire was the organ, only referred as a precedent to the Maryland case to support the claim in this instance.

But, Mr. President, not only has the claim itself which is made against this Government expanded and enlarged, but the influences that control it and that are relied upon to carry it through Congress have been enlarged and extended. This claim is not for the benefit or to go to the government of the States of Maine and Massachusetts. The States of Maine and Massachusetts have already, owning as they claim to do according to the proposition before us two thirds in Massachusetts and one third in Maine, conveyed their title to a railroad corporation; and I saw some of the directors of that railroad corporation on the floor here to-day using the courtesy, I suppose, of the body to enlighten the minds of Senators in behalf of this claim.

I do not know that I have any special interest in this case, or that my constituents have any special interest in the case any more than the people of any other State, except that we have defrayed the expenses of our government; we have carried our State through the war upon our own resources, supporting ourselves by our own taxes; and if we have got to pay interest upon everything that has been advanced, and interest upon sums upon which there has been what was understood to be a final settlement and conclusion of the whole claim, it may be rather oppressive upon the people of my State, as the Senator from Indiana [Mr. MORTON] may in some future time find it is oppressive upon the people of his State.

Mr. SUMNER. The remarks of the Senator from Iowa seem to turn, so far as I apprehend them, on two points. The first was a suggestion with regard to the conduct of Massachusetts at the time when these claims occurred; and the second was another suggestion that if this interest account was recognized it would be a dangerous and costly precedent to the country. As to the first suggestion of the Senator, I am not here to discuss the conduct of Massachusetts on that occasion. It does not belong to the case. It belongs to the history of this Republic; and there I know it forms a not uninteresting chapter; but it has nothing to do with the merits of the question now before us. It has already been amply discussed in Congress and out of Congress. In Congress it has received a formal adjudication from which there can be no appeal. Twice over have those claims been thoroughly, most profoundly discussed in Congress; and twice over have they been recognized as among the valid claims on the Government. And now, when the question at this late day arises as to the payment of interest on those claims, not as to the payment of any part of the claims themselves, but simply as to payment of interest on the claims, the Senator from Iowa goes back of the question of interest, back of the question of the claims, and impeaches the conduct of the State of Massachusetts. Sir, I repeat again that does not belong to the case; it has nothing to do with it; it is settled. Some things must be treated as settled in the conduct of legislative.

business; and that is one of the things that this Congress cannot open for debate again. The principal has already been paid on the original claims, and I say that settles the first question which the Senator from Iowa raised.

And now the second question, as I understood him, was that this would be a dangerous and costly precedent to the Republic. Why so? Massachusetts is the only State that made advances to the national Government during the war of 1812 whose interest accounts have not been settled; and now when I propose that you shall settle them and close that book of the war 1812 the Senator from Iowa says you cannot do it without establishing a dangerous precedent. Why so? The precedent is already established with regard to every other State that has made advances to the national Government. I have before me here a memorandum showing that the interest has been allowed to Virginia for her advances, to Maryland for hers, to Delaware for hers, to New York for hers, to Pennsylvania for hers, to South Carolina for hers; and I am not aware that there is a single State that made any advances to the national Government during the war of 1812 that has not had its accounts fully closed and the interest paid to the last dollar except Massachusetts.

Now, sir, is there any reason for an exception with regard to Massachusetts? I resist as absolutely inapplicable to the case every suggestion in disparagement of the conduct of Massachusetts. That belongs, whatever it may be, for weal or woe, to the history of the past. The simple, practical question for you is, whether you will treat Massachusetts with regard to a claim the validity of which you have already twice over recognized as you treat every State in the Union? Sir, you cannot refuse to pay this interest without making an exception in disparagement of her. I have before me the statute-book which contains the act authorizing the payment of the interest due to the State of New York. Is there any reason why you should pay interest to the State of New York that is not equally strong for the payment of interest to the State of Massachusetts? Certainly not. Here it is:

"That the proper officers of the Treasury Department be, and they are hereby, authorized and directed to liquidate and settle the claim of the State of New York against the United States for interest upon loans on moneys borrowed and actually expended by her for the use and benefit of the United States during the late war with Great Britain."

There is the precedent, solid, precisely applicable. You have got to go back on your statute-book and have all these original payments of interest refunded to put those States on an equality with Massachusetts.

Mr. SHERMAN. What page and volume is that?

Mr. SUMNER. Page 192, volume four of the Statutes-at-Large. The act was passed May 22, 1826. The same volume contains the acts for Virginia, Maryland, Delaware, New York, Pennsylvania, and South Carolina. With regard to Maryland, which is perhaps the case most in point, it is entitled "An act authorizing the payment of interest due to the State of Maryland," and it goes on as in the New York statute:

"That the proper accounting officers of the Treasury Department be, and they are hereby, authorized and directed to liquidate and settle the claim of the State of Maryland against the United States for interest upon loans on moneys borrowed and actually expended by her for the use and benefit of the United States during the late war with Great Britain."

That was passed May 13, 1826. Afterward, we have that famous section, particularly applicable to this case, in which Congress decided the rule with regard to interest growing out of the claims in Maryland as follows:

"That the proper accounting officers of the Treasury be, and they are hereby, authorized and directed to reexamine the account between the United States and the State of Maryland as the same was from time to time adjusted under the act passed on the 13th of May, 1826, entitled 'An act authorizing the payment of interest due to the State of Maryland,' and on such reexamination to assume the sums expended by the State of Maryland for the use and benefit of the United States, and the sums loaned and repaid by the United States to the said State and the times of such payments as being correctly stated in the account as the same has heretofore been passed at the Treasury Department; but in the calculation of interest due under the act aforesaid the following rules shall be observed, to wit: interest shall be calculated up to the time of any payment made. To this interest the payment shall be first applied, and if it exceed the interest due the balance shall be applied to diminish the principal; if the payment fall short of the interest the balance of interest shall not be added to the principal so as to produce interest. Second, interest shall be allowed the State of Maryland on such sums only on which the said State either paid interest or lost interest by the transfer of an interest-bearing fund."

That is the rule which is known as the Maryland rule. I understand it is now adopted at the Treasury in settlement of accounts with States. The account of Massachusetts will be subjected to this rule.

Mr. DRAKE. I inquire of the honorable Senator whether that rule is expressed in the proposed amendment?

Mr. SUMNER. It is not; because on inquiry at the Treasury Department it was ascertained that it was the rule of the Department and that there was no need of expressing it.

Mr. DRAKE. It is better to have it expressed.

Mr. SUMNER. That is the explanation in answer to the Senator.

Mr. HOWARD. Will the Senator from Massachusetts allow me to ask him a question? Mr. SUMNER. Certainly.

Mr. HOWARD. I understand that the principal of these advances made by Massachusetts was repaid to the State some ten or twelve years ago by an appropriation by Congress.

Mr. SUMNER. The principal has been paid in two installments. The account of the principal was closed in 1859.

Mr. HOWARD. Very well; it has been paid. What I wish to inquire is, when this claim for interest was first presented to Congress and brought to the attention of Congress—for the Senator will of course recollect that here are fifty years that have elapsed since these advances were made, and it looks to me like a stale claim unless it was brought forward at some reasonably early period—there must be some time within which such a claim is to be barred by the universal understanding on subjects of that kind.

Mr. SUMNER. I am obliged to the Senator from Michigan for putting the question he has; although had he been present at the discussion the other day I think he would have found there was no occasion for his question, for I had already anticipated it. I have already said that the payment of the principal was in two installments—one made many years ago—leaving, however, a balance not yet liquidated. That afterward was liquidated in 1837, in the report made by J. R. Poinsett, Secretary of War, but it was not paid until 1859. I wish the Senator would bear that in mind; that the Secretary of War, in pursuance of an order from Congress, investigated this question, and he made a report in 1837 in which he adjusted the balance of principal then due to Massachusetts. Mark you, in 1837; and that balance of principal continued unpaid until 1859, when I find in the Army bill under date of March 3, 1859, the following section:

"That for the purpose of executing a resolution approved May 14, 1836, entitled 'A resolution to authorize the Secretary of War to receive additional evidence in support of the claims of Massachusetts and other States of the United States for disbursement services, &c., during the late war,' the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay to Massachusetts, out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $227,176 48, reported under said resolution to be due to said State by J. R. Poinsett, late Secretary of War, in a report dated the 23d of December, 1837, made to the House of Representatives the 27th of December, 1837: Provided, That in lieu of payment in money the Secretary of the Treasury may at his discretion issue to said State United States stock bearing an interest of five per cent. per annum, and redeemable at the end of ten years, or sooner, at the pleasure of the President."

Now, sir, you will please bear in mind that this was in 1837; but nothing was done in pursuance of this report until 1859.

Mr. FESSENDEN. My friend will allow me to state that repeated efforts were made to get the claim, but Congress, under the pressure of the strong arguments that my friend from Iowa has advanced this morning with regard to the conduct of Massachusetts during the war, repeatedly refused to make the appropriation; but in 1859 both Houses recognized the claim and paid the money.

Mr. SUMNER. The Senator states it precisely. That is the point. It was not recognized by Congress until 1859, and then we find the appropriation in the appropriation bill before me. Now, is the present claim for interest stale? Of course there was no claim for interest until the principal was finally adjusted. That was not until 1859. I need not remind the Senate what occurred immediately after 1859; how this country already at that time was darkened by the troubles that were before us; and Massachusetts, of course, was in no mood to appear as a claimant here at Washington while the troubles of the country were pending.

Mr. GRIMES. She came in the Thirty-Eighth Congress.

Mr. SUMNER. She came after the war was over.

Mr. GRIMES. Was the war over in the Thirty-Eighth Congress?

Mr. SUMNER. Was it not?

Mr. GRIMES. No, sir.

Mr. PATTERSON, of New Hampshire. This claim was presented in the Thirty-Eighth Congress, and a report was made favorable to the claim in the Thirty-Eighth Congress. It came up again in the Thirty-Ninth Congress, and a favorable report was made upon it in the Thirty-Ninth Congress; and, unless I mistake, the subject was up in the Maine Legislature previous to that time, so that there was only one year intervening between the time the principal was paid and the time that this claim for interest was urged in Congress.

Mr. GRIMES. The principal was paid by order of the Thirty-Fifth Congress, and the claim for interest was made at the latter end of the war, but during the six years past. The Thirty-Eighth Congress was less than six years ago.

Mr. FESSENDEN. If the Senator from Massachusetts will allow me, since that time I have a most distinct recollection that a bill was introduced into this body including the recast of the claim for interest of several States. That bill was brought forward in this body and was carried through this body, if I recollect aright. That was before this specific claim was made on the part of Massachusetts, so that there has been no delay except that which occurred during the immediate pressure of the war in prosecuting the claim.

Mr. SUMNER. The report which I have before me was made in the other House, January 25, 1867, and my own impression is that I had no knowledge of this claim until about the year before that, when I remember it was referred to a committee with which I am connected on the motion of the Senator from Maine; and in making that motion reasons were assigned for the reference to the Committee on Foreign Relations. It is not necessary for me to go into those, for the criticism of the Senator from Iowa in that respect is merely one of form.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I should like the Senator from Massachusetts to refer to the appropriation of 1859, that we may see what its language was.

Mr. SUMNER. I have just read it. It was the last thing I read.

Mr. DRAKE. Let us hear it again.

Mr. SUMNER. I read it from the statute which I have before me:

"That for the purpose of executing a resolution, approved May 14, 1836—"

Mark that date, if you please—

"entitled 'A resolution to authorize the Secretary of War to receive additional evidence in support of the claims of Massachusetts and other States of the United States'—"

Not only Massachusetts, but other States of the United States—

"for disbursement services, &c., during the late war," the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby authorized and directed to pay to Massachusetts out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated the sum of $227,176 48, reported under said resolution to be due to said State by J. R. Poinsett, late Secretary of War, in a report dated the 23d of December, 1837, made to the House of Representatives the 27th of December, 1837."

Therefore you will observe that this appropriation in 1859 to pay that balance of the claims is twenty-two years after the Secretary of War had reported that that balance was due; and now I ask should we not have interest on that account? Should we not have interest on the principal that had been paid before and on which we have had no interest? Is there any reason why you should treat Massachusetts differently from Virginia, differently from New York, different from Maryland, different from Delaware, different from South Carolina. Every one of those States, according to your statute-book, has had an allowance of interest on its accounts. Massachusetts alone is excepted. Sir, I insist that it is not right; I insist that if this money was due as principal to Massachusetts, Massachusetts has a right to receive the interest on that principal, according to the rule adopted with other States. You can make no exception. You cannot have fish of one and flesh of another. There is nothing in the history of Massachusetts that will justify this Senate in making an exception against her.

I believe I have answered every suggestion made by the Senator from Iowa—his suggestion with regard to the history of Massachusetts; his suggestion with regard to the pernicious character of this as a precedent, and the other suggestions. If there is any adverse decision, any adverse argument on this question, I am ready to meet it.

Mr. DRAKE. I ask the honorable Senator from Massachusetts whether the principle established in this case will not apply to all the expenditures of the States during the war of the rebellion; and whether there are not millions upon millions of dollars of interest to be paid upon those expenses if this precedent be established?

Mr. SUMNER. I cannot answer the question of the Senator. If the cases are alike then the precedent will apply. If they are unlike, the precedent will not apply. It remains to be seen whether States in the war have borrowed money and paid interest accounts for the benefit of the United States. If they have borrowed and have paid interest for the benefit of the United States, then the case would be like that of Massachusetts now. But I put the case of Massachusetts now under the shield and protection of all the other precedents with regard to the other States of the Union that took part in the war of 1812. This is the only outstanding case; it is the only one that has not been settled; and I put it to my friend, the Senator from Missouri, whether he can conscientiously say that the rule that has been applied to every other State in the Union with regard to those accounts shall not be applied to Massachusetts. On what ground will he make an exception? On what ground will he undertake to say that what is right for Virginia and South Carolina and New York and Maryland and Delaware is not right for Massachusetts? Massachusetts has been out of her money longer than any of the other States. It is because the national Government toward her has been in default. Now, shall she be made to lose the whole because of the long-continued default of the nation?

Mr. DRAKE. I ask for the reading of the amendment.

The Chief Clerk read the amendment, as follows:

And be it further enacted, That the Secretary of the Treasury be authorized and required to audit and fix the interest accounts of Maine and Massachusetts for advances made by Massachusetts, then including Maine, for the United States during the war of 1812-15 with Great Britain upon the basis that the claim for these advances belonged, after the separation of the two States, one third to Maine and two thirds to Massachusetts, and reckoning interest at six per cent. per annum; and that he is hereby authorized and directed to pay to Maine and Massachusetts, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, such sums as he shall ascertain to be due to those States, as herein directed to be audited and fixed: Provided, That in lieu of payment in money the Secretary of the Treasury may at his discretion issue to these States bonds of the United States payable in thirty years and bearing interest at the rate of six per cent. per annum, payable semi-annually; the principal and interest of such bonds to be made payable in lawful money of the United States.

Mr. GRIMES. I desire to amend the amendment so as to put it in exactly the same condition with the case of Maryland. I have copied the words from the Maryland section, which is quoted as precedent and authority. It is to add these words:

But interest shall be allowed to the States of Massachusetts and Maine on such sums only on which the said State of Massachusetts either paid interest, or lost interest by the transfer of an interest-bearing fund.

Mr. CONNESS. The words "or Maine" ought to be inserted, I think.

Mr. GRIMES. No; it is right. It was all Massachusetts at that time.

Mr. DRAKE. That is the very point on which I intended to offer an amendment.

Mr. SUMNER. Very well; let it go on the amendment. I accept it.

Mr. DRAKE. I merely wish to say that that which the Senator from Massachusetts is claiming with so much vehemence here is not the thing that the amendment proposes to give. The amendment as framed and sent to the Clerk's desk allowed Massachusetts interest upon all of her outlay, whether she paid interest for it or not. That is the point. The objection I was going to make is obviated by the amendment of the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. SUMNER. Allow me to say that this proposition in its original form contained the very suggestion of the Senator from Missouri. What was known as the Maryland rule was embodied in it. On inquiry at the Treasury Department it was ascertained that it was unnecessary, that it was merely a form; for the Maryland rule is now the rule of the Treasury of the United States. Therefore the proposition which I had the honor of presenting, were it adopted precisely as I presented it, would contain this same thing. I have no objection to its going into the amendment.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. The Maryland rule, I believe, is the rule adopted now in all the courts. I observe that on the 3d March, 1859, there was a certain sum voted, which I suppose was so done at the instance of Massachusetts. I mean the appropriation of 1859 read by the Senator from Massachusetts. Then it was ascertained that the sum of $227,176 48 should be paid.

Mr. SUMNER. The principal.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. It does not say what. It says as I have read, $227,176 48, and that was in 1859. That sum, I suppose, was introduced into that appropriation bill at the instance of Massachusetts. I suppose that Massachusetts was satisfied with that sum had it been paid. Now, I ask my friend from Massachusetts whether the amendment as introduced here only contemplates interest on that sum of $227,176 48 from 1859, or whether it goes back of that?

Mr. SUMNER. It contemplates all the interest that upon an examination of the account at the Treasury of the United States shall be found due Massachusetts, nor more nor less.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. So I understand.

Mr. SUMNER. If when we go to the Treasury it appears that there is interest due us I hope under those words it will be paid. That is my object—simply to reach the interest what is due. Of course if on inquiry it is found not to be due there will be nothing to be paid.

And now as to the inquiry of my friend, why was not interest mentioned in 1859. The object was to close the account of the principal, and to close it on the report of the Secretary of War in 1837. That was taken according to the letter, and nothing was then said about the interest. Is that different from other accounts which occur so often in this Chamber?

First secure the principal; let that be fixed; and then we can better afford to deal with the question of interest.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I think that the claim of Massachusetts is contrary to all business transactions. In 1859 there was a settlement. There was introduced into the appropriation bill a sum, doubtless at the instance of Massachusetts, what was claimed by her, and that was adopted. Now, to go back of that settlement and to claim interest anterior to that is contrary to all business transactions. As to the suggestion of the Senator from Massachusetts that the object was to get the principal paid and to leave the interest unpaid, that would be a very extraordinary proceeding, because according to strict rules of law I suppose that interest is only an incident to principal; and that if we stand to the strict law, the principal being paid, there could arise no question of interest; but of course those two rules are not applicable. I certainly think that there is no propriety about a claim for interest anterior to 1859.

Mr. SUMNER. Allow me to ask my friend why he will treat Massachusetts differently from Maryland? Her accounts were opened in 1857, and what is known as the Maryland rule was adopted. All that I ask now is that the same rule shall be adopted towards Massachusetts.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. We cannot, when we come to consider one case, try the case of Maryland and all the other cases at the same time. If the Maryland precedent was contrary to law it ought not to be accepted as a precedent. But this claim for interest anterior to 1859 for anything more than was agreed to and accepted I think is unjust.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I think my honorable friend from New Jersey, who is too fair a man to even make a mistake unintentionally, (if I may use that rather awkward mode of speech,) argues this matter rather like a lawyer. Now, sir, let us look at the facts as they are known to history, as everybody who has studied the history of the time knows them to be; and when that history is thoroughly understood by men of the present day, and more especially by my honorable friend from New Jersey, I trust that the idea which he seems to convey to the Senate will no longer appear so very plausible even to himself.

Does the Senator remember—the Senator from Iowa has called the attention of the Senate to the fact—that in the time of that war with Great Britain Massachusetts came in collision with the Government of the United States as to the question of how troops raised within the State of Massachusetts should be officered and what use should be made of them? It made great noise at the time. The men in power in Massachusetts in that day thought their Governor was right. Succeeding generations have come to the conclusion, I believe, that their Governor was wrong. It was the action of the Federal party, so-called. I am of Federal descent; but on looking at some of the questions of those days I am free to say that I think that party was in error and that was one of the mistakes it made; but what was the result of it? The result of it was that when Massachusetts and other States came to Congress with claims for actual advances made for the benefit of the Government of the United States that State was singled out by the Democratic party, which was in a large majority, and continued to be for a great many years long after the Federal party, so-called, became extinct. That State came to Congress with other States with precisely similar claims; but its claims were rejected. The Congress of the United States refused to pay them, not upon the ground that the expenses had not been incurred, not upon the ground that the money had not been advanced, but upon the ground, and the sole ground, that Massachusetts had disputed the authority of the General Government in relation to the management of its troops.

That continued a matter of contest for many years; and it was not until after a considerable number of years, although persistently demanded, that even a part of the just claim of the State of Massachusetts was recognized by the General Government and paid, and then only partially. The balance of the claim went on until the year 1837, or about that time. It was then, under the authority of Congress, adjusted at the War Department as to what amount of claim remained to Massachusetts, not of interest, but of actual payments and advances made by the State; and under the authority of Congress the Secretary of War audited the accounts and found that a certain sum was still due for those claims and advances. What did Congress do? Notwithstanding that that was found to be actually due, money paid by the Commonwealth of Massachusetts for the benefit of the General Government, Congress persisted year after year in refusing to make an appropriation to pay that money, which it admitted had been advanced by the Commonwealth of Massachusetts.

I came to the Senate in 1854. The subject was brought to my attention by an agent of the State of Maine. After several efforts the matter was brought forward. It was shown that these claims had been audited; that they had been allowed; that there was a certain sum of money due, according to the admission of the authorities of the General Government, which had stood for twenty or thirty years unpaid, because Congress would not make an appropriation to pay the debt which it admitted the General Government owed. In 1859 we succeeded in getting an order to pay that amount.

The Senator from New Jersey asks, why did you not get interest at the same time? I will answer him. We did not ask for interest at that time, simply for the reason that we were glad enough to get the principal. It was hard enough to get that. That was a fixed sum; and I did not dare to ask for interest upon that principal. That was the simple reason. We waived no claim; but with the class we had to contend against, year after year, in relation to a sum admitted to be due by the Government of the United States to the State of Massachusetts, I could not undertake and it would not have been wise for us to undertake to embarrass that claim with a claim of interest.

Now, sir, what is righteous? I put it to my honorable friend from New Jersey as a man of conscience, as a man of honor. At that period, 1859, Congress had paid interest to Maryland, had paid interest to New York, had paid interest to South Carolina, to Pennsylvania, and to other States, on claims precisely similar. They had actually paid it on moneys borrowed by the governments of those States, for which they had paid interest or lost interest by the sale of an interest-bearing fund in order to raise money for the Government of the United States. They had paid it and they had been in the enjoyment of it. Now, sir, having admitted in 1837 that the Government of the United States owed Massachusetts over two hundred thousand dollars, would it have been any more than honest that on that fixed sum, admitted at that time, which they ought to have paid at that moment, and which they did pay to other States at that moment, they should pay interest on every dollar of it, not on the Maryland rule or any other rule, but on the rule that they had admitted that sum to be due? It had been audited at their Department and was not disputed; and yet, although it was not disputed and although not one word could be said against it, they persistently refused to pay that money. Ought not the Commonwealth of Massachusetts to have been in the possession of that money in the year 1837? As an honest thing, could you, as a Senator sitting here, say that the Commonwealth of Massachusetts ought not to have been paid that money the moment it was ascertained what was actually due to her? And if Congress persistently refused to pay it what ought to be the consequence? The ordinary, natural, equitable consequence, that they should pay interest on that whole sum, which they had liquidated at that time and admitted to be due to the Commonwealth of Massachusetts. Sir, I claim that the proposition of the honorable Senator from Massachusetts, as he introduced it in the first place, if it could be construed to give interest on the whole of the money thus admitted to be due at that time, whether it arose from the sale of an interest-bearing fund or money borrowed or anything else, would be no more than just and equitable. It would be no more than could be claimed of an individual. I ask my friend from New Jersey, as a lawyer, what he would advise a client to do in such a case as that, unless he took advantage of the statute of limitations, which, I take it, the Government of the United States does not care to take advantage of in this case, although there is a terrible squinting toward that, that inasmuch as we have not got it for many years, therefore we ought not to have it at all. If that is equity, if that is good morals—

Mr. HOWARD. If the Senator will allow me, if he alludes to me, I asked the honorable Senator from Massachusetts whether any claim had been made for interest. If the claim had been made and persevered in for interest, and the party claiming it had attended to it from year to year and kept it alive, then there would be no prescription or limitation against it; but I think the case here is that there has been no claim for interest. It has been omitted, abandoned, laid aside.

Mr. PATTERSON, of New Hampshire. If the gentleman from Maine will allow me, I will state that commissioners were appointed by Maine and Massachusetts to settle this claim against the Government in the very first Congress after the principal was settled in 1859; and those commissioners presented a memorial, and it was referred in Congress the very first session after the principal was settled.

Mr. FESSENDEN. My friend from Michigan will observe that we could not get the principal.

Mr. HOWARD. That is no reason for not claiming both principal and interest because you could not get the principal.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Perhaps not; but was it not hard enough to be put off for twenty odd years; and what chance had we to be heard until we could establish to the satisfaction of an existing Congress the fact that we were entitled to the principal? They would not admit that. There was the difficulty. They would not admit that we should have a dollar of the amount which had been liquidated and allowed us on paper by the General Government under the authority of Congress, but for a period of more than twenty years refused to pay that balance for no other reason in the world than because they said they would not.

Mr. HOWARD. If the Senator will pardon me, I will call his attention to the report of Mr. Poinsett, from which it appears that in 1817 the State was paid $11,000, and in 1831 the State was paid $419,748 26. So it does not appear that there was any very long hesitation on the part of Congress to recognize the claim.

Mr. FESSENDEN. That small amount that was paid in 1817 had no reference to the question which I have now been discussing. Those were disputed claims; but the great mass of the claims were paid as I tell you. A portion was paid as the Senator says at that time, but it left an unsettled portion which Congress would not pay. That unsettled portion was liquidated in 1837, and from 1837, after the liquidation, we could not get a dollar even of the principal. Now the idea of throwing it in our faces when Congress was refusing to admit that the principal was due that we ought to have embarrassed our claim with interest at that time is demanding a little too much of us and holding us to rather too strict a rule. I submit to my honorable friend what chance would we have had for such a "claim?" We acted, I take it, with as much good sense as we could bring to bear on the question in order to make the whole thing succeed.

I say, therefore, sir, as I was saying when interrupted by my honorable friend, that in justice and equity we ought to have this six per cent. interest from the year 1837, when that liquidation was made. The claim would be good in a court of law in the case of a private party, as my honorable friend knows. The claim would be good anywhere; and if this had been a suit to be adjusted as ordinary suits are it would have carried interest by the ruling of any court. There is no question about that at all. Now, the argument is, that because Congress refused to pay its own liquidated and admitted debts at a particular time, we are to lose interest for the reason that we did not ask for interest at that particular period. What is the sequence or the sequel? Why, sir, during these years, half a dozen other States, as I said before, came forward and demanded interest. The State of New York demanded interest and the State of New York had it—interest on the money that it had borrowed and for which it had paid interest, interest on the money that it had raised by the sale of an interest-bearing fund. That was paid and given to New York. So it was with the State of Maryland. So it was with the other States I have mentioned. Every one of them had it. Massachusetts did not have it; and why? Massachusetts did not have it because Congress fought the principal. They paid the principal in the other cases, paid it when it became due, paid it when it was liquidated. No claim for interest was made then. Why was not the objection made? They got their money. Massachusetts did not get hers for the reason I have stated. After they had received their money upon that very rule these States came forward and claimed that they should have interest on the principle of this measure as it stands now amended at the suggestion of my honorable friend from Missouri, and long before 1859.

Then, sir, we having succeeded at last in 1859 in getting our principal, as the other States had got theirs, we came forward at once with precisely the same claim that these other States had and said this: "Now, at last you have paid us our principal; you paid the principal to these other States long ago; they had their money; now we ask our interest, because you paid the interest to these States long ago; they had their money; put us precisely on the footing that you have put other States of this Union; deal with us justly and honestly as you have dealt by others." That is all we ask in relation to this matter. Sir, from 1859, through our Legislature, through bills in Congress, through applications of one sort and another, we have kept this claim alive and are determined to keep it alive until we find out, once for all, whether Massachusetts is to be treated as other States have been treated in relation to this matter.

I say, then, Mr. President, that it is a question merely of common, ordinary justice as between man and man. My honorable friend from Iowa talks about the precedent. The precedent has been established over and over again. He talks about the effect of the precedent in future. Sir, if other States exist which have similar claims they are just claims, and the Government must pay whatever they may amount to, in whatever war incurred, on the same principle. There is no justice in anything else; and I apprehend that the difficulty is not so very serious as he imagines. We ask nothing but the payment of a debt.

Gentlemen have said considerable here about this railroad business. Now let me ask them to look at that a moment. This railroad is one of the few railroads in the United States which is of a national character. It is a road leading from Bangor, in the State of Maine, to the line of New Brunswick, to connect with a road that leads first to St. John's, New Brunswick, and then to Halifax, in Nova Scotia, one of the most important roads that can possibly be made of national importance. In New Brunswick the road is nearly made; the province has appropriated $10,000 a mile to the making of it and it is progressing, it is almost to the line. What will be the result if we cannot join it? They will go up through the British territory as they are now trying to do and connect with Canada instead of coming on to the United States. It is of as much importance to the business of the country as almost any road that can be made, connecting the business of all those provinces with New York and the other States of the Union. I have a map on my desk which shows what that road is. It is unquestionably of great national importance. The persons who are engaged in building it cannot build it with their own means. Mark you, it does not stand as roads in the West do which have made checker-boards of almost every western State, cutting them up into small squares. They can get the public lands; they have had the public lands to assist them in making their roads, not roads of national importance in the same point of view as this is. Nobody has voted the lands of the United States to those roads more freely than the Senators from New England and the Senators from the Atlantic border. We have never disputed the value of the improvements thus projected. I have said repeatedly here in my place, "It is useless to contend against this thing, and I give up the lands for the benefit of the improvements of the West;" and they have had them and used them and derived all the advantage from them; and they have had them of so great importance in the building of their roads that the roads could not have been built without them; and they are enjoying, and we are enjoying, those facilities. I grant that they are a benefit to us.

Now, sir, we claim no such thing. We have no interest in the public lands. There are none of them in our State; and what do the States of Massachusetts and Maine do, which is thrown at them by way of reproach by honorable gentlemen here? In the first place, on account of the national importance of this road, the States of Massachusetts and Maine gave it all the lands which they had that were unsettled, for they owned considerable in the upper part of the State of Maine. They gave the company all there was left to take. They are not worth much; but the enterprise has the benefit of them so far as they go. Then the States had claims against the United States which they have been pressing for years. One is what was called the timber claim which the State lost under the Ashburton treaty; another was this interest claim. The States of Massachusetts and Maine said this road to unite with the provinces of New Brunswick and Nova Scotia is of very great importance; let it take our timber claim and make the most of it. I think Congress allowed that claim last year.

Mr. PATTERSON, of New Hampshire. No; the claim allowed last year was for lands lost under the treaty.

Mr. FESSENDEN. That was for quieting land titles in the State of Maine about which there was no sort of dispute the moment the Senate understood it. It was passed over and over again here, and we finally got that. This claim was given for the same purpose at the same time. The States of Massachusetts and Maine said by law, "Here we give you the benefit of this claim toward making the road; if we get this claim"—for this is the amount of the law—"we will let you have the money as fast as you build the road; $10,000 a mile as far as it goes." We ask nothing of the General Government to aid in the construction of the road. Is it a matter of reproach to those two States that they are willing to appropriate their own means out of their own treasury? because it is substantially so; their claims are valid and good, and they are willing to make this appropriation for the purpose of this national work. Is that to be made a matter of reproach, and by Senators who have had the benefit in their own States of millions and millions of acres of public lands? I trust not. I think that the public generosity and public spirit of those two States ought to be, and I trust will be appreciated by gentlemen upon this floor better than that, and that they will not remind us that we are asking favors of the Congress of the United States; they will not say to us after what they have received themselves that we come here begging, when as a mere matter of fact we come here and say, "Pay us the debt that the United States owe us; treat us as you have treated all the other States of this Union; pay to us what you have detained from us up to this period of time; and instead of putting it into the State treasury we put it into a public work, which is for the benefit not only of our own States but of the whole country as much so as any other road that can possibly be imagined or laid down upon the map." This is the simple question, and I want the Senate to understand it, and when gentlemen talk of our making claims, and the number of these claims, and all that, I wish them to understand that they have been made for years and years because they were just and honest, and not because we desired to take anything out of the General Government that did not belong to us.

Mr. HOWARD. I wish the honorable Senator would inform us whether there is such disposition made of this interest-money which is now claimed at the hands of Congress as will insure its application to the construction of the railroad to which he refers.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Certainly, by law.

Mr. HOWARD. By the law of both States?

Mr. FESSENDEN. Yes, sir; by the law of both States.

Mr. HOWARD. So that there is no danger of its being perverted to any other use?

Mr. FESSENDEN. Not a particle; only they hold it in their own hands to be paid out—$10,000 a mile as the road is built. New York will be benefited as much as Massachusetts, and any of these States will be benefited as much as Maine. Trade will come through from the British provinces. It connects us with those provinces by a link that cannot be broken, and moreover it prevents the formation of a link between the upper and lower provinces themselves, which would be very disastrous to us when carried out.

Mr. GRIMES. Why?

Mr. FESSENDEN. Because when the road is once made this way the travel will come this way, and the great expense of a road off toward Canada and their distance from market will make it unwise to do it. This road will not be built for military defense, because the Government will not do it for that.

Mr. GRIMES. That is the title of the bill.

Mr. FESSENDEN. That is the title I know. I suppose there is a little ad captandum about the title. The fact is that the Government never raised its hand; and we do not expect them to do it, toward building the road; and the Senator knows that very well. We are not asking that; we are asking the Government to pay us an honest debt that we may do a thing from which the whole United States are to derive benefit. That is the simple question, and I want it understood by all the members of the Senate that when we present this matter we present it in that light only and no other.

Sir, I have said all that I desired to say on this subject.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I do not think, Mr. President, that this claim is at all to be prejudiced by the fact that the States of Massachusetts and Maine propose to apply the proceeds of the claim to a railroad, and it ought not to be thrown up in opposition to the claim. Neither do I think that the claim or its strength ought to be supplemented and aided by telling us what use the States mean to make of the money. The question is whether the United States Government, according to the principles of law and according to the principles of justice and conscience, owes this money to the State of Massachusetts, and that is the question which my friend has addressed to me. In 1859 the States of Maine and Massachusetts agreed with the national Government that this sum should be liquidated.

Mr. FESSENDEN. No, sir. The Senator is mistaken about that. It was long before.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. One minute, if you please. I say in 1859 they agreed that this sum should be liquidated at $227,000. I say so for this reason—I do not think I mistake it, I think we have a right to infer, I think we may consider it as proven—that if there is introduced into an appropriation bill a sum that is going to a State, that sum has been introduced at the instance and direction and request of that State; and in 1859 that was the sum introduced in the appropriation bill. Therefore I do not think there is any mistake in that statement.

But further, Mr. President, I understand my learned friend to say that they did not dare to ask for the interest at that time; that they were afraid it would jeopardize the whole claim; a statement which goes directly to prove the correctness of my statement that that was the sum agreed upon; because if two parties get together to settle a disputed question and one party because he does not think it prudent, or because he does not dare, or does not think it is his interest to make the claim more than he asks, thereby waives that claim.

There had previous to this been objections made to this whole claim. The whole claim had been disputed. These objections were waived by the General Government in consideration of the sum which these States agreed to take, and after that sum had been fixed by the General Government under that settlement, that account stated, that balance struck, the State of Massachusetts and the State of Maine received the money which was paid them, and after they got the money, and ten years after the considerations which led to that settlement have elapsed, they come forward and present considerations and make a claim which they admit they did not dare to make at the time. I say that it is according to law, it is according to justice that the two parties to that settlement should each be held to the settlement which they have made.

Further, Mr. President, we do not plead the statute of limitations, but when fifty years have elapsed since the claim arose, when ten years have elapsed since the settlement of 1859, when the considerations which led to that settlement have all passed away, I think it is according to conscience and judgment as well as law to say that both parties shall be held by that settlement, and especially so when we see that this would be a precedent to many claims having equal equity. Why there is not a representative of any State of this Union here who will not feel it his duty, if the Treasury is thus to be visited, to go to his home and tell his State to seek among the archives of the State whether there is not some claim of interest which they may bring against the General Government, in order that they may get their share of the spoils, as they have to bear their part of the burdens of taxation, and if it is no bar to a claim of this kind that ten years ago it was settled by the acquiescence of both parties—the State not daring to ask more, the national Government not willing to give more—if that is no bar there is no end to the multitude of claims of this character that may be made upon the Treasury.

Mr. FESSENDEN. One word in reply to my honorable friend. I have heard many arguments like that on this floor on different occasions, but I never heard one of that kind before from him, and he is the last man from whom I expected it.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Never mind personalities; answer the argument.

Mr. FESSENDEN. It is not addressed to the merits of the case. Let me ask my friend a question. Suppose for any reason, political or otherwise, something perhaps in the conduct of New Jersey, the United States Government should refuse for twenty years to pay her for her advances during the late war, would not pay her a dollar when it paid all the other States precisely similar claims, and at the end of the twenty years it should liquidate the claim and pay it, would he not think the State ought to have interest? Or suppose the United States liquidated it and then refused to pay it after liquidating it for twenty years more, agreed upon the amount and then for twenty years refused to pay that very amount, would he not think that his State of New Jersey was entitled to the interest, and if he stood upon this floor as a Senator from New Jersey would he not claim it? Sir, I know he would.

Now, a word as to what he says about the settlement of 1859. Settlement! Why, the settlement was in 1837; that is to say, the liquidation of the balance due was then made. Nothing could be said then about interest and nothing was. As I said before we claimed it persistently from that time; and what did we do in 1859? Did we make a new settlement? No settlement was made then; no adjustment was made; we simply said, "Make an appropriation to pay that which you admit to be due." That was all. So far as the liquidation was concerned, that was twenty years before. We asked for an appropriation to pay that which you then admitted to be due.

The Senator says that I admit that we were afraid to claim more. Sir, the Senator knows very well how difficult it is to get a claim through Congress. The Senator knows how hard it is; that if you put anything on it that may be carped at you peril the whole claim. We were glad enough after twenty years to get the principal at that time. And then he says we said nothing about the interest for ten years after that. Sir, we said it every year; and does not the Senator know as a lawyer that if a suit is pending in court time does not run, that no laches, no delay, no carelessness, nothing that would make a legal objection can be made to a suitor who is constantly in court? We were in the only court to which we could come, and that was the Congress of the United States. We were there from 1815 down, every year, all the time making the claim; and now it is thrown in our faces by the honorable Senator from New Jersey that because Congress would not pay for ten years after we demanded it therefore time runs against us who were demanding it and ought to have had it before. He would not make such an argument as that in a court of law.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I ask permission of the Senate to make a motion for a recess from half past four o'clock until half past seven o'clock this evening.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The motion will be entertained if there be no objection. It is moved that the Senate take a recess from half past four to half past seven o'clock to-day.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, the danger of this kind of legislation will be illustrated before the discussion of this claim is closed. I suppose the case will be so clearly presented before the discussion is closed that this claim and all similar claims will fail as amendments to bills of this kind, as I think they ought to fail. The proposition as submitted by the Senator from Massachusetts involves an appropriation of over five million dollars. He himself would be staggered at the magnitude of the claim as presented by him. I have made a computation, which is accurate, showing that the amount of the claim as presented by him is over five million dollars.

Mr. SUMNER. How does the Senator make it?

Mr. SHERMAN. I ask the Secretary to read the amendment as the Senator offered it.

Mr. SUMNER. It has been read several times.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It will be read if there be no objection.

The Chief Clerk read the amendment of Mr. SUMNER.

Mr. SHERMAN. The Senator will see that, as the proposition was offered by him, the Secretary of the Treasury is bound to take the amount due to the State of Massachusetts for expenditures during the war of 1812, amounting to $843,000, and compute interest at the rate of six per cent., deducting payments already made and allowing interest on the balance. I have a statement here showing the aggregate of that claim. The report of Mr. Poinsett, which is before me, under date of December 23, 1837, shows that the amount of the claim in exact figures was $843,349 60. Taking that amount as due in 1814, assuming that to be the average year, and computing simple interest on it at six per cent. up to the time of the payment in 1831, and then computing, according to the terms of this proposition, interest on the balance then due to 1859, deducting the amount then paid, and computing interest on the balance until this time, and it makes $5,270,000.

Mr. SUMNER. Allow me to correct the Senator. He exaggerates the original claim as allowed.

Mr. SHERMAN. I have it before me.

Mr. SUMNER. The claim was over eight hundred thousand dollars, but the allowance was only six hundred and odd thousand dollars.

Mr. SHERMAN. Eight hundred and forty-three thousand dollars is the amount stated in Mr. Poinsett's report. Every dollar of the principal has been paid. I have before me an official report of the Third Auditor's office, showing that there was paid to Massachusetts in 1817 $11,000, on the 2d March, 1831, $419,748 26, and in 1859, $227,176 49; so that the whole amount has been paid. But even if the Senator will take it upon any other basis he will find that the sum due upon the principle of computation adopted by him would stagger the Senate. But there is a carefully prepared report on this subject accompanied by a bill submitted by the Committee on Foreign Relations, and it is but just to say that the amendment suddenly offered here is a very different proposition from that reported from the Committee on Foreign Relations by the Senator from New Hampshire. That does contain certain restrictions which confine the computation of interest to the sums of money on which the State paid interest.

Mr. FESSENDEN. That is all we ask.

Mr. SHERMAN. I merely say that if we had gone blindly to work and adopted the proposition of the Senator from Massachusetts as offered there is no earthly power except Congress that could prevent the payment of over five million dollars. The proposition reported by the Committee on Foreign Relations contained this restriction: "that interest shall be allowed to Massachusetts and Maine on such sums only on which those States either paid interest or lost interest by the transfer of an interest-bearing fund." In other words, this applied to the case, the rule applied to the State of Maryland. Now, what is this claim, even within these limits? It amounts to $1,500,000.

Mr. FESSENDEN. How does the Senator know that?

Mr. SHERMAN. I have it here in a report of the honorable Senator from New Hampshire. That report contains a statement of the claim, signed by George M. Weston, and this statement was made by a gentleman whose interest it was to reduce the claim as much as possible. He was the agent of the State of Maine to get the claim through Congress, and of course his object was to reduce it as much as he could in order to get it through; and yet in 1864 he states the charge of Maine to be $353,732, and adding interest on the principal sum up to this time it would be about four hundred and fifty thousand dollars; and Massachusetts has twice the interest Maine has. Then, upon the statement of Mr. Weston, the amount due is three times $450,000.

It is apparent, then, that even if you attach to this amendment the limitations presented by the Committee on Foreign Relations the claim amounts to $1,400,000, and if you attach to it the limitation of the Senator from Iowa it is even greater. This shows that our attempt to legislate on a question of this kind at the closing period of the session when every member speaks against it with fear that he may injure the appropriation bill—when we are rushing through bills with little time to examine a question of this kind involving so large an amount directly—is dangerous legislation which ought to startle us. But, sir, remember, if this is adopted, you must apply the same principle to every State of the Union. We allowed the State of Missouri only a little while ago $7,000,000 for expenditures during this war and no interest was allowed her. That claim was pending three or four years unpaid. Why not allow Missouri nearly two million dollars interest on her claim? Ohio expended millions upon millions and was finally reimbursed the principal sum, but not until years after the money was paid out. So the three per cent. funds of some States existed for thirty years accumulating in the hands of the General Government unpaid. This principle if carried out would involve payments of fully $100,000,000 to the States. If you once apply the rule to interest it ought to be paid to the States for all debts due to them, and then the proposition to limit the debt of the Government to its present amount must be at once abandoned; we must enlarge our arrangements in regard to the public debt.

But let me go further. Although we ought not to be called on at this late period of the session to go into a matter of this kind I must go back somewhat into the history of this claim. My general recollection of it was only a general recollection of the history of the war of 1812. My honorable friend from Maine has reminded us a little of this matter. I have before me the message of Mr. Monroe, of February 1, 1824, communicating the items of this claim to Congress. He begins his message by stating in the first place that when every dollar of this expenditure was made it was made by the State of Massachusetts for local defense merely, the State of Massachusetts taking the ground that under the Constitution of the United States she had a right to officer her militia, and that when that militia was called out it was under the command of State officers and that the Federal officers could not take command. I believe that was the claim then made by the Federalists. That ground was afterward renounced by Massachusetts, but when these expenditures were made they were made upon the claim of the Governor of Massachusetts that her troops were State troops to be paid by State authority and not to be controlled or governed by Federal authority, and the Governor refused to obey the orders of President Madison as Commander-in-Chief of the United States forces. It is true that Massachusetts subsequently renounced this ground, as I gather from the message of Mr. Monroe, but Mr. Monroe communicated the claim in a message setting out the historical fact. Mr. Monroe says that since Massachusetts had renounced this heresy, as he then claimed it to be, although all the South took the same position afterward, Massachusetts ought to be placed on the same footing as the other States, and he recommended to Congress to pass laws to pay Massachusetts precisely on the principles applied to the other States. Now, what is the character of the claim? In the message he sets out the items giving the particulars, and here they are in these great folio volumes of State Papers that are preserved, I suppose, for future ages.

Mr. CONKLING. Let them be read.

Mr. SHERMAN. I will refer to but a few of them. In the month of March, 1814, there was an alarm at Mount Desert, below Penobscot, and a detachment of militia was ordered down from Ellsworth and vicinity, and the expenses of that expedition is one of the items, being $511. Then, several cannon and a large quantity of powder were furnished to the town of Kennebec in April, 1813; and in May small arms and cartridges and shot for cannon were furnished to Portland by request of the selectmen, as several British ships were near that place, and that expense was included in the bill of items although there was no actual attack. In April, 1814, Captain Hull was apprehensive of an attack on the vessels of the United States at Portsmouth, and he applied to General Dearborn for protection. General Dearborn requested that the militia of Massachusetts might be ordered out for the purpose, as the militia of New Hampshire were destitute of arms and in a state of insubordination. Orders were promptly issued calling out two hundred and fifty men from York, Kittery, and the vicinity, and the expenses of this service amounted to $14,174 97. This was a false alarm, the men had no fighting to do. In the course of the same month, April, 1814, there were alarms at various other places and the inhabitants at many points applied to the commissioners for sea-coast defenses to furnish arms to equip men in cases of emergency. Among these were Augusta, Bristol, Wiscasset, and Bath, and on these occasions detachments of militia were ordered out and arms furnished as requested.

So I might go through all the items. They aggregate $822,173 97, claimed of the United States, every dollar of which was subsequently paid. I have looked over these items, and so far as I can see from a cursory examination every item was for mere local defense. It does not appear that any of these expenses were for any matter that related to anything beyond local defense. Nearly all the items were for expenses of the militia of Massachusetts called out, and very properly called out, to defend the northern border. Why, sir, during the late rebellion at one time seventy-five thousand men were called out in Ohio to defend her people against an anticipated attack on Cincinnati—the "squirrel hunters," as they were called, and they were never paid.

Mr. MORTON. They were not paid by the State of Ohio.

Mr. SHERMAN. They were not paid at all. These men did not expect pay. Now, let us see what is the history of this claim and whether the Government has not dealt fairly by Massachusetts. It seems that in 1817 a small amount of this claim, $11,000, was paid. Subsequently, on the 2d of March, 1831, $419,748 26 was paid under the act of 1830. And let me state here that the same rules were applied to the adjustment of the claim of Massachusetts as were applied to the adjustment of the claims of New York. The law fixing the manner in which the accounts should be made up was passed in 1826. It was a general law. The Senator read from it in the fourth volume of the statutes. The $419,000 was not adjusted and allowed until five years after the passage of that law, and that amount was then paid to Massachusetts as it was believed by the accounting officers in full satisfaction of the claim. But Massachusetts still insisted upon a further claim because the whole amount she presented had not been allowed, and finally Mr. Poinsett, Secretary of War, on the 23d December, 1837, made a very brief report showing the amount still due. I will read from his report. He says:

"In compliance with the resolution of the House of Representatives of March, 1836, I have examined the claims of the State of Massachusetts for militia services and expenditures during the late war with Great Britain, and have now the following report:

"The original amount of these claims was $843,349 60, which by a payment of $11,000 in 1817, and one of $419,748 26 in 1831, was reduced to $412,601 34, which is still claimed."

And now I call the particular attention of the Senator from Massachusetts to what follows:

"Of this sum it appears, upon applying the same principles which have governed this Department in the settlement of similar claims made by other States—"

And all the States were settled with prior to this report of Mr. Poinsett.

Mr. SUMNER. Not Maryland.

Mr. SHERMAN. I will come to Maryland after a while. Maryland had been settled with before this time, however. Mr. Poinsett says that applying the same principles to this claim of Massachusetts that had been applied to the claims of the other States, "there will be due $272,716 14."

For some reason there was no appropriation of money then, and Massachusetts presented the claim, as she had a right to do, until in 1859 it was paid to her every dollar upon the basis of this report of Mr. Poinsett.

Now, sir, what pretense or ground is there for any addition to the claim then paid?

Mr. PATTERSON, of New Hampshire. Allow me to correct the Senator. He has misstated the report he has in his hands, and undoubtedly by mistake.

Mr. SHERMAN. I read it.

Mr. PATTERSON, of New Hampshire. Instead of an allowance amounting to $843,000 it is $657,869 40, as I have just reckoned it up.

Mr. SHERMAN. Here it is in black and white:

"The original amount of these claims was $843,349 60, which by a payment of $11,000 in 1817, and one of $419,748 26 in 1831, was reduced to $412,601 34, which is still claimed. Of this sum it appears, upon applying the same principles which have governed this Department in the settlement of similar claims made by other States, there will be due $272,716 14, of which $45,539 60 being for arms and equipments purchased by the State, arms, &c., to the value of that amount must be charged to the State and be withheld from its quota under the act of 1808 for arming and equipping the militia. And all warlike stores remaining in the State which are paid for by the General Government must be delivered up to the possession and use of the United States."

It is true as shown by this report that all the claim of Massachusetts was not allowed. Nor do they now come here to claim that which was in excess of the report; but everything that was due, upon the principle that was applied to other States, was allowed by Mr. Poinsett in his report, and subsequently paid.

Now, what was the case presented by the State of Maryland? I remember it well, although my legislative experience here is short. In 1857, in just the way we are now legislating, at the heel of the session a claim in behalf of the State of Maryland was put in an appropriation bill, if I remember rightly, in this branch of Congress, and carried through and sent to the other House. I was a member of the other House, then, and opposed the passage of that claim on the ground that it opened up settled questions; but in the hurry of the closing scenes of the session the claim of Maryland was allowed; and upon what ground? You have it here in the statute: on the ground that Maryland had appropriated a portion of her school fund, a trust fund, and had used it for the defense of the country at the time of the attack on Baltimore, and as that fund was drawing interest the State of Maryland thereby lost interest, and so it was a case of peculiar equity. That was the case as I now remember it, and as you will see, by the limitation put upon the claim in the act, it was to reimburse Maryland for the application of a trust fund. The situation of Massachusetts was very different from that of Maryland. Maryland was actually invaded by the British in 1814. Almost within sight of this Capitol a battle was fought, and our troops were defeated and the Capitol building was burnt to the ground by the British. Maryland was overrun by the enemy. Massachusetts never was trodden by a hostile foe during that whole war.

Mr. SUMNER. I beg the Senator's pardon. A town in Massachusetts was captured, unhappily.

Mr. SHERMAN. What town?

Mr. SUMNER. Castine.

Mr. SHERMAN. That was a very insignificant affair.

Mr. DRAKE. Castine was in Maine.

Mr. SUMNER. Maine was then part of Massachusetts.

Mr. SHERMAN. It is manifest that the cases of Maryland and Massachusetts are very different. An appeal was made to us in behalf of Maryland to allow her claim, to refund the State interest it had paid, or to make good the interest on a fund which the State had taken from its school children. Is that the case of Massachusetts? Certainly not; and yet the precedent established in the case of Maryland in 1857 is now urged in behalf of this claim. But, sir, in 1859, two years after this precedent was established, we again had another settlement with Massachusetts of this identical claim. Then she again presented the last item of this account and we paid it to her. Up to that date she never had claimed one dollar of interest. I have here the report of Mr. Wilson, the Third Auditor, to that effect, under date of June 25, 1869. It will be found on page 38 of the report made in the Thirty-Ninth Congress, which has been referred to:

"It does not appear by either of the settlements (copies of which I have herewith) that any interest was allowed, nor is there any evidence on file in this office that any demand was made by the State for interest."

That was in 1866, only two years ago. Two years after the Maryland precedent was established, when if there were any peculiar claim on the part of Massachusetts which entitled her to the special relief granted to Maryland it could have been presented—two years after interest was allowed to Maryland under peculiar circumstances—the balance of the claim of Massachusetts was paid. Although the report of Mr. Poinsett was controverted, still the amount was paid, and no demand was then made for interest. Now, the question is whether we shall reopen the account and allow interest and make a new precedent applying to the State of Massachusetts an exceptional rule. It will open the door for reopening all the settlements made during this war, because I say to you, Senators, that if this claim is allowed to the State of Massachusetts you cannot refuse to apply the same rule to the other States, and you must allow interest to Ohio and to Missouri, and to all the other States which have made advances during the late war. Massachusetts will lose by this operation. Massachusetts' share in the payment of the claims that will be presented under this precedent will be greater than the total amount that she will receive under this amendment. She had better build this railroad through that region up in Maine than establish a precedent which, in my judgment, will eventually add largely to the public debt.

In the settlement of claims between the States and the Government the Government has never paid interest except under peculiar, limited rules; and, so far as the official evidence before us is concerned, the same rules have been applied to this claim of Massachusetts that have been applied to all the other States.

Sir, this is a dangerous, yes, more than a dangerous experiment which is now attempted to be made by fastening this claim upon the Army appropriation bill at a time when the legislative appropriation bill, the miscellaneous appropriation bill, and all the great money bills of the session are still unsettled.

I do not wish to discuss this matter. I do not see how the question of building the railroad referred to has anything to do with the case. I am in favor of building the railroad. If the Senator offered this as a distinct grant of public money to aid in building a railroad in that region, I would rather vote twice the amount than establish this precedent. I have no doubt the railroad ought to be built. Friends and constituents of mine are engaged partly in the enterprise. But, sir, we dare not establish a precedent of this kind for twice the cost of building that railroad. My friend from Maine alluded to the rule that had been adopted in regard to the western States, of giving lands for railroads. Let the people of Maine who own the land up in that country apply the same rule in the construction of this road that the Government has applied in building new railroads in the western country. Let them give half their land and double the price of what remains and they will make money by the operation, as the United States Government has always done. The Government has made large sums of money by giving one half of its lands in order to double the price of the other half. In the State of Illinois, which is referred to, there were lands which had been surveyed for twenty or thirty years, and remained unsold until by the graduation system they were brought down to twenty-five or twelve and a half cents an acre. When this policy of land grants was adopted by which half the land was given and the other half put up to double the minimum price, to $2 50 an acre, the result was that in five years after that grant was made not a single acre of public land could be found on the whole line of that railroad; every acre of it was absorbed at $2 50 or more, and the railroad company, becoming seized by this grant of a vast amount of land, sold some of it as high as twenty dollars an acre, if I am not mistaken—much of it at ten or fifteen dollars. I have no doubt that by local aid of the States of Maine and Massachusetts to the building of this road, with the application of a liberal land grant by the people and the counties and the States, they can, without reviving a dangerous claim of this kind, and attaching it to a very important appropriation bill at this period, build that road, as I hope they will. But, sir, this is too serious a matter, in the view I take of it, to establish a precedent that in future time will be made the occasion, as the precedent in the case of Maryland is now being, of unlimited and boundless appropriations of the public money.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President, I do not wish to enter into the argument of this question again, and I have but a word to say in answer to the inquiry which was put with a good deal of point by the Senator from Maine as to what would be my course of action if the party was the State of New Jersey instead of the State of Massachusetts. I would with all respect say, Mr. President, that I understand myself to be a Senator of the United States, and I would pay as much regard to a claim from Massachusetts or from Maine as to one from New Jersey. But that that declaration may not rest upon my assertion alone I would remind the Senator that the State of New Jersey has to-day just as good a claim as the States of Maine and Massachusetts for a similar claim, and so has every other State of this Union that for the last eight years has been advancing its millions, and who has settled with the national Government without interest. We are now about to establish a precedent which will cost this Government hundreds of millions, unless the States of Maine and Massachusetts are to be favorites with the General Government.

I will say further that if I, as the representative of the State of New Jersey in 1859, had agreed that the sum to be paid on such a claim should be $227,000, no matter what might have been the motive that led me to that conclusion, whether it was because I did not dare to ask more, or whether because it was hard to get a measure through Congress, or whether because there were objections to the claim by reason of the fact that the money had been spent in defense of the States rather than of the national Government; no matter what might have been the motive which prompted me to that settlement, I would have considered myself bound in justice and in honor to stand by the settlement.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Let me say to the Senator from New Jersey that I, too, if there had been any such settlement in 1859, would stand by it; but that is an assumption of his. That he assumes, and repeats, and reiterates. He says it over and over, but he does not make out the fact. There was no settlement in 1859, no agreement.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. My assertion does not make out the fact, but the record makes out the fact.

Mr. FESSENDEN. The record does not make out the fact. That I dispute, notwithstanding the assertion of the honorable Senator from New Jersey, repeated by the honorable Senator from Ohio. It is no such thing. That is an assumption. The fact was that the money was admitted to be due on the book. All that we asked for was not an act to pay that any further than to make an appropriation for what was admitted to be due. That was all there was of it, a mere appropriation to pay it. That was no settlement. It did not take the shape or form of a settlement in any possible way.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Then this would not be a settlement. In 1859 the Congress of the United States appropriated to be paid to the State of Maine and the State of Massachusetts every farthing that either or both of those States had ever asked for.

Mr. FESSENDEN. The Senator does not state it right now. The State of Massachusetts had been claiming that her accounts should be settled and paid. Up to that time they never had been settled and paid. They had been adjusted in 1837 to a certain point, and a balance was due. Of course that adjustment said nothing about interest; that was a question for legislation; but it found under the law that a certain amount was due. That stood so for a number of years, and finally, after the lapse of more than twenty years, after having asked for it repeatedly, year after year almost, an appropriation was made to pay that which was admitted to be due. Now, because one claim is appropriated for and paid, does it follow that that is a receipt in full for everything else? That is an inference of the honorable Senator and not the fact. I take issue with him right there. His argument is founded upon an assumption, which assumption is not borne out by the facts, in my judgment. Of course, however, every Senator will draw his own inference.

Mr. DRAKE. Will the honorable Senator, while he is discussing this part of the case, allow me to make an inquiry of him in connection with it, that he may treat it now and avoid my saying anything about it hereafter?

Mr. FESSENDEN. I will do so; but there are other gentlemen to speak.

Mr. DRAKE. I merely wish to know of the honorable Senator from Maine whether, if a man having a claim against another accepts the full principal of that claim, it is not a perfectly recognized principle of law that in accepting the full principal and making no claim for interest he abandons all the claim for interest?

Mr. FESSENDEN. No, sir; not unless he he says so.

Mr. DRAKE. I take issue with the honorable Senator there.

Mr. FESSENDEN. A man by taking one part of a debt does not give a receipt in full for the other part.

Mr. CONKLING. But if he presents the claim in that form he does.

Mr. FESSENDEN. He is not bound to present it in that way. This was presented in the form always usual here. When a State has a claim for advances against the General Government what does it do? It brings forward its items and calls for an account; that account is taken; it says nothing about interest. Massachusetts, the Senator will remember, brought forward every item of her claim between 1815 and 1820. If that claim had then been paid promptly it would have stood, precisely as the State of New Jersey stands with its claim for advances during the late war, which was paid as soon as it was audited. That was the case with other States during the war of the rebellion. They bring here their claims under the law; they are audited, and then an appropriation is made to pay them. Nobody thinks of asking interest in such a case; neither would Massachusetts under those circumstances. Massachusetts presented her claim promptly. At the time she presented it there was no claim made for interest of course. She could not make any such claim until the claim was audited and the amount adjusted. Finally an appropriation was made to pay it and no more was said. It was a hard fight undoubtedly to get so far as that. To hold that because Massachusetts took the money which she had been calling for, and which had been admitted to be due for over twenty years; that because she consented to take the money from the Treasury and give a receipt for what she got, she therefore cannot claim anything else, however justly it may be admitted to be, Senators will permit me to say is founded on an assumption of a principle of law that does not exist at all.

It never was held that a man who received part of his claim, even if it was all the principal on a note, was therefore prevented from claiming the interest due. How is it in the case of a note of hand which does not bear interest on its face, payable at a certain time, for instance in six months, or on demand? Demand is made and nothing is said about interest. Suppose, long afterward, the debtor comes forward and pays the holder of that note the principal, and he indorses the amount of it on the note, does the payee give up the interest thereby? Could he not maintain an action for it? Unquestionably he could in any court in the United States unless he gave up the note or gave a receipt in full. Then the principle on which gentlemen argue is not a correct one; and I say again, in answer to what the Senator has said in regard to the State of New Jersey and to what other Senators have said about the extent of these claims, they have no claim for interest, because their money was paid as soon as the accounts were adjusted. If that had been the case with Massachusetts she would have no claim for interest. The difference, it seems to me, is as obvious as it can be in any possible case. Of course, before the vouchers are presented no State can claim interest, but when they have presented them, and the account is stated, then of course interest commences to run.

Mr. PATTERSON, of New Hampshire. I do not propose to take up much time in the discussion of this question. I should not speak upon it at all but for the fact that the report which I made on this subject two or three years since has been referred to several times in the debate, and some misstatements of fact, it seems to me, have been made which are very important in considering the question.

In the first place, the fact that this amendment comes from the Committee on Foreign Relations has been criticised somewhat severely. As I said when this amendment was first offered, four claims upon the General Government were presented by Massachusetts and Maine in the Thirty-Eighth Congress. Three of those claims arose under the treaty of Washington, and hence they were all united in one bill and referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs. The States have received the amounts due under one of those claims, about one hundred and forty thousand dollars. All the rest, amounting to millions of dollars, they give up, and come here asking that this claim alone may be paid to those States. Now, we shall do well to go back a little, and remember that the treaty of 1842, the treaty of Washington, established a line for the northeastern boundary which took from the State of Maine three million acres of her territory, and in lieu of that gave to one of the States of the West over four million acres of territory.

Mr. SHERMAN. What State was that?

Mr. PATTERSON, of New Hampshire. Minnesota. The Senator from Ohio, I think, has fallen into a mistake on this subject. He refers to the report of Mr. Poinsett. Let me read from that report. Mr. Poinsett says:

"The original amount of these claims was $843,349 60, which, by a payment of $11,000 in 1817, and one of $419,748 26 in 1831, was reduced to $412,601 34, which is still claimed."

"Of this sum it appears, upon applying the same principles which have governed this Department in the settlement of similar claims made by other States, there will be due $272,716 14, of which $45,339 66, being for arms and accoutrements purchased by the State, arms, &c., to the value of that amount, must be charged to the State and be withheld from its quota, under the act of 1808 for arming and equipping the militia. And all warlike stores remaining in the State which are paid for by the General Government must be delivered up to the possession and use of the United States."

Now, sir, putting these sums together—the $11,000, the $419,748 26, and the $272,716 14—and you have a total of $657,924 74. That is the whole amount which Massachusetts and Maine have ever received under this claim, instead of $843,000, as the Senator from Ohio would have us believe.

The Senator says furthermore that the claim of Massachusetts was settled precisely as the claims of the other States were settled; and he quotes this report to prove it. The report proves no such thing. There is not a word in the report that goes to show it. Let us read it:

"Of this sum"—that is, the remaining sum of $412,601 84—"it appears upon applying the same principles which have governed this Department in the settlement of similar claims made by other States, there will be due $272,716 14," of which $45,539.66 for arms supplied for the defense of the State was to be subtracted. Thus it will be seen that the report simply says that in settling this residue of the claim the same principles must be applied that were applied to the other States. And the Senator made a mistake in another particular—

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The hour of half past four having arrived, the Senate will, according to order, take a recess until half past seven o'clock.

EVENING SESSION.

The Senate reassembled at seven and a half o'clock p. m.

SUFFRAGE CONSTITUTIONAL AMENDMENT.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will lay before the Senate a dispatch which he has just received.

The Secretary read as follows:

JEFFERSON CITY, MISSOURI,
March 1, 1869.

To the President of the Senate:

The constitutional amendment this day ratified by the Legislature of Missouri.

J. W. McCLURG.

GOLD MEDAL TO COMMANDER BALDWIN.

Mr. SUMNER. I ask unanimous consent, before proceeding with the regular order, to pass a little resolution with regard to which there can be no question. It is Senate joint resolution No. 208, authorizing Commander Charles H. Baldwin, United States Navy, to accept a gold medal from the king of the Netherlands.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution, which authorizes Commander Charles H. Baldwin, of the United States Navy, to accept a gold medal from the king of the Netherlands, tendered him in appreciation of services rendered to a merchant vessel of that nation in distress.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed the following bills:

A bill (S. No. 908) granting a pension to Horace Peck, of Charlton, Massachusetts;

A bill (S. No. 904) granting a pension to Benjamin T. Raines, of Indiana;

A bill (S. No. 906) granting a pension to Elizabeth Clarke;

A bill (S. No. 910) granting a pension to the children of Martin N. Slocum, deceased;

A bill (S. No. 942) granting a pension to Sarah E. Haines; and

A bill (S. No. 949) granting a pension to Mrs. Lydia W. Ford.

The message also announced that the House had passed the following bills of the Senate with amendments, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

A bill (S. No. 900) granting a pension to William B. Looney, of Alabama; and

A bill (S. No. 941) granting a pension to Benjamin C. Stone.

The message also announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. No. 2015) for the relief of Mrs. Susan A. Shelby, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message further announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills; and they were thereupon signed by the President pro tempore:

A bill (H. R. No. 1758) to incorporate the Masonic Mutual Relief Association of the District of Columbia;

A bill (H. R. No. 1847) for the relief of the heirs and representatives of Charles C. Cook, deceased;

A bill (S. No. 903) granting a pension to Horace Peck, of Charlton, Massachusetts;

A bill (S. No. 904) granting a pension to Benjamin T. Raines;

A bill (S. No. 906) granting a pension to Elizabeth Clarke;

A bill (S. No. 910) granting a pension to the children of Martin N. Slocum, deceased;

A bill (S. No. 942) granting a pension to Sarah E. Haines;

A bill (S. No. 949) granting a pension to Mrs. Lydia W. Ford; and

A bill (S. No. 941) granting a pension to Benjamin C. Stone.

PETER M'GOUGH.

Mr. CATTELL. The Committee on Finance, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 1989) for the relief of Peter McGough, collector of the internal revenue and disbursing agent, twentieth district, Pennsylvania, have directed me to report it back with an amendment, and as it is a very simple question and the bill must go back to the House, I ask for its present consideration, as I think it will create no discussion.

By unanimous consent the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The Committee on Finance reported the bill with an amendment, to strike out all after the enacting clause and to insert:

That the proper accounting officers of the Treasury be, and they are hereby, authorized to allow Peter McGough, collector and disbursing agent of the twentieth internal revenue district of Pennsylvania, a credit for the sum of $4,750 64, public money deposited in pursuance of law in the Venango National Bank, lately a United States designated depository, and lost by the failure of said bank without fault or neglect of the said collector and disbursing agent.

Mr. RAMSEY. I should like to ask the Senator from New Jersey whether the two Senators from Pennsylvania do not prefer the House bill as it came without this amendment reported by the Senate Committee?

Mr. CATTELL. I believe they do.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in. It was ordered that the amendment be engrossed and the bill read a third time. The bill was read the third time, and passed.

WILLIAM B. LOONEY.

The Senate proceeded to consider the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill of the Senate No. 900, granting a pension to William B. Looney, of Alabama; and

On motion by Mr. SPENCER, it was

Resolved, That the Senate disagree to the amendment of the House of Representatives to the said bill, and ask a conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

Ordered, That the conferees on the part of the Senate be appointed by the President pro tempore.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore appointed Mr. SPENCER, Mr. VAN WINKLE, and Mr. WARNER.

BENJAMIN S. STONE.

The Senate proceeded to consider the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. No. 941) granting a pension to Benjamin S. Stone; which was to strike out the words "at the rate of fifteen dollars per month;" and, on motion of Mr. SPENCER, the amendment was concurred in.

DEFICIENCY BILL.

Mr. HOWE, from the Committee on Appropriations, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 1911) making appropriations to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the service of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1869, and for other purposes, reported it with amendments.

ILLINOIS IRON AND BOLT COMPANY.

Mr. MORRIEL, of Vermont. I desire to call up House bill No. 1867, for the relief of the Illinois Iron and Bolt Company, to which I presume there will be no objection.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It can only be taken up by unanimous consent.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It authorizes the Secretary of the Treasury to examine a judgment by confession, rendered on the 2d of October, 1865, in the circuit court of the northern district of Illinois, against the Illinois Iron and Bolt Company for $5,503, penalties for certain alleged violations of the internal revenue laws, and to refund to the company so much of the amount paid into the Treasury of the United States as upon investigation he may think it right and proper under the circumstances of the case to remit.

The Committee on Finance reported the bill with an amendment, to insert in line eleven, after the words "United States," the words "not exceeding $2,750."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in. The amendment was ordered to be engrossed, and the bill to be read a third time. The bill was read the third time, and passed.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed the following bills and joint resolution, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

A bill (H. R. No. 1972) granting a pension to John Law;

A bill (H. R. No. 2017) granting a pension to Joseph Wheat;

A bill (H. R. No. 2016) granting a pension to Abigail Dix;

A bill (H. R. No. 2018) granting a pension to Sophia E. Harmon;

A bill (H. R. No. 2019) granting a pension to Mary Whitten; and

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 472) providing for filling vacancies in the Naval Academy from the State of Louisiana.

NEW ORLEANS AND CHATTANOOGA RAILROAD.

Mr. RAMSEY. There is a small bill, reported from the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, which will occupy no time to pass it, that I should like to have taken up. It is Senate bill No. 956.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The title of the bill will be read for the information of the Senate.

The CHIEF CLERK. "A bill (S. No. 956) to establish and declare the railroad and bridges of the New Orleans, Mobile, and Chattanooga Railroad Company, as hereafter constructed westward from the city of New Orleans, a post road, and for other purposes."

Mr. PATTERSON, of New Hampshire. I must object to that. I believe I have the floor on the regular order of business.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator is entitled to the floor when that bill shall be taken up.

Mr. RAMSEY. I hope the Senator will allow this bill to pass.

Mr. PATTERSON, of New Hampshire. But it will lead to discussion.

Mr. RAMSEY. Not at all. There is no disposition on the part of the Senate to discuss the bill.

Mr. PATTERSON, of New Hampshire. If it leads to no discussion I have no objection.

Mr. RAMSEY. It will lead to no discussion.

By unanimous consent the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads reported the bill with amendments. The first amendment was in section one, line seven, after the words "Mississippi river" to strike out the words "which shall be crossed by means of a ferry-boat, unless otherwise authorized hereafter."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in section one, lines twenty-one, twenty-two, and twenty-three, to strike out the words:

Said declaration being hereby approved and declared to be a valid law of the State of Texas.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in section one, line twenty nine, after the words "Trinity river" to insert "and all other navigable rivers, bays, and bayous."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in section one, line thirty-three, after the words "Bayou La Fourche" to insert the words "and the other navigable rivers, bays, and bayous."

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That completes the amendments reported by the committee.

Mr. RAMSEY. I understand that the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. KELLOGG] desires to offer an amendment, and therefore to enable him to do so I am willing that the bill should be passed over informally.

Mr. KELLOGG. Let the bill go over until to-morrow morning. I have just come into the Chamber and desire to offer an amendment to the bill, but have not yet had an opportunity to prepare it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will lie over.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The bill (H. R. No. 1015) for the relief of Mrs. Susan A. Shelby was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

The joint resolution (H. R. No. 472) providing for filling vacancies in the Naval Academy from the State of Louisiana was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

The following bills were severally read twice by their titles, and referred to the Committee on Pensions:

A bill (H. R. No. 1972) granting a pension to John Law;

A bill (H. R. No. 2017) granting a pension to Joseph Wheat;

A bill (H. R. No. 2016) granting a pension to Abigail Dix;

A bill (H. R. No. 2018) granting a pension to Sophia E. Harmon; and

A bill (H. R. No. 2019) granting a pension to Mary Whitten.

ARMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 1803) making appropriations for the support of the Army for the year ending June 30, 1870, and for other purposes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The pending question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. SUMNER,] and upon that question the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. PATTERSON] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. PATTERSON, of New Hampshire. Mr. President, at the moment the Senate took a recess I was speaking upon the statement made by the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. SHERMAN,] who said that the amount which had been paid to the States of Massachusetts and Maine was equal to $843,349 60. I showed from the report of Mr. Poinsett, I think to the satisfaction of the Senator from Ohio himself, that the whole amount which had been paid by the Government on this claim is $657,869 84.

The next point which the Senator made was that this would open the way to claims which would amount to something over five million dollars; but immediately he descended somewhat rapidly, but gracefully, from five millions to a million and a quarter. Now, sir, that is an overstatement of something like half a million dollars as to the amount which will be due under this amendment to the Army bill. The whole amount due for interest, as calculated by the friends of this measure, is $767,000. At any rate, they are willing to confine their claims within that amount.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Is that the amount that is to go to Massachusetts by this amendment, if it is passed?

Mr. PATTERSON, of New Hampshire. Seven hundred and sixty-seven thousand dollars to Maine and Massachusetts. I now come to the statement made by the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN] that this claim was settled finally on the payment of the last installment of the principal in 1859. If we look at the language of the law we shall see that it simply covers the last installment of the principal, and has nothing to do with the interest whatever. It is in this language:

"The Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay to Massachusetts out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated the sum of $227,176 48, reported under said resolution to be due to said State by J. R. Poinsett, late Secretary of War, in a report dated the 23d of December, 1837, made to the House of Representatives the 27th of December, 1837."

So it seems that by the language of this act provision was made simply for the payment of the last installment of the principal.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Does it say so? Mr. PATTERSON, of New Hampshire. It says so.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I did not hear it. Mr. PATTERSON, of New Hampshire. That is, it says for the payment of the award made by the Secretary of War, and by reading the report we find that that refers only to the principal; there is nothing said in relation to the interest. The Secretary, in speaking of the last installment of $412,601 34, says:

"Of this sum, it appears, upon applying the same principles which have governed this Department in the settlement of similar claims made by other States, there will be due $272,716 14."

From which $45,589 66 would be subtracted, leaving $227,000 all told. The act of 1859 simply provided for the payment of this amount reported by the Secretary of War in 1837, and it is on precisely the same ground upon which other States received interest upon advances made in the war of 1812-15 that these two States come here and ask for interest upon their advances.

The gentleman from New Jersey was fearful that this would establish a dangerous precedent. He stated that New Jersey was entitled to large amounts under the precedent which would be established if this claim was allowed. Now, sir, I apprehend that that cannot be so. The advances made in the war of the Revolution were paid, not only the principal, but interest at six per cent., whether the State had paid interest or not. A new principle was established on the advances made in 1812-15, which was that the principal should be paid and interest where the States paid interest or lost interest. If the State hired the funds which it advanced, or advanced its own bonds or securities on which it was receiving interest, then the General Government was to pay back to the State the interest which it had so lost. All the States except Massachusetts have received interest on their advances upon this principle. The same principle also held in paying the advances made for the war with Mexico. My own State also has received payment for advances which she made in 1835, 1836, and 1837, by an act passed January 27, 1852, in this language:

"Be it enacted, &c., That the Second Auditor of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to liquidate and settle the claim of the State of New Hampshire against the United States for interest upon the military expenses incurred and actually expended by her for the protection of the northeastern frontier of said State and repelling invasion and suppressing insurrection at Indian Stream, in the county of Coos, in said State, in the years 1835, 1836, and 1837; and the sum so found to be due to said State shall be paid out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated: Provided, That said amount shall not exceed $6,000."

It also provides that interest shall not be computed on any sum which New Hampshire has not expended for the use and benefit of the United States, as evidenced by the amount refunded or repaid to the State of New Hampshire. It seems, then, that New Hampshire received not only principal but interest, as is demanded in this amendment to the Army bill.

Maryland received it, Pennsylvania received it, and several other of the States of the Union who made advances in the war of 1812 received it.

The Senator from Iowa has complained that this claim had been made over to a railroad; Well, sir, this claim was presented by the State of Maine before it was so made over to this railroad; for it was not made over to the railroad until 1864.

Mr. GRIMES. The Senator is mistaken in saying that I complained of it. I merely stated the fact that this claim had gained great additional strength from the fact that it had been transferred to a railroad company, and hence it had added to it a large railroad lobby in its interest.

Mr. PATTERSON, of New Hampshire. Well, sir, if it has gained strength because it has been made over to this railroad, so much the better for the claim; and if it has gained any strength it is because it has added to the public interest in the claim.

Mr. GRIMES. That is what I thought—and to the private interest also.

Mr. PATTERSON, of New Hampshire. It seems to me that the gentleman from Iowa is the last man to complain because the States of Massachusetts and Maine come here and ask to have an honest debt paid, which they have appropriated to the construction of a railroad. Why, sir, over one hundred and ninety million acres of land have been appropriated by the Government of the United States for the building of railroads and canals in the great West, and New England has helped to make that appropriation of lands for that purpose.

Mr. GRIMES. That is not so.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Is the Senator from New Hampshire willing to do justice to the West by stating at the same time the fact that in the larger and more important grants to that section of the country the price of the reserved sections was doubled, and that when the lands were granted it was provided that the people who settled upon the reserved sections should pay it back to the Government in the enhanced price of that land.

Mr. PATTERSON, of New Hampshire. I do not know that that changes the principle at all. I was not complaining because this amount of land had been set apart for these internal improvements. I am glad of it. The East as well as the West have entered into the advantages and the fruits of that appropriation of public land. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GRIMES] says the statement is not true. If it is not true, then the Commissioner of the General Land Office has made a grand mistake in his last report; for that is his report on this subject. More than that: New England helped to pass the homestead act, and under the homestead act during the last fiscal year more than two million acres were taken up by men who had settled in the West, and since the passage of that act more than nine million acres have been taken up. Who is it that settles upon this land in the West? The sons of New England. They go forth from our homes and they settle in the West. We are glad that the West is made prosperous by these appropriations of land and by the New England men who go there and settle. All that we complain of is that gentlemen should rise here and refuse to pay this honest debt simply because it is appropriated to the building of a railroad, especially when this railroad is to benefit the West quite as much as it does New England. It brings us two days nearer to Liverpool and London. If the farmers of the great West are to sell the products of their prairies then they must have cheap transportation to the markets of the world, and this helps them to that cheap transportation. It brings them two days nearer to all the markets of Europe. Is that no advantage to the gentleman from Iowa?

Mr. GRIMES. Not the slightest.

Mr. PATTERSON, of New Hampshire. I think it is. But, sir, there are other advantages growing out of this railroad—the military advantages of this road. It was not until after the war of 1812-15 that England laid claim to the northern part of the State of Maine, and that claim was set up simply because England discovered the necessity of a military road from her lower provinces to her upper provinces. In order to escape from the railroads which will be built northward from this line of road, running from St. John to Bangor, the English Government has appropriated $15,000,000 in order to build a road along the northern shore of the lower provinces and through the valley of the Ristigouche from Halifax to Quebec; but that will not be accomplished if this road is built from St. John to Bangor, because branches will run northward to the line of Maine, so that it will be easy for the United States to throw her troops northward to intercept troops who may be passing from Halifax to Quebec. If you close up this line of communication between the lower and the northern provinces of Canada you close up military communication between England and her American provinces for five months of the year. New England is not the only section of the country that will derive advantage from this, for in another war with England the attack would not be made upon the line of New England, but upon the line of the great lakes and far west of New England; and it is quite as desirable for the West to break up this military road from the lower to the northern provinces as for New England.

But, sir, there are other considerations—the political considerations. It will give us a commercial union with those lower provinces; and when we have got this commercial union established a political union will soon follow. This may not be a very great advantage in the eyes of the gentleman from Iowa, but it certainly is in the eyes of many people in this country. I cannot see therefore why because this amount of money is to be used in the building of a railroad it should be refused if it is a just and honest claim, as I think everybody must admit that it is.

One objection made by the gentleman from Ohio was that this money which was advanced by Massachusetts in the war of 1812 was advanced in order to defend the State of Massachusetts. It strikes me that is rather a singular objection. I supposed that under the Constitution the Government of the United States was bound to defend every State against an attack from abroad. Suppose a hostile fleet were to land to-morrow in Boston harbor or in New York harbor, would it rest upon the State of Massachusetts or New York to defend the State against such an invasion? It would rest upon the United States to defend those States under the Constitution. It is upon this ground that the original principal of the amount advanced has been paid to Massachusetts and Maine and the other States for the advances which they made in the war of 1812.

Mr. CONNESS. I shall be compelled to occupy the time of the Senate for a few minutes on this subject. I desire to submit some remarks, and as preliminary to those remarks I will ask the Clerk to read the report which I send to the desk. It is very short. I was listening to the honorable Senator from New Hampshire, as I always do, with satisfaction; and he attracted my attention particularly as he reached the poetical point of overstating the amount of land granted to the West for the construction of railroads. I ask the Secretary to read the report I send to the desk, and I ask the honorable Senator to listen to it. It is very brief.

The Chief Clerk read the following letter of the Secretary of the Interior, communicating, in compliance with a resolution of the Senate of the 30th of January, information in relation to the quantity of land certified to States and corporations to aid in the construction of railroads, wagon-roads, and canals:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
WASHINGTON, D. C., February 2, 1869.

SIR: I have received the resolution adopted by the Senate on the 30th ultimo. In answer thereto I have the honor to transmit herewith a copy of a letter from the Commissioner of the General Land Office, dated the 1st instant, giving the quantity of land certified to States and corporations to aid in the construction of railroads, wagon-roads, and canals.

I am, sir, very respectfully, your obedient servant,
O. H. BROWNING,
Secretary.

Hon. B. F. WADE, President pro tempore of the Senate.

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
GENERAL LAND OFFICE, February 1, 1869.

SIR: In resolution of the Senate of the United States, adopted on the 30th ultimo, it is ordered "that the Secretary of the Interior be requested to inform the Senate the quantity of public lands certified and patented to States and Territories and corporations to aid in the construction of railroads, wagon-roads, and canals, and the improvement of rivers and harbors, indicating the quantity thus certified and conveyed within the limits of each State and Territory, naming the corporation to be benefited thereby, and the quantity of land received by each of such corporations."

Pursuant to the Secretary's reference, the following is respectfully submitted in reply:
The aggregate quantity actually certified under existing laws for railroads and wagon-roads up to June 30, 1867, is, acres..... 21,561,654.06
For canals..... 4,405,986.00

The quantity certified to the following named States since the 30th of June, 1867, is—
Minnesota, for railroads..... 670,895.48
California, for railroads..... 26,562.09
Wisconsin, for wagon-roads..... 72,133.47
Oregon, for wagon-roads..... 19,153.78
Michigan, for canals..... 280,290.92

1,068,835.69
Total..... 27,036,475.75

The estimated quantity that will eventually inure to States and corporations under existing grants is 185,591,894.67 acres.

With great respect, your obedient servant,
JOSEPH S. WILSON,
Commissioner.

Hon. O. H. BROWNING, Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. PATTERSON, of New Hampshire. If the gentleman will allow me I will send to the Secretary's table to be read an abstract taken from the Land Office report for the present year, not yet published.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

"As given in the report of the Commissioner of the General Land Office for 1868—printed, but not yet distributed—the land grants for the West, as estimated at the Land Office, are:

For railroads..... 182,108,581
For canals..... 4,405,986
For wagon-roads..... 3,782,213

Aggregate..... 190,296,780

"Of the acres included in the railroad grants 58,108,581 acres were granted to the States for railroads, and 124,000,000 acres were granted directly to Pacific railroad corporations.

"What was left of the public domain after the enormous swamp land grants to the new States, and after the above appropriation of 190,296,780 acres for western canals, railroads, and wagon-roads, has been set apart to invite emigration to the West under the homestead act."

Mr. CONNESS. Mr. President—

Mr. PATTERSON, of New Hampshire. There are only a few words more.

Mr. CONNESS. But this is not from the report of the Land Office. This is the language of somebody who characterizes the legislation of the country.

Mr. PATTERSON, of New Hampshire. I said it was an abstract from the report of the Commissioner of the Land Office.

Mr. CONNESS. The figures may be part of an abstract; but this language is not used by the Commissioner of the Land Office. Now, Mr. President, I have this remark to make—

Mr. PATTERSON, of New Hampshire. I wish, as the gentleman says my language is poetical, that he would allow those figures to be read. He will find that it is the poetry of fact.

Mr. CONNESS. They have been read.
The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The whole paper has not been read. Is there any objection to the reading of it?

Mr. CONNESS. I have no objection. Let it be read.

The Chief Clerk continued the reading, as follows:

"During the last fiscal year two million three hundred and twenty-eight thousand nine hundred and twenty-three acres were taken under that act, (the homestead act.) In all, down to June 30, 1868, nine million five hundred thousand acres had been taken under it."

Mr. CONNESS. That relates to the homestead act, and has nothing to do with the case. Mr. President, it will be observed that the amount certified and patented up to the present time to States, Territories, and corporations for the construction of roads and canals is twenty-seven million acres. The enormous figures that my friend has presented here to the Senate are made up of grants, so called; made to the Pacific Railroad Company; the large grant that is made to the Northern Pacific road, not one acre of which is taken, and may never be; the grant made to the Union and Central Pacific Railroad companies, which that gentleman or the nation can buy back again at not more than twenty-five cents an acre, and the companies will be very glad to sell and give title for it; the grant made on the southern route to the Atlantic and Pacific Railroad Company and a company in California over the desert parts of this country, amounting in reality to nothing. Those figures are brought in here from time to time and paraded as the enormous grants of empires for the purposes of railroads and other improvements in the West. All the grants made up to this time have consumed twenty-seven million acres of the public lands.

Mr. STEWART. I will ask the Senator from California if that is any expense to the Government under the plan which has been adopted?

Mr. CONNESS. I have not gone into that. We all know the plan upon which these grants have been made, but I desired for once to call public attention to the looseness with which those statements are made. I do not care about the argument, so far as it applies to the pending question, at all.

Mr. DAVIS. If I understand the proposition before the Senate, all the principal for moneys advanced by Massachusetts in the war of 1812 has been reimbursed to her, and the claim is now barely and simply for the interest upon the advances that Massachusetts made for the common military defense in the war of 1812. The honorable Senator from Ohio, the chairman of the Committee on Finance, read two or three items that made up the amount of this charge, and they were merely for improvising a local militia force upon some alarm of an irruption of the enemy across the frontier, which alarm was not realized, and when the alarm subsided of course this improvised militia returned to their residences. And for such service as that the account of Massachusetts in part is made out against the General Government. But, sir, there are other items in that charge of a more serious character and larger in amount, to which I will refer.

The honorable Senator from Maine [Mr. FESSENDEN] spoke truly of the difference between the State authorities of Massachusetts in that war and the Government of the United States as to the principles upon which the militia of that State should be employed in the service of the United States. We remember that Governor Strong issued his proclamation forbidding the militia of the State to go under the control and direction of United States military officers; in other words, he refused to submit the militia of the State to the government of the Commander-in-Chief of the armies of the United States. We remember that when Plattsburg was assailed by one of the most formidable forces that was ever collected by the British during the war, under General Prevost, and the militia of New York and Vermont, and a few regular forces were congregated there to make a defense of the place, the Governor of Massachusetts was called upon for his quota of militia, and he issued a proclamation forbidding the militia commanders to march to the defense of Plattsburg. That is a historical fact.

Now, this claim of Massachusetts for moneys advanced in the service of the United States results partly from this consideration: the militia, to whom Governor Strong issued his proclamation forbidding their marching to the defense of their country, were in the employment of that State, and that State advanced the pay and military equipments for the benefit of this militia, the Governor of which State had forbidden them to enter into the defense of our common country; and after this money had been advanced by the State of Massachusetts it was made out and charged as a portion of the claim advanced by that State for the benefit of the United States in the war of 1812. Now, sir, is that a character of expenditure that is to be paid, not only the principal, but interest for forty or fifty years? Let me draw a parallel to this case.

In the late rebellion the position of Kentucky was about parallel to the position of Massachusetts in the war of 1812, but not so strong. Two to one of the white soldiers from Kentucky went into the Union Army. A majority of the people of Massachusetts in the war of 1812 were against their country, were against the armies and the triumph of their country, and gave their sympathies, and their active sympathies, to the enemy. Among those men who sympathized with the enemy was Governor Strong, and the Senator from Massachusetts knows full well that that Governor issued his proclamation forbidding the militia of the State to march to the defense of Plattsburg. He knows furthermore that the State of Massachusetts paid this militia and its military equipment herself and then filed it as an item of her account against the General Government for moneys which she had advanced in the military defense of the country.

Now, let me put a case. Suppose in the late war of the rebellion the Governor of Kentucky sympathized with the rebellion as Governor Strong in the war of 1812 sympathized with the British enemy; suppose that troops had been enrolled and mustered into the service in the State of Kentucky to march into the more southern States to put down the rebellion, and the troops were ready and willing to march, and Governor Magoffin issued his proclamation to forbid those troops from marching across the line of the State and being placed under the command of the officers of the United States Army, and in consequence of this obstruction those militia failed to march and rendered no service in the common defense of the country and the common suppression of the rebellion; but notwithstanding this failure of duty on the part of the Governor and militia of Kentucky the State settled the account of that militia force, paid the soldiery and the officers, and met the expense of all the military equipment of the command, and after having done that produced an account against the Government of the United States for an expenditure of money in that sort of performance of duty, where would be found the Senators from Massachusetts in the consideration of such a claim as that?

That is an analogous case to the present. This money that was advanced by Massachusetts was in part for the militia that the Governor refused to have march to the frontier. He submitted the question whether it was the duty of himself, as Governor of the State, to place the militia of his State under the command of the United States forces solemnly and officially to the supreme court of Massachusetts, including Governor Parson and others, and the four members of that court rendered a formal opinion that in their judgment the Governor of the State of Massachusetts had a right to withhold the militia of that State from the command and control of the United States military forces. That is one of the ingredients of this claim. Sir, the principal of the debt that was thus advanced by Massachusetts to pay off militia that her authorities would not permit to go to the field for the common defense of their country never should have been paid, and it is an outrage now upon justice and patriotism to demand the payment of interest upon that sum.

But the honorable Senator from Massachusetts says that his State ought to be put on a line with Maryland, with New York, with Delaware, with Virginia; and that those States have all received remuneration and reimbursement for money that they thus advanced for military defense of the country. I ask the honorable Senator if that part was ever played by the Governor of any of those States or by the people of those States? Did they ever fail or refuse to breast the iron storm that the proud mistress of the seas was in that day hurling against our infant country? No, sir; instead of repressing the military and patriotic ardor of their people and their soldiery they encouraged it; and so did a general in the State of Maine encourage it. General William King, a brother of Rufus King, who at that time commanded some militia that was raised in the district of Maine, defied the order and proclamation of Governor Strong and marched his troops to meet the enemy. For these troops and the charge that has been made for their services I feel a profound respect. But when the constituted authorities of the State of Massachusetts, who gave all their sympathies and aid to England, our common enemy, to come forward and trumpet up a charge for moneys advanced to the United States in that war, a charge which includes the payment and military supplies of the force of Governor Strong, whom he prohibited from marching to meet the enemy, I say they ought to be well satisfied that they have got the principal.

Let me give one other illustration. We have recently had a war. The Government was put to great strait or pretended to be put to great strait to raise forces. What did it do? It offered a bounty of $300 to the loyal owner of every negro who would volunteer into its armies. That measure, if I recollect aright, was brought forward by the vigilant and able chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs. The proposition was solemnly submitted to Congress, and if I recollect aright every Senator from the New England States voted in favor of that proposition. You solemnly made this contract and entered it upon your statute-books as a law of the United States. You said, "If the loyal owners of slaves will permit or encourage their slaves to enlist in the United States Army we will pay you, loyal owners, $300 for each one of the slaves." At the same time, to give more impetus and force to this movement, you proceeded to liberate the wives and the children of the slaves. What was the consequence? The owners in Kentucky brought forward about ten thousand of their young negro men, the fittest material that ever wore a black skin for military operations. Their bounty promised by you according to your solemn contract amounted to the sum of about ten million dollars. You did not pay it. You required a bounty fund to be paid into the Treasury in order to meet it, and that bounty fund was paid into the Treasury to an amount sufficient to meet it by white men who sought exemption from military service. You pocketed the $10,000,000 thus received, and with the avowed purpose of paying it over to the loyal owners of the slaves who had entered into your Army; but you did not pay it. We then brought forward a proposition appropriating money out of the public Treasury to Kentucky, to Maryland, to Tennessee, and to Delaware; and that law appropriating the money was passed, and enough of you voted for it to pass it.

Here, then, was contract filed upon contract, to meet the moderate and meager claims of the owners of slaves that were worth $1,000 apiece by paying them $300 apiece. You permitted the appropriation bill to pass. There was then a solemn contract between you and the loyal slave-owners of the United States that you would pay them this sum of $300 a head for those negro slaves. You then entered into another contract, and you directed your Treasury officers peremptorily and positively to pay it; and after you had done this what did you do? You turned around and extended indefinitely the payment of this money which you had twice so solemnly contracted to pay. All New England did this; that is, the New England Senators. If any of them failed to do so I should like to know who he was, that I may honor his name.

I recollect that the honorable chairman of the Committee on Finance was once speaking upon the kindred subject of liberating the wives and children of the negro soldiers, and he said then that at a future day he would not only be willing to compensate for these soldiers themselves, but for their wives and children, that the act of Congress took forcibly, as it were, from their owners and liberated. Sir, the thirty-five thousand slaves from Kentucky, the most valuable young men in the State of that color, instead of being worth nine or ten million dollars were worth from thirty-five to forty million dollars. Here is a positive provision of the Constitution which declares that private property shall not be taken for public use without just compensation made. You repudiate that solemn provision of the Constitution. You do that after you pledged yourselves twice by solemn legislation to pay $300 for each of these volunteer slaves. After that has been your course in relation to our rights and our property, and in relation to your own repeated and most solemn obligations to pay for that property, you expect us to vote for the payment of interest upon a claim on which you have long since received the principal, after a lapse of forty or fifty years—an account made up in part, as this account has been, by Massachusetts? After the Massachusetts Senators and other eastern Senators—I do not know of any who acted differently—thus paltered in a double sense with the slaveholders, whose slaves they encouraged to enlist in the armies of the United States, after they have twice so solemnly repudiated it, after they have been guilty of the offense of incorporating this principle of repudiation in the Constitution of the United States in one form of the fourteenth amendment, I say it is neither reasonable nor just nor decent for those gentlemen now to ask for this stale claim for interest to be paid.

Mr. DRAKE. Mr. President, I cannot but regard this claim, in its intrinsic character and in the manner of its presentation here, as one of the most extraordinary that has come under my observation during my service in this body. In the last days of the session, without any previous examination whatever by the Senate or by any committee of the Senate, it is attempted to attach to an Army appropriation bill a provision which will take out of the Treasury of the United States an amount of money which no Senator on this floor is able at this time to give, even conjecturally, the exact figures of.

Mr. SUMNER. If the Senator will allow me to correct him, I will say that I am able to give it, and will give it to the Senator if he desires it; and I will say further, in reply to him, that the claim has been carefully considered and reported upon more than once by a committee of this body.

Mr. DRAKE. I should like to see the report of a committee of this body upon this claim as now presented to the Senate.

Mr. SUMNER. It was made during the present session.

Mr. DRAKE. Where?

Mr. SUMNER. It is on the table of the Senator.

Mr. DRAKE. Will the honorable Senator be so good as to refer me to it?

Mr. SUMNER. It was made by the Committee on Foreign Relations, and I had the honor of making the report myself in the form of a bill, which was adopted by that committee after careful consideration.

Mr. DRAKE. Was there a written report connected with it?

Mr. SUMNER. There was not. It is not customary to make written reports on bills.

Mr. DRAKE. It is customary, Mr. President, to make written reports on bills which are to take an indefinite amount out of the Treasury and which are to reopen settled accounts of the Government and to make the Government liable for interest. I do not suppose there is a claim reported upon here by the Committee on Claims that is not "accompanied" with a written report. And now we are asked here, in the closing hours of the session, to incorporate into an appropriation bill a provision which is to take a large amount out of the Treasury when there has been no opportunity of examining it through any committee of this body and placing the facts on record.

Mr. President, this case bears no analogy, in the manner of its presentation to the Senate, to the case of the State of Maryland about which so much has been said. That case underwent investigation here, and a separate bill was passed by both Houses of Congress ten years before the provision was put into the appropriation bill which has been referred to in this debate. On the 13th of May, 1826, there was passed an act authorizing the payment of interest due to the State of Maryland. Prior to the passage of that act doubtless the whole relations of the State of Maryland to the United States in reference to the war of 1812 underwent a rigid scrutiny, and Congress decided finally that it was right and proper, under the peculiar circumstances of that case, that interest should be allowed to the State of Maryland; but it was more than ten years after that act was passed that the money was paid. Here, without the passage of any such act on the part of Congress with reference to the claim of Massachusetts, we are called upon, in the last hours of a session, to order the payment of an amount of interest which no Senator on this floor can with certainty say what it is.

Mr. SUMNER. I have told the Senator already once that I am ready to say what it is.

Mr. DRAKE. And I will venture to say that if the honorable Senator's colleague, or the Senator from Maine, will undertake to make a computation, it will differ materially from that of the honorable Senator who has just taken his seat.

Mr. SUMNER. It is impossible.

Mr. DRAKE. I do not see how it is impossible. How does the honorable Senator know what proportion of the amount claimed here is that upon which Massachusetts paid interest, or lost interest by the payment of it?

Mr. SUMNER. Because I am not ignorant of the history of my State.

Mr. DRAKE. Has the honorable Senator ever examined the account of Massachusetts against the Government? Has he ever gone over it in detail? Has he ever gone over it to ascertain how much of the amount claimed by Massachusetts was money that she borrowed and paid interest for, or how much of it she lost interest upon by converting interest-bearing funds into money to realize for the occasion? No, sir, he does not know it; nor does any other living man know it; and how, then, can he say that the amount which he would state, however honestly he might state it, would be the correct amount? Sir, he knows that it cannot be so as well as I do.

Mr. President, we are not only called upon to do all this without any previous investigation of the claim of Massachusetts in such manner as is our wont in such cases, but we are called to assume that this claim was settled and liquidated in 1837, directly in the face of the facts. The whole stress of the argument of the honorable Senator from Maine in favor of this amendment was derived from the fact, as he averred it, that the claim was liquidated in 1837, when there is not in my judgment a single fact to justify that assertion. I wish to examine that point, because it is a very important fact in this case. The Senator from Maine, as doubtless the Senator from Massachusetts, puts this matter upon the ground of liquidation by the report of Secretary Poinsett in 1837. Now, sir, what are the facts? He simply made a report to the House of Representatives in pursuance of a resolution of that body. He gave them the information; he made the examination in obedience to a resolution of one House of Congress, not under an authority of the two Houses. He did not act as an accounting officer. He acted with no authority of Congress. He was simply required by one House to make a report to that House, and he made a report; and now it is claimed that that report is a liquidation of the claim. Sir, what is a liquidation of an open claim, an open account, but an agreement by the party against whom it is alleged that it is right?

Mr. HOWARD. What is the date of that report?

Mr. DRAKE. December 23, 1837. If I have a claim in open account against another which rests upon evidence to establish it, it never can be considered liquidated until that party agrees that the amount claimed by me is the correct amount, or we agree upon some amount. I say that you cannot base upon this report of the Secretary of War any such thing as a liquidation by the United States of this claim. Why did they not go to the Secretary of War and get payment according to that report? Simply because it was a mere report giving information. They must come, then, to Congress, and they did come to Congress; and the resolution of May 14, 1836, was passed which authorized him to receive certain evidence as establishing the claim. Then, they go on further, after giving that authority, and let the matter rest until 1859. Then it was, and not before, that under the act of March 3, 1859, the authority was given in pursuance of the resolution of 1836; then it was, and never before, that Congress recognized the validity of the amount of this claim and ordered it to be paid; and yet it is asserted that twenty-two years before that time, upon the mere fact of the report of a Secretary of War, the claim had been liquidated. Sir, there can be no more unfounded assertion than that which considers that this claim was ever liquidated prior to the act of March 3, 1859.

These being the simple facts of the case, I say that the act of liquidation on the part of the Government was simultaneous with the payment of the amount ascertained by that act to be due, or, if not simultaneous, that the amount ascertained by that act to be due was paid as soon afterward as it could be in the ordinary forms of proceedings in the Treasury Department. They took the amount which after so great a lapse of time had been thus liquidated upon their own statements, upon their own proofs. And they took it in satisfaction of their claim. Not a word was said about interest prior to the payment of that money; not a word for long years after about interest; not a word of previous ascertainment of the liability to interest; not a word about any previous ascertainment of the amount of the interest or the rules upon which it should be allowed. But, sir, in the progress of time, some hunter-up of old things finds here what he supposes to be a claim against the Government for interest, and forthwith there looms up before his vision a fortune for himself as the discoverer of this claim, and a fortune for some railroad company, all to be got through a grant of the States of Massachusetts and Maine; and that is the thing that brings this claim here now, without, as I understand it, any authority from the governments of either Massachusetts or Maine.

Mr. President, if there is one principle of law which is as well settled as any other principle of law, it is that a man who, after having an open account against another, receives the total amount of that account, without laying any claim to interest upon it, he is forever barred from claiming interest. We are expected here, if we allow the claim, to go in the teeth of that principle of law. We are expected, in other words, to turn over as a mere gratuity to Maine and Massachusetts a sum ranging anywhere from $700,000 to three or four or five times that amount.

Sir, there is no more dangerous thing that we can do in connection with the Treasury of the United States than thus to make drafts upon it in the last days of the session upon the urgency of Senators here, no matter how highly distinguished and honorable and illustrious they may be. If this claim is good, then I shall present immediately a claim on behalf of my own State. You allowed her $6,700,000 for her war expenses. Not one single dollar of that amount was ever expended by her without paying interest upon it. On that $6,700,000 an interest probably of one quarter of its full amount, perhaps one third, was paid out by the people of Missouri in the midst of their sufferings from the rebellion. It was considered lost, given up, laid as a sacrifice upon the altar of our country's good. And now we have to go back to pay Massachusetts interest on claims for defending her neighborhood against false alarms in the war of 1812.

Mr. CONKLING. Was not yours raised upon interest-bearing funds?

Mr. DRAKE. Yes, sir.

Mr. CONKLING. But you actually paid it?

Mr. DRAKE. Missouri actually paid every dollar of the interest. That State has paid, principal and interest, every dollar of that war debt.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. And your vouchers were here for two or three years before you were paid.

Mr. DRAKE. Certainly. Mr. President, I dislike very much to be brought into antagonism with Senators so distinguished as those from Massachusetts and Maine, and for whom I have so great a respect, but I must be permitted to say that in my judgment a more indefensible claim, presented in a more indefensible manner before the Senate of the United States, it has not been my fortune to have observed in the course of my experience in this body.

Mr. SUMNER. Mr. President, the Senator from Missouri tells us that the claim now before the Senate is extraordinary in character. Sir, it is my duty now to say to him in reply that the opposition is most extraordinary in character. If the claim is extraordinary it is because of the long default of the nation to one of the States of the Union. It is not extraordinary in any other respect. It is kindred to a large family of claims already amply satisfied, principal and interest, by the votes of Congress. It is rather hard that Massachusetts, who has so long been kept out of this money by a reason that I will in a moment explain, should be obliged to encounter at this time the opposition of a Senator like my distinguished friend from Missouri.

It was in 1837 that a report from the Secretary of War declared that there was a large sum due Massachusetts from the national Government. Why was it not paid at that time? Consult the history of your country and you will find a very easy answer. It was in that very year that the Legislature of Massachusetts signalized itself by demanding of the national Government the abolition of slavery in the District of Columbia. It was during that very year and the succeeding years for nearly a generation that Massachusetts sent her petitions into this Chamber demanding the abolition of slavery not only in the District of Columbia, but in all the Territories of the United States. It was in that very year that John Quincy Adams in the other branch of Congress made himself illustrious by representing this great cause. And now, what was the penalty paid by the State which he represented? It was the constant, bitter, abiding hostility of the dominant party and of the slave power which ruled this Republic. Senators need not be reminded how active that opposition was from 1837 to 1859. The principle of this claim was recognized by Congress as early as 1837, but there could be no appropriation for its payment until a late day. This is the secret of the default from which Massachusetts has suffered.

Mr. DRAKE. Will the honorable Senator allow me to say a word here?

Mr. SUMNER. I hope the honorable Senator will allow me to go on.

Mr. DRAKE. I think the honorable Senator interrupted me at least four times.

Mr. SUMNER. Very well; the Senator shall go on to any extent.

Mr. DRAKE. I merely wish the honorable Senator to explain to the Senate how it is that the State of Maryland had to wait from the 13th of May, 1826, to the 3d of March, 1857, thirty-one years, before she got the money and the interest which by the act of 1826 she was entitled to? She was not an abolition State.

Mr. SUMNER. The answer is very easy. If the Senator will look at the statute of 1826 relating to Maryland he will find that it relates exclusively to interest which was provided for. The subsequent provision in 1857 was to reopen these interest accounts. It proceeded on the idea that interest had been paid to Maryland, but that there was a mistake in adjusting this interest. At that early day Massachusetts had not received her principal. Of course there was no provision for her interest. The cases are entirely different. And now, thanking the Senator for the interruption with which he honored me, I will proceed with my remarks.

I was observing that the anti-slavery warfare which commenced in these two Chambers was led by an illustrious Representative from Massachusetts, and that the State paid the penalty of devotion to a great cause by drawing upon itself an inexorable opposition. When I had the honor of entering this Chamber in 1851 one of my first cares was to procure the final settlement of this claim. I counseled then with my distinguished colleague, who will be remembered personally by some whom I now address—there is the honorable Senator from Kentucky, who I know knew him well—the late John Davis, my first colleague in this Chamber, and what was the reply of that wise, sagacious, and experienced Senator? Said he, "It will do no good to pursue this claim now; the power that predominates in this Chamber is adverse to Massachusetts, and you must wait for a better hour." After a protracted struggle in 1859 the anti-slavery sentiment had increased in power. Under its enhanced influence Massachusetts succeeded in ingrafting on an appropriation bill a provision for the final payment of the principal of her claim. That is all. Nothing was said about interest. Massachusetts still felt the ban under which she was placed; and now, after enduring for so long a time that ban, which she suffered from the part she took in the great warfare by which you have all profited, you turn around upon her and say that her claim is stale. This is very hard, especially from Senators here. Massachusetts appears tardily, I know; but it is only recently that she has been able to appear and ask for justice in this court.

And here, sir, I have to say that I represent no cause in this Chamber, whether it bears the name of Massachusetts or any other name, which is not the cause of justice. I scorn to make myself the attorney of an unjust claim. I know the character and the value of this claim too well to fear to encounter any Senator, even the Senator from Missouri, who attacks it. I know, sir, that this claim is just. I know that if the Senate applies its attention to the question there can be but one answer.

And now, sir, pardon me if I turn to Senators who have spoken on this matter. There is my distinguished friend, the Senator from Ohio, whose speech was compounded of sundry different elements; first of history, which was entirely inapplicable to the case; secondly of figures, absolutely exaggerated so as to be worthless; and thirdly of menaces of danger if the Senate should do justice on this occasion, all of which was entirely out of place.

First as to his history, which I say was entirely inapplicable. He treated us to messages of James Monroe, criticising the conduct of Governor Strong. There is no occasion to criticise the conduct of Governor Strong, nor is there any occasion to defend it. The case does not present any question on his conduct. The question of the principal of this claim has already been settled by the legislation of Congress. Twice over by solemn acts you have recognized it; twice over in two different installments has the principal been paid; and yet Senators enter into this debate and fly back of these two acts of Congress in order to criticise the conduct of Governor Strong. It has nothing to do with the case. Governor Strong may have acted well or ill; history will make the record with regard to him; but this Senate now has no jurisdiction over that question. Something in this world must be considered as settled; and the liability of the national Government for the principal of this claim belongs to this class. There have been two judgments in court which you cannot set aside; and yet Senators, in the face of these judgments recognizing the principal of this claim, undertake to arraign the conduct of Massachusetts out of which the claim arose. Impossible! It is not in the case.

But the Senator from Ohio goes further, and descending into minute criticism he undertakes to say that the claim of Massachusetts is founded on an allegation of services not actually rendered to the nation, being merely of a local character for which the national Government is not responsible. Here, permit me to say, the Senator from Ohio shows how little he has studied this question. He shows that, though generally so well informed on those questions that come within his particular province, he has not mastered the present question on which he has spoken so fervently and positively. Sir, the class of claims to which he referred is not included in the list of the Massachusetts claims; that class was expressly ruled out. The claims of Massachusetts already paid, and on which she now asks interest, were all included in those classes where the liability of the national Government has been recognized in the settlement of the claims of other States, and on which interest has been paid. That I may not seem to speak without authority, allow me to read a part of the act of Congress dated May 31, 1830, making the first provision for these claims.

Mr. HOWARD. Will the Senator be good enough to read the whole act?

Mr. SUMNER. I will read the whole; and if the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. DAVIS] will give me his attention he will see that this statute answers—I say it with all respect—his whole speech. It is entitled "An act to authorize the payment of the claim of the State of Massachusetts for certain services of her militia during the late war:"

"Be it enacted, &c., That the proper accounting officers of the Treasury, under the superintendence of the Secretary of War, be, and they are hereby, authorized and directed to audit and settle the claims of the State of Massachusetts against the United States for the services of her militia during the late war."

How?

"In the following cases: first, where the militia of the said State were called out to repel actual invasion or under a well-founded apprehension of invasion."

That is the first case.

"Provided, Their numbers were not in undue proportion to the exigency; secondly, where they were called out by the authority of the State and afterward recognized by the Federal Government; and thirdly, where they were called out by and served under the requisition of the President of the United States or of any officer thereof."

That is the basis on which the Massachusetts claims were settled, and every claim that was paid was included within these terms, and these are the very terms on which the claims of all the other States for advances made during the war of 1812 were settled. If the Massachusetts claims were bad, then were the kindred claims of all the other States bad.

Mr. SHERMAN. If my friend will allow me, I will state that the payment made in 1831, the year following, covered that class of claims, amounting to some four hundred thousand dollars. All that was subsequently settled, included in the report of Secretary Poinsett, was for claims that were not embraced in that classification. It seems to me that that classification includes every kind of claim that the United States ought to have paid to the State of Massachusetts, but after that, upon the report of Mr. Poinsett in 1837, and upon the urgent recommendation of the Senator himself in 1859, the United States paid over $200,000 on claims not included in that classification.

Mr. SUMNER. Mr. President, again the Senator will pardon me; he is mistaken. He is mistaken in this statement of fact, as I shall show in a very few minutes how grievously he was mistaken in his figures and estimates. The payment in 1831 was of $480,478 26, and it was for claims coming precisely within the terms of the act of 1830, which I have just read. Now, the Senator will bear in mind, if he looks at the report of the Secretary of War, Mr. Poinsett, that at the same time Massachusetts did prefer another claim, being the very claim which the Senator criticises. But I am not here to represent that claim. It is not in issue. That claim is not now before the Senate. It has never been paid. It was thrown out, and therefore there is no present question of interest upon it. The claim of interest now before the Senate is on account of a claim where the principal has already been paid and which came within those general terms applicable to all the States that made advances to the national Government during the war of 1812. Every State was held to these terms. When Massachusetts came forward with her advances she was of course held to them, and she complied with them. She brought her claims within the required conditions. The claims were audited and adjusted, and now the question of interest is before you. That is my answer to that part of the argument of my honorable friend the Senator from Ohio; but by way of intensifying his opposition, by way, as some lawyers in old days said, of aggravating the case, my honorable friend went so far as to say that there was a great distinction between the case of Massachusetts and the case of New York and the case of Virginia and the case of Maryland, because her soil was never trod by hostile foot, as was unhappily the case with those States.

Sir, one of the pleasantest sayings of antiquity is that which comes down from the Spartan matron who boasted that she had never seen the smoke of an enemy's camp. I wish that the children of Massachusetts could enjoy that boast. They cannot. The State of Maine, which was at that time a part of Massachusetts, bone of her bone, flesh of her flesh, was invaded and in large part occupied by the public enemy. A famous case will be found in your law books growing out of the occupation of the port of Castine by the British in the war of 1812; but from that place they carried their flag still further into the interior and much of that State was under constant menace. Nor was that all. The British fleet was cruising off the harbor of Boston, the harbor of Marblehead, and the harbor of Salem, so that all these different towns were compelled to make provision against the common enemy. The guns of the Shannon, in an encounter with the Chesapeake, were heard in their echoes along the coast of Massachusetts. Talk with the old citizens there and they will tell you of the sadness of that hour when gathered on hill-tops or in steeples they could spy the flag of the enemy and heard the boom of his cannon. Under such circumstances Massachusetts was driven to make provision not only for the national defense, but for the defense of her own ports and towns; and now when she comes forward at this late day she is told that her claim for advances on account of these services is worse than nothing; that it is most extraordinary that it should now be brought forward; that it is absolutely without foundation.

The Senator from Ohio, making himself the representative of the Opposition, frightens or tries to frighten the Senate by saying that if you recognize this claim you will open the door to claims to the amount I would say of innumerable millions, and the Senator from Missouri takes up the menace. Now, sir, I deny the whole conclusion. The claim of Massachusetts, I have already said, had two parts; the first, $480,748, liquidated May 31, 1830, and then further $227,176, which was appointed to be paid by the statute of 1859, making $657,924. There you have the claim all told, and on that the question of interest arises.

To the allegation of Senators that this interest account would extend to many millions the answer is easy. It is entirely unnecessary that I should go into details, but I am ready to affirm that after careful estimates—

Mr. MORTON. I should like to ask the Senator from Massachusetts one question for information: whether the amount that was allowed by the act of 1859 was placed upon the same conditions and under the same limitations with the amount that was allowed by the act of 1830?

Mr. SHERMAN. The act of 1859 refers to the report of Mr. Poinsett.

Mr. SUMNER. I know that it does; but there was an act in 1836 that some one has taken from my table. I had it here.

Mr. WILSON. I wish simply to say, with my colleague's permission, that in 1836 Congress referred this matter to the Secretary of War, and the Secretary of War made a report in 1837 showing that Massachusetts had due her $227,000. From that time until 1859 every effort was made that could be made to obtain its payment. On the 11th day of February, 1859, I introduced a bill here for its payment. It went to the Committee on Military Affairs and was referred in that committee to Mr. Chesnut, of South Carolina, who made a thorough investigation of it and a long report to the committee. The committee adopted it and instructed me to report the bill. I prepared it without amendment and agreed to report it, but finally asked Mr. Davis, chairman of the committee, if he would do it, and he said he would do it as a personal favor to me. I supposed it would be stronger here if it came from him than from me, as I belonged to a small party, and which it was said at that time had not a healthy political organization; and the bill was passed at that time founded entirely on Mr. Poinsett's report, Mr. Poinsett's report being made on the terms of the act of 1836. I hope my colleague has found the act.

Mr. SUMNER. I have it in my hand.

Mr. SHERMAN. I have the report of Mr. Poinsett.

Mr. SUMNER. I prefer to go by the statutes of the land.

Mr. SHERMAN. I have the report before me.

Mr. SUMNER. The statute of May 14, 1836, is as follows:

"Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Secretary of War, in preparing his report pursuant to a resolve of the House of Representatives, agreed to on the 24th of February, 1832, be, and he hereby is, authorized, without regard to existing rules and requirements, to receive such evidence as is on file and any further proofs which may be offered tending to establish the validity of the claims of Massachusetts upon the United States or any part thereof for services, disbursements, and expenditures during the late war with Great Britain; and in all cases where such evidence shall in his judgment prove the truth of the items of claim, or any part thereof, to act on the same in like manner as if the proof consisted of such vouchers and evidence as is required by existing rules and regulations touching the allowance of such claims; and that in the settlement of claims of other States upon the United States for services, disbursements, and expenditures during the late war with Great Britain the same kind of evidence, vouchers, and proof shall be received as is herein provided for in relation to the claim of Massachusetts, the validity of which shall be in like manner determined and acted upon by the Secretary of War."

There, sir, you have it.

Mr. SHERMAN. Now allow me to read in this connection that report.

Mr. SUMNER. Let me finish my sentence. There you have it; Massachusetts by the law of the land is put on an equality with other States, and that is all she now asks.

Mr. SHERMAN. That has been paid.

Mr. SUMNER. All that she asks is an equality with other States. The Senator says she has been paid. Of course he means that her principal has been paid. The question is whether you will deny interest on the principal. How can you do it? You have not denied the interest of any other State. Already in this debate I have reminded you of other States to whom you have paid interest—Virginia, Maryland, Delaware, New York, South Carolina; to all these you have paid interest. You have paid interest to every State that had a claim for advances during the war of 1812, always excepting Massachusetts. I have asked why Massachusetts was so long excepted?

It was because she was carrying the flag of anti-slavery which made her the subject of vindictive opposition in the Halls of Congress; and now when that cause has triumphed is it not hard that the delays to which she has been subjected on account of her loyalty should be brought against her? Sir, I cannot comprehend it; but I am sure that the opposition proceeds less from indisposition to do justice than from ignorance of the question. In the pressure of business Senators will not look into it or make themselves acquainted with the actual facts.

Mr. HOWARD. If the honorable Senator from Massachusetts will allow me, I wish to inquire at what time Massachusetts first made and presented her claim for interest upon these advances and in what way it was done? I find nothing of the kind in the statutes, nor in the reports or debates so far as I have been able to investigate them.

Mr. SUMNER. I have already stated more than once that when the final payment of the principal was made in 1859 this country of ours was on the verge of civil trouble. If Massachusetts at that time was in no mood to press a claim for interest she ought not now to suffer. Soon afterward she took her part in the strife and gave her money and her blood to carry the great cause. When the cause was won, then through her agents, and among others her late honored Governor, John A. Andrew, Massachusetts appeared here: Governor Andrew was received by both the committees of Congress to which the subject had been referred—now about four years ago. I had the honor myself as chairman of the committee of this body to preside at a joint meeting of the two committees, before which that distinguished citizen made an eloquent argument. Then, sir, was the claim, in a formal way, presented to my knowledge—about four years ago. This was after the war was over.

Mr. HOWARD. It must have been in 1865.

Mr. SUMNER. I should say it was at the end of 1865.

Mr. HOWARD. Was any report made then?

Mr. SUMNER. There was a report by the Committee on Foreign Relations at that time. My impression is that it was made by the Senator from Wisconsin, [Mr. DOOLITTLE,] a member of the committee, and there was also a report in the House of Representatives by the Senator from New Hampshire, [Mr. PATTERSON,] who was at that time a member of that body.

Mr. PATTERSON, of New Hampshire. Allow me to state that the last installment of the principal was in the Thirty-Sixth Congress. In the Thirty-Seventh Congress a memorial was presented for the interest. In the Thirty-Eighth Congress it was reported upon in the House, and again in the Thirty-Ninth Congress; so that in the very first Congress after the principal was paid application was made for the payment of the interest.

Mr. HOWARD. What was the character of the reports, favorable or unfavorable?

Mr. PATTERSON, of New Hampshire. Favorable, all of them.

Mr. SUMNER. Every report has been favorable, and that brings me again to the remark of the Senator from Missouri, which he will pardon me if I say I thought rather critical, if not ungenerous. He commented on what he called the want of a report to sustain this measure. Sir, we have proceeded according to the habits of this Chamber. More than once a report has been made on this measure; but when I had the honor of reporting the bill the other day, under the instructions of the committee, we did not think that the occasion required any explanatory report. The bill was our report. It was left to us on the floor, as occasion might require, to answer inquiries, and that I am ready to do.

This brings me, sir, to one other remark of the Senator from Ohio. He winds up by saying very sententiously that it is all settled. How? The question of the principal is all settled, but no question of interest is "all settled." This question still remains, and it will remain, so long as the national Government is in default; and should the Senate, yielding to the arguments of my friend from Ohio, refuse to pay this interest, you only prepare the way for another discussion another year when this same claim will be presented. It is a just claim, and a just claim cannot die. It will be presented by the representatives of Massachusetts on this floor and in the other House until the national Government does justice.

And now allow me to appeal to my excellent friend, the Senator from New Jersey, whose opposition to this claim passes my comprehension. With his usual fairness, his excellence of judgment, his candor, his habits of accuracy, I cannot account for the objection that he has thought it his duty to make and to which he has lent his silver-tongued eloquence. Sir, I regret it; I prefer always to have that Senator with me than against me; but he will pardon me if I say that I think he makes a mistake; and allow me now to put the question to him directly: suppose a whole class of cases or a class of claims from different States had all been satisfied, principal and interest, except from one single State, could the Senator have the heart or the conscience to refuse payment to that single State in harmony with the payments already made to every other State? Suppose the solitary State thus excepted were New Jersey. I can answer for him. I know how ably he would insist that his State should enjoy equal rights, and receive all that other States similarly situated had received; and this is all that I now ask for Massachusetts.

I do not mean to raise any question with regard to claims that may grow out of our late rebellion. They are a distinct class, although if a State has paid interest on advances it seems to me that is a part of the advance. Let me say, sorrowfully enough, "sufficient unto the day is the evil thereof." I would provide for the claims that have arisen in the early part of our history out of one of our wars and close those accounts. This will be done simply by putting Massachusetts on an equality with the other States that made advances in that war. That is all that she now claims, and so long as I have a seat in this Chamber she will never be content with less.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. Mr. President—

Mr. SUMNER. Before my friend from Vermont proceeds I hope he will pardon me if I add one further remark. I have been reminded that I forgot to state the maximum of interest on this account. I was diverted from it by an inquiry from the Senator from Indiana. According to calculations which have been made by competent persons the maximum of interest now due is $767,947, which is very different from the exaggerated estimate by the Senator from Ohio, whose imagination saw in it several millions and the vista of yet other millions. I am perfectly willing that the Senator from Ohio, if he sees fit, shall put this sum into this very amendment as the maximum appropriation, so entirely am I satisfied that the interest will not exceed this sum.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. Mr. President, I regret that this amendment has been indorsed upon an appropriation bill, because I deem it the worst of all kinds of precedents for the adjudication of State claims, of which we have a large number; and if this precedent is set it must be followed hereafter. I think the much better mode would be to provide in a general bill on fixed principles for the adjudication of all these State claims. I therefore voted against it on the question of order without any regard to its merits in itself. But I desire to call the attention of the Senator from Massachusetts to the fact that we have four general appropriation bills yet unacted upon, and some besides these four yet to be brought in from the House of Representatives. Does he believe that if this appropriation were to be passed unanimously by the Senate it has the least possible chance of becoming a law at this session?

Mr. SUMNER. I do.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I have not the slightest faith that the House will agree to it without a long contest. I am satisfied that we shall debate this question for this whole night and to the jeopardy of the general legislation of the country. I think the Senator from Massachusetts in pressing this claim with so much persistence actually prejudices it in the minds of the Senate. Holding fast on this appropriation bill and preventing the progress of public business, it seems to me, has a tendency to cast a slur on the claim itself, on which I do not pretend to pass any judgment. I hope, therefore, that the Senator from Massachusetts will be content to withdraw the claim at this time, for I am quite certain that it cannot become a law at this session.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Mr. President, after the suggestion made by the Senator from Massachusetts, I am satisfied the Senate might as well consent to pay this claim as not. He says the prosecution of this claim before Congress is not to cease while he is a member of this body. Of course the claim has been rejected before by the Senate. A day or two ago the Senate decided that it was not in order at all to consider it; but that has been taken back, so persistently did he demand it, and now he is going to persist in this demand, and of course we shall witness the spectacle that has been so frequently seen here of a change in the determination of the Senate because that Senator demands it. Why not pay it, then, at once, and be done with it? I do not think it is right, but then it has got to be paid, you know, Mr. President; the Senate knows it. Now, why should Senators oppose it after they know that after a little they will go for it. So frequently have I seen this that I know what is to be the result of this claim. This is only six or seven hundred thousand dollars. The principal was paid long ago, paid in full, and everybody thought it was settled. Nobody made a claim of interest until four years ago, according to the statement of the Senator; but it never can die. I do not know whether a payment would kill it or not. That is the only death it is to meet, according to his statement and according to what I have witnessed so often in the Senate—it is to be paid. Why not pay it at once?

Mr. President, I am not going to discuss the question whether the Government, which is presumed always to be ready when a claim is properly presented, ought to pay interest or not. But our policy, with a few exceptional cases, has been not to pay interest. When the Government has owed a private citizen for many years and has delayed him in the application, and oftentimes allowed him to meet with financial ruin before it complied with its just obligations to him, still it has refused to pay him interest; and why? Upon the theory that the Government is always ready to pay its debts when properly presented. But it seems in this case that there was no claim for interest presented; it was not demanded. The Senator says that the slave power was in the way. Why, sir, the slave power paid Massachusetts all she asked. Did the Senator from Massachusetts expect that the slave power would go beyond the asking and voluntarily pay more than Massachusetts wanted?

Mr. President, I think this claim ought to be put upon the ground that Massachusetts was so earnest in her support of the war of 1812. It does appear that she did not advance anything, according to the argument of the Senator, until the booming of the cannon was heard just beyond the hills that line her coast and until her own soil was invaded; and then it seems she raised a militia for the purpose of protecting her own borders, not to aid in the general cause except so far as the defense of her own borders was connected with the general cause; and I suppose she paid this militia that was called out for the special purpose of protecting her own borders, not like Indiana in the recent war, not like Ohio in the recent war, advancing funds so as to fill the Army immediately to fight the battles of the country upon other than her own soil; but Massachusetts, showing her devotion to the cause and the flag of the country in the war of 1812, did not want her own soil invaded, and she took active means, prompt steps to prevent that, and she paid that particular force for that particular service and then she asked Congress to pay it back. It was paid. It was paid a long time before a good many other claims arising in that war were paid, very long before. Why, sir, as young a man as I am myself I recollect when I was a member of the House of Representatives to have presented a claim for an old gentleman whose vessel had been taken under such circumstances that Congress had to pay for it, and yet nobody thought of paying him interest.

He was a young man in command of his vessel upon the Delaware when it was taken from him, and he was left without the means of support almost, except his hands; and when it was paid he was old and gray and blind, and Congress never thought of paying him interest; and when it was asked the slave power, as the Senator says controlling Congress at that time, would not listen to him. He lived in Indiana, and it never occurred to him that it was the slave power that was opposed to the blind, gray-headed old man who did not get interest. Why? Upon the theory that the Government of the United States is always ready to pay when a claim is established to the satisfaction of its conscience. When did Massachusetts present her claim in such form as that it could not be questioned any longer? Was it before 1820? It seems that in 1820 she presented it in such a shape that there was a partial allowance made. Did Massachusetts in 1820 present the claim so as that the conscience of the Government was in default in not paying the whole? Then in 1836 some additional evidence was presented and additional payment was made; and then in 1859 a final allowance, when the State having presented all the evidence she could produce received the money from the Government upon a declaration that it is the last payment that is to be made. But that is a mistake. It is not the last. The Senator says he will not stop at all. Why did he allow that to go into the law and into the reports that this is upon the balance, the final payment? He did not intend it I suppose. Now, the truth of the business is that in 1820 the State of Massachusetts presented her evidence as well as she could, I suppose, and she was paid according to the claim then established; in 1836 she added to her evidence, I suppose, and she was paid according to the claim as then presented.

Mr. MORTON. I inquire of my colleague if there was anything in that appropriation bill saying that this is in payment and discharge of the debt. Was that language used?

Mr. HENDRICKS. As read by the Senator from Ohio I observed it. I have not read that appropriation bill myself.

Mr. MORTON. I ask whether the appropriation bill contained a declaration that this was in final discharge and payment of the whole debt?

Mr. SHERMAN. It refers to the report of Mr. Poinsett.

Mr. HOWARD. I should like to hear that.

Mr. SHERMAN. With the leave of my friend I will read it. I do not want to take time. The language of the law refers to the report of Mr. Poinsett. I will read that, for it is only a few lines:

DEPARTMENT OF WAR, December 23, 1837.

SIR: In compliance with a resolution of the House of Representatives of March, 1836, I have examined the claims of the State of Massachusetts for militia services and expenditures during the late war with Great Britain, and have now the honor to report:

The original amount of these claims was $843,349 60, which, by a payment of $11,000 in 1817 and one of $419,748 25, in 1831, was reduced to $412,601 34, which is still claimed. Of this sum it appears, upon applying the same principles which have governed this Department in the settlement of similar claims made by other States, there will be due $272,716 14, of which $45,539 60, being for arms and accouterments purchased by the State, arms, &c., to the value of that amount must be charged to the State and be withheld from its quota, under the act of 1808, for arming and equipping the militia. And all war like stores remaining in the State, which are paid for by the General Government, must be delivered up to the possession and use of the United States.

Very respectfully, your most obedient servant,
J. B. POINSETT.

HON. JAMES K. POLK,
Speaker of the House of Representatives.

The sum there found due has been paid under the act of 1859.

Mr. HOWARD. Yes; but I wish to inquire of the Senator from Ohio whether he has at hand the statute making the appropriation for the payment of that balance. I have not got it at hand. I would thank him to read it.

Mr. SHERMAN. I will read it. It is the act of 1859:

"And be it further enacted, That for the purpose of executing a resolution approved May 14, 1836, entitled 'A resolution to authorize the Secretary of War to receive additional evidence in support of the claims of Massachusetts and other States of the United States for disbursements, services, &c., during the late war,' the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay to Massachusetts out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated the sum of $227,176 48, reported under said resolution to be due to such State by J. B. Poinsett, late Secretary of War, in a report dated the 23d of December, 1837, made to the House of Representatives the 27th day of December, 1837: Provided, That in lieu of payment in money the Secretary of the Treasury may in his discretion issue bonds," &c.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Mr. President—

Mr. CONKLING. I ask the honorable Senator from Indiana, before he proceeds, to let me remind him that beside the import of that act in extinguishing this claim it is obvious that there is no reservation of interest; and I remind the honorable Senator that that is the legal question here, whether when the principal was received the claimant reserved any right to demand interest. As I understand the law unless that was done whatever be the terms of the payment the interest is estopped.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. That is the rule between individuals.

Mr. CONKLING. Certainly.

Mr. SHERMAN. At the request of the Senator from Indiana I will read the report of Mr. Wilson, the Third Auditor, who states in his letter of June 28, 1866:

"It does not appear by either of the settlements (copies of which I hand herewith) that any interest was allowed, nor is there any evidence on file in this office that any demand was made by the State for interest."

This was years after the last payment.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Then, Mr. President, until four years since there was no claim urged by the State of Massachusetts for interest; but she received the money as it was appropriated by Congress, upon a statement made by the Secretary of War and referred to by the law, that that was the balance of the claim. The one side, that is, the Government, in her legislation and by her Department ascertains that this is the balance; and the State accepting it upon that statement, in my judgment, is not now in a condition to demand interest.

But, Mr. President, this law of 1859 shows the fact to have been as I supposed it to be, that in 1820 the State of Massachusetts was not in a condition to demand all that was due to her from the Government; in other words, she had not presented her claim to Congress in such form as satisfied the conscience of Congress that this payment ought to be made; so that in 1836 there was a resolution passed authorizing the State of Massachusetts to present evidence in support of her claim. Up to that time she had not presented evidence. I ask the Senator from Massachusetts if the Government of the United States is under any moral obligation to pay interest to a State or any other body or person until that person or State is in a condition to demand the money? If the accounts of the State when presented are not supported by such evidence as makes it the duty of the public officers to pay the money is the Government in default? This was service rendered peculiarly under the eye of Massachusetts. This military service was not under the control and management of the officers of the United States, but it was her own militia upon her own pay-rolls, as I suppose, and it was for her, if she had a claim against the Government for this irregular service, to present it with such evidence as would justify the representatives of the States and of the people in making the payment from the public Treasury. I submit to Senators can interest be demanded upon any principle of conscience and equity from the United States until the claim is supported by such evidence as makes it a duty on the part of the Government to pay?

Then, in 1836, Congress—I suppose at the request of Massachusetts—provided that Massachusetts might furnish evidence of her claim. Then she prepares her evidence, and in 1859, through the Secretary of War, that evidence is brought before Congress and the appropriation is made of the sum of money then found due. I want to know from the Senator from Massachusetts when was this claim presented in such shape as that it became the duty of Congress to make the appropriation for the $800,000? The Senator says that no written report has been made on this subject; none was necessary.

Why, Mr. President, when a claim is made against the Government for interest what must be established? Not that the principal was found to be due some time, but it must be shown that the Government was in default in making payment, that it unreasonably delayed the party after the claim was in proper shape, presented against it. Can a citizen, can a State, in conscience demand interest of the Government until the State or person has made the claim so clear by evidence as that the Government in conscience cannot refuse it? The claim for interest is in the nature of damages; and in the nature of damages for what? For delay of payment, for unreasonable and wrongful delay, for default in payment. When does the default occur on the part of the Government? Not when the debt first has its origin; but when the debt is presented against the Government in such shape so established by evidence as that the public officers are in the wrong if they refuse to pay it. In this case the officers appealed to were the members of the legislative body. When then, I ask, was this evidence of the claim presented to Congress in such shape as that Congress was in default in this matter? I think that the Senator from Massachusetts cannot say to the Senate that no written report has ever been made upon this subject, because it was not necessary. I want to know of him now when did the State of Massachusetts present her case to Congress supported by such evidence as made it the duty of Congress to appropriate eight hundred and odd thousand dollars? It clearly had not been done up to 1836, because in 1836 a resolution was passed authorizing Massachusetts to present her evidence. Then she prepared her testimony, I suppose, in support of her claim, and it came finally to be acted upon in 1859, and payment was then received by Massachusetts as the balance of the claim, urging no interest, thinking of no interest, not regarding that as a part of her claim until a railroad company becomes interested in it and that corporation urges it as a claim against the Government. The conscience of the Government was not charged with wrong by the State of Massachusetts until her assignment is made to a corporation; and I want to know before the Senator from Massachusetts undertakes to say that we are in fault in this matter when the evidence was completed in support of this claim.

But, Mr. President, it is not the policy of the Government to pay interest on claims when allowed. I will not discuss the right or the wrong of that. A State has no better right to interest than the humblest citizen of this country. He who furnishes corn to feed the cavalry horses or provisions to feed the soldiers during war is as much entitled to interest upon his advances as a State that makes an advance of money to support the cause, and especially if it be made to defend her own borders.

Now, we had better decide the question whether we choose to reverse the whole policy of the Government on this question. I am free to say that I cannot answer very satisfactorily the demand that may be made for interest by any party after a claim has been presented with sufficient evidence to support it. I do not know why the Government should not pay interest after that time; but we have said during our whole history that we will not pay interest. Shall we reverse it? The citizen comes to Congress and he can scarcely have a hearing. Session after session he attends, he beseeches, he prays, he begs that he may be paid what the Government owes him; it may be for a horse taken, it may be for provisions supplied; whatever it is he importunes, and he stays about the Capitol hoping from day to day that he may receive that which the Government owes him. At the end of year he gets his money upon a claim which was established in the first place by sufficient evidence, but nobody talks of giving him the interest, and by the time he gets the money perhaps he is broken up in the prosecution of the claim. I have thought sometimes that the Government was the worst debtor that the citizen could possibly find, so difficult, so tedious, and so expensive is the prosecution of a claim against the Government; but after all we say to him, "We owe you no interest." Why? Upon the theory that the Government is always ready to pay; but in the case I have referred to it does not pay, has not paid except upon very unreasonable delay. Now, if that citizen thus presenting a claim well supported in every respect and commanding the conscience of the Government cannot receive interest why shall a State?

The State that I represent is somewhat interested in this question, for during the war she made advances for Army purposes; she sold her bonds and paid interest upon those bonds, and when a settlement was made in the Departments she was only allowed the amount advanced. Of course if Massachusetts is paid interest this must be returned to Indiana. We cannot see a discrimination of that sort, because there is nothing peculiar in the case of Massachusetts. There is much that was peculiar in the case of Maryland where she sold her trust funds, which were yielding interest, in order to raise money; but in this case of Massachusetts there is nothing peculiar to justify the payment of interest; and if it be paid to her, then Indiana must have her interest, of course. I should not be doing my duty to my State if I did not most earnestly insist upon it, and do that now. I want it to be understood that if this claim be carried then Indiana must be provided for, and I should say all the States ought to be provided for that have made advances; and if you go upon the theory of this proposition that interest is to be allowed before a State has perfected her evidence in support of her claim, then of course Indiana must be paid from the date that she made the advances, not from the day that she demanded the money back again.

Mr. President, the circumstances of a case very much change the zeal of gentlemen. A few days ago there was a claim of a girl here whose house was taken that upon the site of the house there might be built a fortification, and the entire property taken for military purposes. No Senator in this body was more earnest in opposition to that claim than the Senator from Massachusetts, and his hostility rested upon the most heartless technicality that it is possible to conceive. If I oppose this claim to-night urged for interest upon the theory that the Government is always to be presumed ready to pay every demand when properly presented, that technicality is not so harsh, so cold, so heartless as the technicality that a loyal person—using the language of the Senator from Massachusetts—in a southern State whose property was taken for public use cannot make demand against the Government for the simple reason that that person was a public enemy. Devoted to the country, standing by the flag all the while, never deserting the old Government, but always true—the Senator from Massachusetts says to such a person, "Unfortunately your home was in a southern State, and you are by law branded with the character of a public enemy. It is not true in fact; you were as loyal as I," says the gentleman from Massachusetts, "as loyal as any son of Massachusetts, yet you had the misfortune to live in a southern State, and therefore the law marks you as a public enemy. To stand by the flag you had to stand against public sentiment; you had to make a stand where it was difficult to stand; and in that respect you have greater merit than a man living in the North, and yet unfortunately you lived in a southern State; your property was taken for public uses; your property aided the cause of the country, and you cannot be paid because you are a public enemy." That was the argument made by the honorable Senator the other day to save the Treasury from the payment of a claim presented here upon the most satisfactory evidence. Now he says that no technicality is to be urged against a claim for interest. I urge against the State of Massachusetts—a sovereign State, one of the Confederacy—the very technicality which is arrayed against the humblest citizen that comes to the Halls of Congress for relief; the Government is always ready to pay its debts when they are presented in such form and supported by such evidence as makes it an obligation of conscience to pay them.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Mr. President, I have been a little surprised by the Senator from Indiana, particularly by his admissions, and then by his arguments from those admissions. A little while ago, at another session, when a claim of the State of Maine was urged here the Senator cried out "codfish!" "codfish!" Now, when another claim of the State of Maine is urged, he cries out "Sue Murphey!" "Sue Murphey!" I think the codfish argument was as good as the Murphey argument and the Murphey argument as good as the codfish argument. I trust the claim will not be prejudiced in that way.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I did not know the State of Maine had any claim for codfish. I never heard of that claim. When was it presented?

Mr. FESSENDEN. No, sir. But when we had a claim presented for lands, under a treaty, the Senator then brought forward the codfish argument.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I think that the codfish argument is altogether in the imagination of the Senator. I did not know she had any such claim.

Mr. FESSENDEN. The Senator must recollect the fact. Now, sir, leaving that matter, I want to say one or two things in reference to this particular situation of affairs. The Senator first reads from a book, or he calls on the Senator from Ohio to read from a book, to show that in 1836 this claim, so far as the principal was concerned, was finally liquidated and settled and two hundred and odd thousand dollars found due. That is undisputed. That appears unquestionably by Mr. Poinsett's report, which the Senator called for and which was read. In 1836, under a resolution of Congress, Mr. Poinsett made a report in which he admitted the balance due to the State of Massachusetts to be between two and three hundred thousand dollars.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Due when?

Mr. FESSENDEN. At that moment.

Mr. EDMUNDS. In 1859?

Mr. FESSENDEN. No, sir; 1836.

Mr. SHERMAN. Eighteen hundred and thirty-seven.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Eighteen hundred and thirty-six or 1837. It was liquidated at that period under a resolution of Congress on the same principles applied to the settlements with other States; it has been read over and over again, and the sum of over two thousand dollars was found to be due.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Was any part of it interest?

Mr. FESSENDEN. No, sir; all principal, every dollar of it.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Where is the evidence of that?

Mr. FESSENDEN. It has been read forty times to-day. The Senator from Ohio has the book before him and will read it again if the Senator wants to hear it.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I do not understand that that report shows what composes that balance.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Certainly it does. It was a settlement of the claim of Massachusetts on the same principles applied to the settlements with other States for advances.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Then does the report show that any part of it was interest and another part principal?

Mr. FESSENDEN. No. It shows that no part of it was interest.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I failed to see that when the report was read. It is silent on the subject.

Mr. FESSENDEN. It was settled on the principles applied to the settlements with other States.

Mr. EDMUNDS. You mean it was silent on that subject, and you infer from that that the amount was all principal.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I will say, in reply to that, that if any part of that was interest it will be found when we come to settle the interest account. Nobody pretends there was any interest in it. And yet, sir, notwithstanding that settlement precisely in that way, the Senator from Indiana gets up here and says "In order to claim interest you must show that there has been an admitted debt due which has not been paid; if you show that there has been a debt admitted and settled which has not been paid then you may properly claim interest;" and yet there is the fact as long ago as 1837.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Did Congress act at that time?

Mr. FESSENDEN. Congress acted precisely in the way I have stated to-day. I have gone over the whole ground to-day and stated it once. From that time, from 1837, the effort was made to get that principal paid. Congress refused to make the appropriation to pay that admitted balance up to the year 1859, over and over again, on account of the old prejudice against Massachusetts, which my friend is familiar with, growing out of the events of the war of 1812-15. Although under a resolution of Congress that amount was found due by the Secretary of War, and stated on a liquidation of the claim on the principles applied to the settlement of such claims, Congress refused to pay the money, to make the appropriation, and so it stood until 1859, and then Congress made the appropriation.

Now the honorable Senator from Indiana says, "Show, before you demand interest, that the account has been liquidated, that the money was admitted to be due." That is precisely what we show to-day, and that is the ground on which we claim it. It is that in that year the account was liquidated, the money admitted to be due, the account stated and never disputed, but no payment was made; payment was constantly refused till 1859. Sir, I take the Senator from Indiana on his own statement precisely. We present precisely the case in which in his argument he said interest would be due and ought to be paid, because he cannot possibly dispute the fact that that liquidation took place at that time. Therefore I say it is very curious for him to call for the reading of the report to establish the fact, and then lay down the principle upon which interest ought to be paid, and when we show that we come within that principle he says it should not be paid at all. Why? Because Congress refused to pay Sue Murphey. That is the amount of it. If that is an argument applicable to a matter of this kind I do not understand what proper argument is.

One thing more I want to say to the Senate, for I do not mean to argue this matter over again. He says Massachusetts did not do her part in the war; when called upon for soldiers she did not send her soldiers to fight the enemies of the country out of the State, but observed a studied silence, doing nothing until her own borders were invaded, and then she was active to exert herself to save herself and called upon the General Government for payment. Why, is it possible that my learned friend from Indiana is so ignorant of the history of his country? Does he not know—if he does not he ought to know—that some of the bravest and most distinguished soldiery in the war of 1812-15 came from Massachusetts and from all New England? Why, sir, "the Fighting Fourth" was one of the most celebrated regiments of that war. It is not so. New England—Massachusetts is a part of New England—furnished her quota of troops.

Mr. GRIMES. Who commanded the Fourth?

Mr. FESSENDEN. I do not remember. A considerable portion of it was raised in New Hampshire, some in Vermont, some in Massachusetts. Did the Senator never hear the name of Ripley? Was he not a Massachusetts man?

Mr. GRIMES. A New Hampshire man.

Mr. FESSENDEN. No, sir; a Massachusetts man.

Mr. SUMNER. Let me remind the Senator there is General Miller, who uttered the famous saying "I will try."

Mr. GRIMES. But he did not happen to be a Massachusetts man, nor Ripley either. Ripley was born in Hanover, New Hampshire.

Mr. FESSENDEN. He lived in the State of Maine when he went into the war. At any rate, if he had stayed in New Hampshire I do not know what might have become of him; but he came into Maine, and from there went into the Army; and Miller went from Massachusetts.

Mr. SUMNER. From Salem.

Mr. GRIMES. Miller was afterward Governor of Arkansas, and was then appointed collector of customs at Salem; but he happened to be a relative of mine, and I know something about him. He was born in New Hampshire.

Mr. SUMNER. He lived in Massachusetts.

Mr. GRIMES. In the latter part of his life, long after the war.

Mr. FESSENDEN. If he was not born in Massachusetts he could not have found a better State than New Hampshire to be born in. [Laughter.] That is all I have to say about it. My friend from Iowa was born there, too, and he does honor to his native State. But I have this to say, that some of the bravest men in that war were from Massachusetts; many of the bravest officers, many of the most distinguished officers, and the Massachusetts soldiery and the New Hampshire soldiery and all the New England soldiery were known in every field in that war. Go to Chippewa and Lundy's Lane and inquire the history of the New England men there. And does the Senator know nothing about the almost innumerable fleet of privateers that went from the ports in New England, from Massachusetts and from Maine?

Mr. HENDRICKS. I would not deny the privateers.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I do not understand you.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I do not dispute about the privateers.

Mr. FESSENDEN. They did a very respectable quantity of fighting. But the remark was that Massachusetts stood still, that she would not send her men out to fight on other fields, that the people of Massachusetts stayed at home and did nothing until her own borders were attacked. Does the Senator believe that statement that he made? If he believes it is because he has not read or has forgotten his country's history at that period. No, sir; Massachusetts and all New England furnished their quota of troops, and went out of the State and fought under the command of officers appointed by the General Government where ever fighting was done during that war. And, sir, you must remember that Massachusetts at that time was bordering for a great part of the length of her territory on hostile territory, and that she was exposed; her territory was attacked not only by land but by sea; and the General Government failed to defend her, and called on Massachusetts to defend herself, and she turned out her own citizens to defend her own borders. Did that make a claim of Massachusetts on the General Government or not? Was she bound or was the General Government bound to defend her as a part of the United States—a part of the territory of the country? Sir, the principle has been admitted over and over again. It has been admitted during the very last war we had, the war of the rebellion; it is admitted everywhere. And, sir, is it true that the policy of the Government is not to pay interest? The Senator states it as a fact. Sir, the Government paid interest to the States upon advances made during the revolutionary war; and the Government has paid interest to every State except Massachusetts for advances made during the war of 1812-15 in all cases where the States had paid interest and were obliged to pay interest; so that the Senator is wrong in his facts. Sir, I argued this matter at length this morning, and I will not trouble the Senate with a repetition of what I said then; but I could not sit still and hear statements so broad made by my honorable friend, showing that he was laboring under so very great a mistake in regard to history with which he ought to be familiar.

Mr. MORTON. Mr. President—

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I would ask the Senator from Indiana if he will not give way for a motion to adjourn? ["No!" "No!"] We cannot settle this matter to-night.

Mr. MORTON. I shall conclude in a few minutes.

Mr. President, this claim set up by Massachusetts ought not to be disposed of upon any narrow or technical principles. The statute of limitations does not run against the General Government, nor should it run against a State. If this money is fairly due to the State of Massachusetts it should be paid without regard to lapse of time. It is a question therefore as to the justice and equity of the claim. But, Mr. President, should the Government pay interest on a claim? I ask why not? Why should not the Government pay interest in any case where a private individual would be required to pay interest by equity or by law? Because the Government has not done it in many cases where it ought to do it it cannot be argued that it ought not to. And should the Government pay interest to a State for advances? Why not? If a State advances money to the General Government that loan answers the same purpose as if the Government borrowed money on its bonds, and if it can afford to pay six per cent. interest in gold on its bonds it can afford to pay interest on advances made by a State for it. Where is the difference in principle and in justice? What has been the precedent in regard to paying interest to States for advancements? After the war of the Revolution when our new Government was organized, and we came to settle the claims growing out of that war, we paid interest to the States for their advances; and that, too, without going into the question whether the States themselves had been paying interest on the same sum.

There is the first precedent. Again, after the war of 1812 the Government paid interest to all the States for their advances except to the State of Massachusetts. Then, after the war of 1846, the Mexican war, the Government paid interest to the several States for the advances during that war. So we have the uniform practice of the Government for paying interest on advances made by States, except it may be in the single case of Massachusetts—first, after the Revolution; second, after the war of 1812; and third, after the war of 1846. Now, sir, I come down to the war of 1861. Why shall not the Government pay interest to the States for their advances during that war? I should not have said one word in this debate but for the argument made by the Senator from Ohio and the Senator from New Jersey and the Senator from Missouri that if this claim be allowed to Massachusetts it will open the door to allowing the claims of States for interest on advances made during the war of the rebellion. Sir, I hope the Government will be called upon and will pay the States for the advances made. Why not? Take the case of my own State. In 1861 when the war broke out the Government was without money to organize troops and put them into the field. It must be done by the States or not at all. The State of Indiana was compelled to put her bonds into the market to the amount of more than two million dollars, to sell them at a discount, and she has been paying interest on those bonds until they have been paid off, or a part of them, and she is paying interest on some of them now. Why should not the State of Indiana be refunded for that advance? It was the cheapest money that this Government borrowed. When it borrowed money of private persons it was compelled to pay interest at the rate of six per cent. in gold. The States will not ask gold interest, nor will they ask their principal to be paid in gold; but when Indiana has borrowed money and is now paying interest on it for the purpose of advancing it to the Government in the payment of supplies, can you tell me any principle of common honesty or integrity that will not require the Government of the United States to refund that interest to the State of Indiana?

Mr. GRIMES. How much is that claim of Indiana? What is the amount of it?

Mr. MORTON. The claim of Indiana for discount on her bonds and for interest that she has paid upon them is about six hundred thousand dollars. It was said by my friend from Ohio to-day, "If you open this door perhaps you will open the door to $1,000,000,000." It is not so; it would be comparatively a small sum; but suppose it amounts to $50,000,000, what of it? It is a just debt, as just a debt as any bond that we owe; but because it has not yet been allowed, shall it be repudiated because we may thereby increase the public debt? I would like to inquire whether we are now to repudiate honest debts that may be due to the several States for advances made simply because if we do not repudiate them we shall to that amount increase the public debt?

Sir, these debts due to the several States for advances made are just as honest and as meritorious as debts due for money borrowed directly by the Government; and as I before remarked, it is the cheapest money that the Government borrowed during the war. Now, Mr. President, I protest against the argument that if you allow the Massachusetts claim you will thereby open a door to pay the other States. Why, Mr. President, the right of the other States to be reimbursed does not depend upon this question, and the rejection of this claim should not be made a precedent or an argument for hereafter refusing to reimburse Indiana and other States for advances made in the late war.

Mr. President, there have been several things thrown in sideways as an argument against this claim of Massachusetts. One is that this money is to go to a certain railroad corporation. What have we got to do with that? The question is whether the money is due to Massachusetts and Maine. When they get the money it is of no importance to the Government whether they give it to a railroad company or throw it into Boston harbor. Is it their money? Is it due to them? If it is, how can you refuse to pay it to Massachusetts and Maine because they have seen proper to promise this money when they get it to a railroad company? What business is that of ours? What kind of an argument is that, sir?

Then, we are told that this claim was not urged in time. As I said before, States are not to be barred by the statute of limitations nor is the Government to take advantage of its own ruin, and because it has failed to pay a claim for forty or fifty years to turn around and say "the claim is an old one and we will not pay it on that account." If the Government had paid this claim for interest years ago, the argument of age could not have been urged against it; but after having failed to pay it for half a century, then to turn around and say "this is an old claim and we will not pay it on that account" has neither justice nor equity in it.

There is one point, however, in this particular claim which strikes me rather unfavorably, though I do not know that it authorizes us to reject it, because the justice of the claim has been recognized by two preceding Congresses. It would hardly be proper, perhaps, now to go back to the original consideration, because having agreed to pay the principal as to advances made by the State during the war it is now perhaps too late to inquire whether the original payment was correct or not. But it does go somewhat, I confess, to the moral character of this claim that Massachusetts at the time the claim was contracted refused to allow her militia to be commanded by the Government of the United States; that she chose to carry on the defenses upon her own plan and upon her own account. That does go somewhat, I confess, to the moral character of this claim for interest. It might perhaps be said with some propriety that if Massachusetts chose to carry on the defense of her territory according to her own plan and upon her own account, and refused to allow the Government of the United States to command her troops, she might also look to the accounts herself and have no claim on the Government.

I do not speak particularly of the merits of this claim; but I protest against the argument made here to-night that if it is allowed you will thereby open the door to Indiana and other States to come forward with claims for money advanced on which they have paid interest and are now paying interest, not to defend their own borders, but to equip troops to go a thousand miles south to fight the battles of the country. Indiana has done it and other States have done it, and where they have done it they have a legal and a moral right to be reimbursed, not only principal, but interest; and however this claim may be decided I, for one, shall insist hereafter that the Government of the United States is legally and morally bound to reimburse those States.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I move that the Senate do now adjourn. There are a number who wish to speak. I have something myself to say further.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine, called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 22, nays 27; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Buckalew, Chandler, Cole, Conkling, Corbett, Davis, Drake, Edmunds, Fowler, Frelinghuyesen, Grimes, Harlan, Hendricks, Howard, McCreery, Morgan, Ramsey, Rice, Sherman, Tipton, Whyte, and Williams—22.

NAYS—Messrs. Cattell, Conness, Cragin, Doolittle, Fessenden, Harris, Howe, Kellogg, McDonald, Morrill of Maine, Morrill of Vermont, Morton, Nye, Osborn, Patterson of New Hampshire, Pomeroy, Robertson, Ross, Sawyer, Sprague, Stewart, Sumner, Thayer, Trumbull, Van Winkle, Warner, and Wilson—27.

ABSENT—Messrs. Abbott, Anthony, Bayard, Cameron, Dixon, Ferry, Henderson, Norton, Patterson of Tennessee, Pool, Saulsbury, Spencer, Vickers, Wade, Welch, Willey, and Yates—17.

So the Senate refused to adjourn.

Mr. POMEROY. Mr. President, I voted against the adjournment thinking perhaps the Senate would come to some conclusion on this subject and take the vote this evening. I made several efforts some days ago to induce the Senate to limit, before the session closed, in some measure the debate on a pending proposition. It did not meet with any favor or very little favor in the Senate. We have now but two days more of this session, and I make the assertion that it is impossible to complete any appropriation bill this session. We may, for instance, close this question to-night, the bill will be returned to the House with the amendments to-morrow, and they of course will non-concur and ask for a committee of conference. It is impossible for that committee of conference to report if they examine these amendments before the day after to-morrow, the last day of the session, and you cannot enroll the bill and put it before the President before we adjourn; and so of the others. When the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations consented that the appropriation bills might stand aside on Saturday, and the chairman of the Committee on Finance introduced a measure which took a day and a night, in that measure was lost every appropriation bill. That measure of course will not be signed by the President, there will be no law growing out of it, but it must consume the time of the Senate to discuss it, and in that discussion we have lost the appropriation bills, and it is of very little consequence now what is done between this and the last hours of the session. It is impossible to make one of these bills a law by the greatest industry we can practice, because all of them have to go back to the House, committees of conference have got to be appointed; and after they are appointed they have to be examined and reported, and then we must get the bills enrolled; and twelve o'clock on the 4th of March will come before that is done.

Mr. GRIMES. What is the subject under consideration, Mr. President?

Mr. POMEROY. It is just as appropriate to talk about the order of business as it is about any question under discussion. This thing has been gone over and over and over, and gentlemen on this side of the Chamber have not spoken on the question.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. (Mr. THAYER in the chair.) The Chair will state that the question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Iowa to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. POMEROY. I know what the question is.

Mr. CONNESS. Will the Senator let us vote?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Kansas will confine himself to the subject.

Mr. POMEROY. I am approaching the subject gradually. [Laughter.] If the Senate are willing now to come to a vote I will yield. There never was a time since I came to this body that I would not stop speaking for a vote; but if there is no vote to come one Senator may speak as well as another, and we may as well speak on one subject as another. Debate has gone by; it is merely a question now who can occupy the most time and how long the patience of the Senate will hold out. Nothing more can be said on this question. It has been argued in the first place on a point of order one whole day, and now all day and all night on the merits of the question.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I think the Senator from Kansas, being in the chair, declined to consider the decision of the Senate on the question of order as authority. If the Senator had just stood by the decision of the Senate we should have got along very well.

Mr. POMEROY. I did not desire, by any arbitrary decision of mine in the chair, to prevent the Senate discussing and debating this thing fairly. It was due to this question that the claim should be presented. I did not desire to take any part in it or throw any obstacle in its way. I do not know but the claim is a good one. I have not any hostility to this claim myself; I only want it voted upon. It does not seem any worse to me because it is to be appropriated to build a railroad of considerable national importance. Let the Senators from Massachusetts and Maine ask an appropriation for that purpose and I will vote it; so far as I am concerned I will vote it to-night. It is a fair, legitimate question, and even if there was no claim for interest if they would put it on that ground I would vote for it. I have done it for enterprises of this character in other sections of the country. Why not do it for Maine and Massachusetts?

I do not propose to discuss it. I want the Senate to vote. They cannot be unmindful of the fact that the hours of this session are numbered. It is not like a session when we can put off our adjournment; the hours are numbered, and by no ingenuity of ours can we make this bill a law even if we take the question to-night.

Mr. CONNESS. Let us try.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. One word. I am not responsible for having consumed much time in speeches on this or any other subject; I have not been disposed to trespass much on the time of the Senate on this bill; but I think it is entirely practicable to pass all the appropriation bills that have come to the Senate, or may come in the course of the business of the House, provided the Senate gives its attention to that subject, and does not unnecessarily procrastinate debate. I have not participated in this discussion, nor do I intend to do so. We have no previous question here which authorizes or enables me as chairman of the Committee on Appropriations to bring debate to a close at any time. We have one rule that I believe can be applied proximately, and that is that no Senator shall be allowed to speak more than twice upon any one question on the same day. I hope Senators will not hereafter think it out of order for me to enforce that rule.

What I rose to say was that it is entirely practicable to pass all the bills that have been sent to the Senate and those which I anticipate will be sent to-morrow, in my judgment. Now, sir, how much more time this bill is to take of course I do not know. The discussion has been so ample and broad up to the present time that it would seem to have covered all the necessary points of the case; and if the Senate are desirous of acting upon the information they have upon the subject, and not to defeat the bill by unnecessary speaking, having no reference to the judgment of the Senate, I do not see why they cannot finish this bill to-night and go home in pretty good time. That being done, what have we left? We have the Post Office appropriation bill, which has not been amended at all by the committee, and which I predict will pass in half an hour, and will be read and enacted in a single half hour. Then you have the legislative bill, which will soon pass. It has been very little amended. I do not know of but one single point in it which I think will be controverted at all, and that is as to the clause the House of Representatives have inserted increasing the pay of the female clerks. That may give rise to some debate, but it does not occur to me that there is a single item in the bill calculated to challenge much debate in the Senate. So that in a single two hours I should hope that the Post Office bill and the legislative appropriation bill would get the sanction of the Senate; then you have the deficiency bill, which is not a long bill, and has very few controverted points. The chief items of that bill are for deficiencies in the Army, those relating to the Indian war. They are, in gross, some fifteen million dollars. Nobody, I think, will challenge them, and I should not expect that the bill would occupy much time in the Senate. All you have back of that is the miscellaneous or sundry civil bill, as we call it. That has not reached the Senate yet.

Now, one word about the responsibility which attaches to me, alluded to by the honorable Senator from Kansas. He says if I had not yielded to the bill of the Senator from Ohio on Saturday all would have been well. Mr. President, I did yield to the solicitations of the chairman of the Committee on Finance. The honorable Senator from Ohio reminds me that he was compelled to yield to a railroad bill. That may be so. How much responsibility I have about that the Senate may judge.

Mr. SHERMAN. I hope my friend from Maine does not impute that I thought he was responsible for it.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. No; but the Senator from Kansas alludes to the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations as having been guilty of laches in some way, or at least the allusion is susceptible of that inference. On Saturday, when my bill was regularly before the Senate, I did yield to the solicitations of the chairman of the Committee on Finance. He had a bill which in the judgment of the Senate ought to receive a consideration in this body, and I was appealed to by leading gentlemen—by a number of gentlemen here—to allow that bill to be considered. It was then supposed it would occupy but very little time. I lost the day, to be sure, but there was this consideration about it: I only had this bill, which I could not presume would occupy this entire day; the House had not sent to the Senate any other bill upon which we had been able to act; we had the legislative bill, but the deficiency bill had not reached here. I thought I could with perfect safety yield to the Senator from Ohio on Saturday, and have to-day to finish this bill; and I submit to the Senate whether or not it was reasonable to suppose that this day would be ample to finish this bill; and if so then we should be allowed, as we shall now if this bill is finished, to take up the Post Office, the legislative, and the deficiency bills, and finish them to-morrow. The time is ample. These bills have been prepared since Saturday night, and have been reported and will be in order to-morrow. Therefore I trust the Senate will proceed to a vote on this bill, and allow us to-morrow to take up in their order the bills which will then be lying on the table, and we shall have ample opportunity to finish it, and to conclude so far as we are concerned, I am sure, all the appropriation bills which have been sent to us.

Mr. CHANDLER. I had hoped there would be an end somewhere to this question of interest and to these claims for moneys expended in the war of 1812. There is usually a statute of limitations somewhere. I suppose there is not a member of this body who does not know that there was, and is, no claim against the Government for the expenditures provided for in this amendment. There never was a claim at all. The States for their own protection, because perhaps the people were scared, made certain investments, called out the militia; a hay-stack would be burned in another town, and the militia would be called out; the enemy were approaching! The militia were not called out by the Government, and not one dollar of this money was expended under the direction of the Government or at the call of the Government, and when these sums were expended not a single one of these States expected ever to receive one dollar from the Government in consequence of these expenditures, and no claim was made for years by any one of these States or cities. Finally, in process of time, the city of Baltimore, the State of Maryland, the State of Massachusetts, and other States, brought in their claims and asked the Government, at its discretion and at its pleasure, to refund money that had been expended by the States for their own protection. There was no intimation made that they would even ask for interest, nor did they intend to ask for interest. In process of time those several amounts were credited to the different States; and as the Government had money in its Treasury it paid these claims from time to time, and still there was no thought of interest. That was a final settlement. No other demand was made upon the Government, and it was deemed a gratuity, and was a gratuity.

In process of time, and after a long time, the States came in and asked for interest. They said that they had paid interest, and after a long time interest was paid to States that had paid interest until it was all paid upon the claims that had been adjusted and properly presented interest at six per cent. The interest was all paid where interest had been paid by the States. On the 3d of March, 1857, the late Mr. Pearce, of Maryland, moved upon an appropriation bill just as this is that the accounts of the State of Maryland should be reopened and settled by the Secretary of the Treasury upon the principles of mercantile usage. It was a very innocent little thing. There could not seem to be any objection to that. The mouse in the meal was thoroughly covered; there was not a track on the surface; and in this hasty, inconsiderate manner that simple amendment went on, and the accounts of the State of Maryland were opened and the account for interest was reopened.

Mr. CONKLING. Was that the language of the motion?

Mr. CHANDLER. I have not got it before me; but that was the substance of it. I have not the act before me.

Mr. SUMNER. Would the Senator like to have it precisely and not draw upon his imagination?

Mr. CHANDLER. I say I only give it from recollection, for I have not looked it up.

Mr. SUMNER. The Senator's recollection is ordinarily, as we all know, very exact; but here I think it fails a little.

Mr. CHANDLER. I shall be glad to be corrected.

Mr. SUMNER. It reads:

"That the proper accounting officers of the Treasury be, and they are hereby, authorized and directed to reexamine the account between the United States and the State of Maryland as the same was from time to time adjusted under the act passed May 13, 1826, entitled 'An act authorizing the payment of interest due to the State of Maryland,' and on such reexamination to assume the sums expended by the State of Maryland for the use and benefit of the United States, and the sums refunded and repaid by the United States to the said State and the times of such payments as being correctly stated in the account as the same has heretofore been passed at the Treasury Department; but in the calculation of interest due under the act aforesaid the following rules shall be observed, to wit: interest shall be calculated up to the time of any payment made."

Mr. CHANDLER. That is it.

Mr. SUMNER. That is not all.

"To this interest the payment shall be first applied."

That is what the Senator has always done in his large business, I am sure.

"And if it exceed the interest due the balance shall be applied to diminish the principal."

Mr. CHANDLER. That is it.

Mr. SUMNER. "If the payment fall short of the interest the balance of interest shall not be added to the principal so as to produce interest."

Mr. CHANDLER. Certainly.

Mr. SUMNER. No compound interest.

Mr. CHANDLER. I was correct.

Mr. SUMNER. That is not all.

"Second. Interest shall be allowed to the State of Maryland on such sums only on which the said State either paid interest or lost interest by the transfer of an interest-bearing fund."

That is the precise rule which we ask to have applied to Massachusetts.

Mr. CHANDLER. That is it. I knew I was correct, Mr. President. I did not give the language, but I gave the idea correctly.

Well, sir, the accounts were to be reexamined and settled according to the principles of mercantile usage; that is, if a payment was made of $100,000 in 1816 and another $100,000 on the 1st of January, 1817, interest was to be counted up to the 1st of January, 1816, and then on the 1st of January, 1817, and so on, making compound interest. That is all there is to it. The accounts of the State of Maryland were reopened and settled according to the principles of mercantile usage, thus obtaining several hundred thousand dollars of compound interest. Maryland had already received every dollar of the principal and every dollar of the interest at six per cent. from the date the money was advanced where she had paid interest. This is a similar case; and therefore I wish to have the attention of the Senate while I state it fairly. This was on the 3d of March, 1857. On the 31st of May, 1858, there was another mouse found in the meal, and of a larger size:

"And be it further enacted, That the proper accounting officers of the Treasury be authorized and directed to examine the accounts between the United States and the several States which have been or may be allowed interest upon claims against the United States which have accrued during or since the war of 1812 with Great Britain, and apply in such examination the provisions and principles of the twelfth section of the act of March 3, 1837, entitled 'An act making appropriations for certain civil expenses of the Government for the year ending 30th June, 1858,' and that any money found upon such reexamination to be due any State shall be paid to such State out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated."

That was postponed. It was not adopted immediately. Congress began to suspect that there might be something larger than appeared on the surface, and gave it the go-by for that year; but in the next year, on the 26th of February, 1859, came the final struggle on compound interest. Then this clause was moved to an appropriation bill. Mark you, all this was done in the same way that these jobs are always done—brought in at an afternoon or evening on an appropriation bill.

"That all the States which have had or shall have refunded to them by the United States moneys expended by such States for military purposes during or since the war of 1812 with Great Britain, which have not already been allowed interest upon the moneys so expended, shall now be allowed interest so far as they have themselves paid or lost it; said interest to be computed by the proper accounting officers of the Treasury according to the provisions and principles directed to be applied to the case of Maryland by the twelfth section of the act of March 3, 1857, entitled 'An act making appropriations for certain civil expenses of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1858,' and that all the States which have been allowed interest upon claims against the United States, accruing during or since said war of 1812, shall be entitled to have their interest accounts reexamined and restated by the proper accounting officers of the Treasury according to the provisions and principles of the twelfth section of said act of March 3, 1857; and that those provisions and principles shall govern the computation of interest in all cases in which interest may hereafter be allowed to any of the States. Any money found to be due to any State, as directed by this section to be computed and ascertained, shall be paid to such State out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated."

Mr. SUMNER. What statute does the Senator refer to?

Mr. CHANDLER. This amendment was offered February 26, 1859.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. What committee moved the amendment?

Mr. CHANDLER. It was "on motion by Mr. Iverson, from the Committee on Claims." That proposition was adopted in this body. Information was called for; and it finally turned out that there were seventeen million some odd thousand dollars in that innocent little readjustment. Seventeen hundred thousand dollars compound interest was to go to Virginia alone.

Mr. SUMNER. It never passed.

Mr. CHANDLER. No, sir; thanks to the new States, for we combined and defeated you; and I supposed we had settled compound interest forever. It has not appeared from that day to this. Its hydra-head was smashed. [Laughter.]

Mr. CONNESS. My friend from Michigan does not mean that the Senator from Massachusetts was in combination with the "slave power" to do that at that time? [Laughter.]

Mr. CHANDLER. No, sir; but we killed compound interest, and I supposed it was dead forever. I never expected to see compound interest appear again on the face of the earth in this body; but here it is again. As I said before, all the new States then combined and voted down this question of compound interest. Every dollar of the principal and every dollar of simple interest, where interest had been paid, having already been paid, we went against this $17,000,000 for compound interest. We combined against it and killed it; and I hope the Senate will never resuscitate the remains of that monster. There, sir, is briefly the history of this whole question.

Mr. HOWARD. I had hoped that the Senate would adjourn and take a night's rest after the earnest remarks of the Senator from Massachusetts were finished; but that does not seem to be the will of the Senate, and as I have a few words to say on the subject I shall be compelled to proceed, somewhat against my will, because I should like especially to inform myself more fully and accurately respecting this claim before I undertake to say a word upon it. If it is the desire of any gentleman to move an adjournment I will yield the floor for that purpose.

Mr. TIPTON. With the permission of the Senator from Michigan, I move that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I hope not.

Mr. CONKLING. Oh, yes; there are several gentlemen who want to speak on this subject, and you might as well adjourn first as last.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. THAYER

in the chair.) The Senator from Nebraska moves that the Senate do now adjourn.

Mr. CONNESS. On that motion I call for the yeas and nays.

Mr. SHERMAN. I hope my friend from Nebraska will withdraw that motion for a moment. I desire to make a brief statement if he will withdraw it.

Mr. TIPTON. I withdraw it.

Mr. HOWARD. I believe I have the floor.

Mr. SHERMAN. If the Senator will allow me I will take but a moment.

Mr. HOWARD. I have but a word to say, and unless it is something important that the Senator desires to state I should prefer to proceed.

Mr. SHERMAN. I desire to appeal to my friend from Massachusetts to withdraw this amendment, because it is manifest that it stands in the way of the appropriation bills. I have no desire to speak against it, and never consume time beyond what I think necessary to express my views; but I am satisfied that the public good will be advanced by letting this question go over until the next session of Congress.

Mr. SUMNER. Mr. President, the Senator from Ohio has opposed this amendment in every possible form—on questions of form, on questions of order, on questions of history, on questions of finance, on everything. He has summoned from his arsenal every possible weapon against it, and now he asks to kill it by indirection. So long as I have any control over it it shall not be withdrawn. I am perfectly willing to accept the judgment of the Senate. They may vote it down if they see fit; but it is a just claim, and I insist upon having a vote of the Senate upon it.

Mr. SHERMAN. Very well; I will vote to adjourn.

Mr. HOWARD. I differ diametrically from the honorable Senator from Massachusetts as to the justice of this claim.

Mr. POMEROY. Will the Senator allow me to make a point of order?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Michigan has the floor.

Mr. POMEROY. I rise to a question of order. My point of order is under the fourth rule of the Senate, which I should like to have the Clerk read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The rule will be read.

Mr. CONNESS. Let us hear the point of order first.

Mr. POMEROY. The point of order is that no Senator can speak more than twice on the same subject on the same day. It is the fourth rule of the Senate.

Mr. HOWARD. Read the rule.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

"4. No Senator shall speak more than twice in any one debate on the same day without leave of the Senate, which question shall be decided without debate."

Mr. HOWARD. Does the Senator from Kansas assert that I have spoken even once on this subject?

Mr. POMEROY. I understood the Senator to have spoken twice during the day.

Mr. HOWARD. I have put some questions for information, but I have not addressed the Senate on this subject.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Under that statement the Senator from Michigan will proceed.

Mr. POMEROY. I withdraw the point of order if the Senator has not spoken twice. My understanding was that he had.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Michigan will proceed without interruption except by his consent.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I ask the Senator from Michigan to give way to me for one moment to make a statement.

Mr. HOWARD. I will give way for a motion to adjourn, if the Senator wishes to make it.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I will conclude what I have to say, which is but a word or two, with a motion to adjourn.

Mr. HOWARD. I will yield for that purpose.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I wish to say that it is now manifest that certain Senators here are willing to take the responsibility of defeating the ordinary appropriations for the support of the Government at the present session of Congress, and upon the heads of those who take that responsibility I think it may now properly rest. We met at eleven o'clock this morning; it is now past eleven at night; and if Senators who belong to the majority that controls the Government will insist on putting upon appropriation bills matters not pertinent to those bills, claims of this character, I think those of us who want to support the Government, and want to pass the ordinary appropriation bills to maintain the Government, will be justified, at this hour, and after this protracted session, and with this disposition manifested and avowed that it shall be persisted in, let the public service suffer as it may, in going to our homes and letting them take the responsibility. I move that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. SUMNER. Who is persisting?

Mr. CONKLING. Is debate in order?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Debate is not in order. The Senator from Illinois moves that the Senate do now adjourn.

Mr. CONNESS. I call for the yeas and nays on that motion.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The Chief Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BUCKALEW (after voting in the affirmative) said: With the permission of the Senate I desire to withdraw my vote.

Mr. CONKLING. How can the Senator withdraw his vote?

Mr. BUCKALEW. I am paired off on the subject of this amendment with my colleague, [Mr. CAMERON,] and under the circumstances I would rather not vote on the adjournment.

Mr. CONKLING. But if that be so, allow me to suggest there are other Senators here who have paired on this section and who have voted on the other side.

Mr. CONNESS. I hope the result will be announced.

Mr. CONKLING. I object with great respect to the withdrawal of the vote, because other Senators have voted under the same circumstances.

The result was announced—yeas 23, nays 24; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Buckalew, Chandler, Conkling, Drake, Fowler, Frelinghuysen, Grimes, Harlan, Hendricks, Howard, McCreery, Morgan, Osborn, Pomeroy, Ramsey, Rice, Robertson, Sherman, Stewart, Tipton, Trumbull, Whyte, and Williams—23.

NAYS—Messrs. Abbott, Cattell, Cole, Conness, Corbett, Cragin, Doolittle, Fessenden, Harris, Kellogg, McDonald, Morrill of Maine, Morrill of Vermont, Morton, Nye, Patterson of New Hampshire, Ross, Sawyer, Sprague, Sumner, Thayer, Van Winkle, Warner, and Wilson—24.

ABSENT—Messrs. Anthony, Bayard, Cameron, Davis, Dixon, Edmunds, Ferry, Henderson, Howe, Norton, Patterson of Tennessee, Pool, Saulsbury, Spencer, Vickers, Wade, Welch, Willer, and Yates—19.

So the Senate refused to adjourn.

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. President, the Senator from Massachusetts with great fervor and confidence asserts his conviction in the perfect justice of this claim, and goes so far as to assure us that although it may be defeated now it will rise up and be again presented in the future, and that Massachusetts will never abandon it; that she will persist in this claim until it is finally paid. Of course we do not know what may be found in the great womb of the future; but one thing I am quite sure is not to be found there or elsewhere, and that is the justice and legality of this claim.

I have listened with great attention to the discussion which has been had on the subject and with a sincere desire to form a correct opinion in my own mind, certainly without any prejudice toward Massachusetts or any other State, without any prejudice to the personal owner or owners of the claim, but with the single purpose to arrive at a just and fair conclusion; and after hearing the statutes all read and the arguments in favor of the claim presented with all the ingenuity of which we know the Senator from Massachusetts and others are such masters I cannot resist the conclusion that the claim is absolutely unfounded in justice and unfounded in any principle of law. If that be the character of the claim I trust the day is far distant when it will be recognized as a just claim on the part of the Congress of the United States.

I shall not go into the inquiry respecting the conduct of the Executive of the government of Massachusetts during the war, into the legality or constitutionality of the order of the Governor of that Commonwealth in refusing to allow the militia of the State to be taken out of the limits of the State. All that is past and gone, and it ought to be considered as buried in oblivion. It is sufficient for me to look upon the statute which is now before me, the act of May 14, 1836, and upon the statute making the appropriation, which was made in 1859 for the payment of the claim, to satisfy myself that the thing is paid and satisfied and that there is no part of this claim at present in legal existence. I wish to call the attention of Senators to the language of this act of 1836. It was passed as a special act with special reference to the claim or claims of Massachusetts growing out of the war of 1812. What does it say?

"That the Secretary of War in preparing his report pursuant to the resolve of the House of Representatives, agreed to on the 24th of February, 1832, be, and hereby is, authorized, without regard to existing rules and requirements, to receive such evidence as is on file and any further proofs which may be offered tending to establish the validity of the claims of Massachusetts upon the United States or any part thereof for services, disbursements,"—

Listen to the language—

"disbursements, and expenditures during the late war with Great Britain."

Now, sir, pray tell me what was the subject-matter thus submitted to the Secretary of War? What were the claims of Massachusetts mentioned in this special act? Disbursements and expenditures for services in the war of 1812. Now, sir, suppose for illustration's sake that Massachusetts had disbursed $100,000 in money for the benefit of the Government in that war. She is by this act called upon to account to the United States, and the law refers the account to the Secretary of War for settlement and adjustment. Massachusetts brings before the Secretary of War for account her claim for disbursements, for expenditures made for this purpose and that purpose and the other purpose, and she says nothing about interest upon those disbursements. I ask any lawyer, any business man, any commercial man—any man I will go so far as to say, of common sense—whether if there was supposed to be any interest due upon these disbursements and expenditures that interest did not constitute, under that statute, part and parcel of the claim of Massachusetts? The interest, if it was claimed or claimable, if it was due or demandable, in any sense legal or commercial, was just as much a part and parcel of this claim as was the principal itself; and who here can deny the accuracy of that proposition?

Mr. CONKLING. And still more, interest which she claimed to have paid out.

Mr. HOWARD. Yes, sir; then it would have been money paid out. What I say is, if she had any claim of interest it was part and parcel of the claim itself, for interest upon a sum which has been advanced is as much a part of the claim, in contemplation of law and of justice and common sense, as the principal itself. That is an undeniable proposition in law and in justice. Under this special statute relating to the claims of Massachusetts and every part thereof, in the language of the statute, Massachusetts accounted with the United States before the proper officer appointed under this statute, and that officer found a certain amount to be due to Massachusetts, to wit, the sum which was mentioned in the appropriation act of 1859, two hundred and odd thousand dollars; and the United States having thus audited these claims for disbursements, expenditures, and everything else that comes within the category of claims, the United States paid the amount thus awarded, and Massachusetts received for those claims. She was satisfied, sir. She understood that the claim, whatever it was, the claim mentioned in that statute, was paid and satisfied, and she had no other claim and no part of any other claim. The claim itself, by payment, became annihilated and extinct; and that was her understanding, because she did not make any special claim for interest at that time. She had never made any such claim before, and she never made any such claim afterward, until 1865, as we have been informed by the Senator from Massachusetts. Now a claim is brought forward here, and we are asked to pay twice the claim which existed formerly before the passage of this act. It is nothing more nor less than a demand of double payment.

Mr. President, I can agree to no such thing. If the old Bay State, famous in her history, famous in her jurisprudence, noted for her vigilance in regard to her own interests, public as well as private, had omitted for so many years to make a specific claim for interest upon these items it shows conclusively to my mind that she never intended to make such a claim, and that when she accepted the money from the Treasury of the United States she esteemed herself entirely satisfied and the claim itself paid off and settled.

Since then, for some motive or reason not known to me and not explained here, she has seen fit to assign to a railroad company the possibility which may exist in her favor of recovering interest which she never before thought of and which she had uniformly renounced and repudiated. She merely assigned her chances to a railroad corporation. It was never the act of the old Bay State to present this claim here. It was the work of some claim-monger whose ingenuity had gone so far as to discover a possibility of getting the interest upon this paid-off claim for the benefit of a railroad.

Now, sir, so far as that railroad is concerned it has my highest regard. If the railroad company would come forward here manfully and say, "We are in need of money or lands to aid us in our enterprise," I would be liberal with them; and I am not sure but that I would give them a small but a very small subsidy in bonds or guarantees. But, sir, when this claim, which has once been formally satisfied and extinguished, is presented as a just and legal claim, I say that although I do not suspect old Massachusetts of resorting to this trick upon Congress, I suspect somebody who is interested in the claim of resorting to artifice, I do not say misrepresentation, for the purpose of wringing out of the people of the United States the payment of interest money which was never due, and which was never claimed by that honest old Commonwealth. Sir, I speak in honor of the old Commonwealth of Massachusetts when I assert this; but I say that this claim has no justice and no legality in it, and it will not be recognized, even should it pass this body, as a very creditable act to the Senate of the United States, in my judgment. That is all I have to say on the question.

Mr. CONNESS. I now move that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. MORTON and others. Oh, no; let us vote.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I call for the yeas and nays on the motion to adjourn.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. SPRAGUE. I desire to state that I have paired off with the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] on this amendment, and therefore decline to vote on this motion.

Mr. WILLEY. I have paired off with the Senator from Maryland, [Mr. VICKERS,] and therefore I decline to vote on all these questions.

Mr. WILSON. I am paired off on this amendment with the Senator from Vermont, [Mr. EDMUNDS.] I am told it is not right under that pair to vote on this motion. I did not so understand it, and voted on a similar motion before; but I see that other Senators who are paired off are declining to vote, and therefore I decline also.

The result was announced—yeas 21, nays 18; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Chandler, Conkling, Conness, Drake, Fowler, Frelighuysen, Grimes, Hendricks, Howard, McCleery, Morgan, Osborn, Pomeroy, Ramsey, Rice, Robertson, Stewart, Tipton, Trumbull, Whyte, and Williams—21.

NAYS—Messrs. Abbott, Anthony, Cattell, Cole, Cragin, Fessenden, Harlan, Harris, McDonald, Morrill of Maine, Morrill of Vermont, Morton, Nye, Patterson of New Hampshire, Ross, Sawyer, Sumner, and Thayer—18.

ABSENT—Messrs. Bayard, Buckalew, Cameron, Corbett, Davis, Dixon, Doolittle, Edmunds, Ferry, Henderson, Howe, Kellogg, Norton, Patterson of Tennessee, Pool, Saulsbury, Sherman, Spencer, Sprague, Van Winkle, Vickers, Wade, Warner, Welch, Willey, Wilson, and Yates—27.

So the motion was agreed to; and the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

MONDAY, March 1, 1869.

The House met at eleven o'clock a. m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. C. B. BOYNTON.

The Journal of Saturday last was read and approved.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. This being Monday, the first business in order is the call of States and Territories, commencing with the State of Maine, for the introduction of bills and joint resolutions to be referred to their appropriate committees, not to be brought back into the House by motions to reconsider. During this call memorials and resolutions of State and territorial Legislatures are in order.

TENNESSEE AND COOSA RAILROAD.

Mr. CALLIS introduced a bill (H. R. No. 2010) granting lands in the State of Alabama to the Tennessee and Coosa Railroad Company, to aid in the construction thereof, and for other purposes; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

REMOVAL OF DISABILITIES.

Mr. HAUGHEY introduced a bill (H. R. No. 2011) to relieve Joseph H. Sloss, of Franklin county, Alabama, from all legal and political disabilities; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Reconstruction.

Mr. HAUGHEY also introduced a bill (H. R. No. 2012) to relieve Robert B. Lindsey, of Franklin county, Alabama, from all legal and political disabilities; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the same committee.

Mr. HAUGHEY also introduced a bill (H. R. No. 2013) to relieve D. M. Lindsey, of Lauderdale county, Alabama, from all legal and political disabilities; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the same committee.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. HAMLIN, one of its Clerks, informed the House that the Senate had passed without amendment a bill and joint resolutions of the House of the following titles:

A bill (H. R. No. 1758) to incorporate the Masonic Mutual Relief Association of the District of Columbia;

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 466) donating condemned cannon and muskets for the McPherson monument; and

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 469) granting the use of military equipments for the inauguration ceremonies.

The message also informed the House that the Senate had passed the bill (H. R. No. 1744) to strengthen the public credit and relating to contracts for the payment of coin, with amendments, in which he was directed to ask the concurrence of the House.

The message further announced that the Senate had passed a concurrent resolution requesting the President of the United States to transmit forthwith to the Executives of the several States of the United States copies of the article of amendment proposed by Congress to the State Legislatures to amend the Constitution of the United States, passed February 26, 1869, respecting the exercise of the elective franchise, to the end that the said States may proceed to act upon the said article of amendment; and that he request the Executive of each State that may ratify said amendment to transmit to the Secretary of State a certified copy of such ratification; in which the concurrence of the House was requested.

BRIDGES ACROSS THE OHIO RIVER.

The SPEAKER. There being no further bills for reference, the next business in order is calling the States for resolutions, commencing with the State of Illinois; where the call was arrested by the expiration of the morning hour on Monday last.

Mr. COOK. I introduce a bill which has the approval of the Committee on Roads and Canals, and upon it I demand the previous question.

The bill (H. R. No. 2014) in relation to bridges across the Ohio river was read a first and second time. The bill provides that the Secretary of War, with the approval of the President, shall appoint a board of scientific engineers; to consist of not less than five nor more than seven, who shall report to the next session of Congress the proper width of span in railroad bridges across the Ohio river adapted to the wants of navigation and commerce upon that river, and that until Congress shall by law take action upon said report no bridge shall be erected over said river unless such bridge shall have one continuous span not less than four hundred feet in width in the clear over the main channel of the river.

Mr. KERR. How does that bill get in?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. Cook] introduces the bill under the call of States, and if it gives rise to debate it will go over.

Mr. KERR. I rise to debate it.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. Cook] has demanded the previous question.

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Ohio. I would inquire if the gentleman from Illinois proposes to allow some discussion of this bill?

Mr. COOK. It is impossible at this stage of the session. It must pass under the previous question or not at all.

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Ohio. Will you allow me to say a single word about it?

Mr. COOK. Not a word. [Laughter.]

Mr. TWICHELL. I hope the bill will not pass.

The question was put upon seconding the previous question; and there were—ayes 33, noes 30; no quorum voting.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. Cook and KERR were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 78, noes 42.

So the previous question was seconded.

The main question was then ordered.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time.

Mr. KERR. I rise to a point of order. Does not this bill call for an appropriation of money?

The SPEAKER. If it did it would be too late to make the point of order, but the Chair thinks it does not.

Mr. COOK. I move the previous question on the passage of the bill.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

Mr. KERR and Mr. ECKLEY called for the yeas and nays on the passage of the bill.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 85, nays 58, not voting 79; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anderson, Delos R. Ashley, Bailey, Beaman, Bingham, Boyden, Broomall, Broomall, Buckley, Cake, Callis, Cary, Churchill, Reader W. Clarke, Sidney Clarke, Cobb, Cook, Corley, Cornell, Covode, Cullom, Dickey, Dockery, Donnelly, Eggleston, Thomas D. Eliot, Ferriss, Fields, French, Garfield, Getz, Gravelly, Griswold, Haughey, Hawkins, Higby, Hill, Holman, Hulburd, Hunter, Jenckes, Alexander H. Jones, Thomas L. Jones, Judd, Julian, Kellogg, Kelsey, Laffin, Lash, Lincoln, Loan, Marvin, McCarthy, Mercer, Moore, Moorhead, Morrell, Munger, Niblack, Orth, Perham, Pettis, Pierce, Plants, Poland, Price, Raum, Robertson, Schenck, Scofield, Shanks, Spalding, Starkweather, Stokes, Stover, Taffe, Taylor, Trowbridge, Upson, Van Aernam, Burt Van Horn, Robert T. Van Horn, Van Wyck, Ward, and William Williams—85.

NAYS—Messrs. Allison, Ames, Baker, Barnes, Barnum, Beatty, Beck, Benjamin, Blackburn, Blair, Boutwell, Brooks, Buckland, Burr, Benjamin F. Butler, Chandler, Dawes, Dixon, Eckley, Eldridge, James T. Elliott, Farnsworth, Gossbrenner, Golladay, Grover, Hooper, Hopkins, Hotchkiss, Humphrey, Kerr, Ketcham, Kitchen, Knott, Koontz, William Lawrence, Mallory, Marshall, McCormick, McKee, Morrissey, Mullins, Norris, Paine, Phelps, Pomeroy, Pruyn, Stevens, Stewart, Taber, John Trimble, Twichell, Cadwalader, C. Washburn, Henry D. Washburn, William B. Washburn, James F. Wilson, Windom, Wood, and Woodward—68.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Adams, Archer, Arnell, James M. Ashley, Axtell, Baldwin, Banks, Benton, Blaine, Boles, Bowen, Boyer, Roderick B. Butler, Clift, Coburn, Delano, Deweese, Dodge, Driggs, Edwards, Ela, Ferry, Fox, Goss, Gove, Haight, Halsey, Hamilton, Harding, Heaton, Asahel W. Hubbard, Chester D. Hubbard, Richard D. Hubbard, Ingersoll, Johnson, Kelley, George V. Lawrence, Logan, Loughridge, Lynch, Maynard, McCullough, Miller, Myers, Newcomb, Newsham, Nicholson, Nunn, O'Neill, Peters, Pike, Pile, Polsley, Prince, Randall, Robinson, Roots, Ross, Sawyer, Selye, Shellabarger, Sitgreaves, Smith, Stone, Sypher, Thomas, Tift, Lawrence S. Trimble, Van Auker, Van Trump, Vidal, Elihu B. Washburn, Welker, Whittemore, Thomas Williams, John T. Wilson, Stephen F. Wilson, Woodbridge, and Young—79.

So the bill was passed.

Mr. COOK moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

Mr. BINGHAM. On that question I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 82, nays 68, not voting 72; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anderson, Delos R. Ashley, Bailey, Boyden, Broomall, Broomall, Cake, Callis, Cary, Reader W. Clarke, Sidney Clarke, Cook, Cornell, Covode, Cullom, Dickey, Dockery, Donnelly, Eggleston, Ferriss, Fields, French, Garfield, Getz, Gossbrenner, Gravelly, Griswold, Haughey, Hawkins, Higby, Holman, Hulburd, Hunter, Jenckes, Alexander H. Jones, Thomas L. Jones, Judd, Julian, Kelsey, Lash, George V. Lawrence, Loan, Loughridge, Marvin, McCarthy, Mercer, Miller, Moore, Moorhead, Morrell, Morrissey, Niblack, Nunn, O'Neill, Orth, Perham, Peters, Pettis, Pike, Plants, Poland, Price, Raum, Ross, Schenck, Scofield, Shanks, Spalding, Stover, Sypher, Taffe, Taylor, Trowbridge, Upson, Van Aernam, Burt Van Horn, Van Wyck, Ward, Cadwalader C. Washburn, Whittemore, William Williams, and Stephen F. Wilson—82.

NAYS—Messrs. Allison, Ames, Baker, Barnum, Beaman, Beatty, Beck, Benjamin, Bingham, Blackburn, Blair, Boutwell, Brooks, Buckland, Buckley, Burr, Chandler, Cobb, Dawes, Dixon, Eckley, Edwards, Thomas D. Eliot, Ferry, Fox, Golladay, Goss, Grover, Hill, Hooper, Hotchkiss, Kellogg, Kerr, Ketcham, Kitchen, Knott, Koontz, William Lawrence, Mallory, Marshall, Maynard, McKee, Mullins, Munger, Newcomb, Newsham, Norris, Paine, Phelps, Pierce, Pomeroy, Prince, Pruyn, Robinson, Shellabarger, Stevens, Stewart, Stokes, Stone, Taber, Tift, John Trimble, Twichell, William B. Washburn, Welker, James F. Wilson, Wood, and Woodward—68.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Adams, Archer, Arnell, James M. Ashley, Axtell, Baldwin, Banks, Barnes, Benton, Blaine, Boles, Bowen, Boyer, Benjamin F. Butler, Roderick B. Butler, Churchill, Clift, Coburn, Corley, Delano, Deweese, Dodge, Driggs, Ela, Eldridge, James T. Elliott, Farnsworth, Gove, Haight, Halsey, Hamilton, Harding, Heaton, Hopkins, Asahel W. Hubbard, Chester D. Hubbard, Richard D. Hubbard, Humphrey, Ingersoll, Johnson, Kelley, Laffin, Lincoln, Logan, Lynch, McCormick, McCullough, Myers, Nicholson, Pike, Polsley, Randall, Robertson, Roots, Sawyer, Selye, Sitgreaves, Smith, Starkweather, Thomas, Lawrence S. Trimble, Van Auker, Robert T. Van Horn, Van Trump, Vidal, Elihu B. Washburn, Henry D. Washburn, Thomas Williams, John T. Wilson, Windom, Woodbridge, and Young—72.

So the motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

COMPLETION OF PACIFIC RAILROADS.

Mr. JUDD introduced a joint resolution (H. R. No. 470) in reference to a proper completion of Pacific railroads and branches; which was read a first and second time.

The question was upon ordering the joint resolution to be engrossed and read a third time.

Mr. JUDD. On that question I call for the previous question.

The resolution, which was read, provides that the President of the United States shall be authorized and required to demand and require from the Union Pacific Railroad Company and the Central Pacific Railroad Company of California and their branches bonds or other securities sufficient to guaranty the completion of said railroads and branches and bring them up to the standard fixed by the special commission which has examined and reported upon the Union Pacific railroad and its branches, and is now examining the Central Pacific railroad and its branches, applying the same standard of construction to each and requiring the same security from each; and until said commission report upon each road the issue of bonds to the road or roads not reported on shall be suspended until such report shall have been made.

On seconding the demand for the previous question, there were—ayes 50, noes 47; no quorum voting.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. JUDD and Mr. SPALDING were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes one hundred and one, noes not counted.

So the previous question was seconded.

The main question was ordered; which was upon ordering the joint resolution to be engrossed and read a third time.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. HOOPER, of Massachusetts, moved to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

INTERNATIONAL PACIFIC RAILROAD.

Mr. RAUM introduced a joint resolution (H. R. No. 471) declaring valid certain declarations of the constitutional convention of the State of Texas; which was read a first and second time.

The question being on ordering the joint resolution to be engrossed for a third reading,

Mr. RAUM demanded the previous question.

The joint resolution, which was read, proposes to declare valid the declarations of the constitutional convention of the State of Texas, passed August 10, 1868, and January 2, 1869, reincorporating the Brazos Branch Railroad Company under the corporate name of the International Pacific Railroad Company.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I hope that this resolution will be referred.

The SPEAKER. The previous question has been demanded, pending which a motion to refer is not in order.

Mr. BROOKS. Would it be in order to ask what are those declarations of the convention of Texas?

The SPEAKER. The Chair cannot answer that question.

On seconding the demand for the previous question, there were—ayes seven, noes not counted.

Mr. RAUM. I call for tellers.

Tellers were not ordered.

So the previous question was not seconded.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I move that the joint resolution be laid on the table.

The motion was agreed to.

RELICS OF GEORGE WASHINGTON.

Mr. LOGAN submitted the following resolution, on which he demanded the previous question:

Whereas there appears in the Evening Express, a paper published in this city, under date of February 26, 1869, the following:

"The Articles Taken from the Arlington House.—General Robert E. Lee made application a few days ago, through a gentleman residing in this city, to the Secretary of the Interior for a number of articles once the property of George Washington, which were taken from the Arlington House, General Lee's estate, before the war, when that place fell into the possession of the Federal Army. The articles were pieces of household furniture, clothing, dishes, and papers which formerly belonged to General Washington. Secretary Browning has decided to grant the request, and an order has been given to turn the articles over to the person deputed by General Lee to receive them."

Resolved, That the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds be directed to inquire into the subject and ascertain whether the matter so published is true, and if true to ascertain by what right the Secretary of the Interior surrenders those articles so cherished as once the property of the Father of his Country to the rebel general-in-chief; and that said committee report fully upon the subject by bill or otherwise; and that they have power in pursuing said investigation to send for persons and papers and leave to report at any time; and that the Secretary of the Interior be requested not to permit said articles to be removed until such investigation shall be had.

The previous question was seconded, there being—ayes 94, noes 28.

The question being on ordering the main question,

Mr. BROOKS called for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 133, nays 36, not voting 53; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allison, Ames, Anderson, Arnell, Delos R. Ashley, Bailey, Baker, Beaman, Beatty, Benjamin, Benton, Blackburn, Blaine, Blair, Boutwell, Broomall, Broomall, Buckland, Buckley, Benjamin F. Butler, Roderick R. Butler, Calkins, Churchill, Reader W. Clarke, Sidney Clarke, Clift, Cobb, Coburn, Cook, Corley, Cornell, Covode, Cullom, Dawes, Dickey, Dixon, Dodge, Donnelly, Driggs, Eckley, Ela, Thomas D. Eliot, James T. Elliott, Farnsworth, Ferriss, Ferry, Fields, French, Garfield, Goss, Griswold, Hamilton, Heaton, Higby, Hill, Hopkins, Chester D. Hubbard, Hulburd, Hunter, Jenckes, Alexander H. Jones, Judd, Julian, Kelsey, Kitchener, Koonz, Ladin, Lash, George V. Lawrence, William Lawrence, Lincoln, Loan, Logan, Loughbridge, Lynch, Mallory, Marvin, Maynard, McCarthy, McKee, Mercer, Miller, Moore, Moorhead, Morrill, Mullins, Myers, Newcomb, Newsham, Norris, O'Neill, Orth, Paine, Perham, Peters, Pierce, Pike, Plants, Pomeroy, Price, Prince, Raum, Roots, Sawyer, Schenck, Scofield, Shellabarger, Spalding, Starkweather, Stevens, Stewart, Stokes, Stover, Taffe, Taylor, John Trimble, Trowbridge, Twichell, Upson, Van Aernam, Burt Van Horn, Robert T. Van Horn, Van Wyck, Ward, Cadwalader C. Washburn, William B. Washburn, Welker, Thomas Williams, Whittemore, Thomas Williams, William Williams, James F. Wilson, Stephen F. Wilson, and Windom—133.

NAYS—Messrs. Adams, Barnes, Beck, Boyer, Brooks, Burr, Chanler, Eldridge, Fox, Getz, Glossbrenner, Golladay, Grover, Holman, Hotchkiss, Richard D. Hubbard, Humphrey, Johnson, Thomas L. Jones, Kerr, Knott, McCormick, McCullough, Morrissey, Mungen, Niblack, Nicholson, Pruyn, Robinson, Ross, Taber, Thomas, Tift, Van Auken, Van Trump, Wood, and Woodward—36.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Archer, James M. Ashley, Axtell, Baldwin, Banks, Barnum, Bingham, Boies-Bowen, Boyden, Cullis, Cary, Delano, Deweese, Dockery, Edwards, Eggleston, Gove, Gravely, Haight, Halsey, Harding, Haughey, Hawkins, Hooper, Asahel W. Hubbard, Ingersoll, Kelley, Kellogg, Ketcham, Marshall, McCormick, Nunn, Pettis, Phelps, Pike, Poland, Polesley, Randall, Robertson, Selye, Shanks, Sitgreaves, Smith, Stone, Sypher, Lawrence S. Trimble, Vidal, Elihu B. Washburne, Henry D. Washburn, John T. Wilson, Woodward, and Young—53.

So the main question was ordered.

Mr. BROOKS. I ask that the resolution be again read.

The resolution was again read.

Mr. WOOD. I rise to a point of order, and it is this: that this House has no right to prevent the restoration of stolen property; and these articles were stolen from the Arlington house.

Mr. LOGAN. I call the gentleman to order.

Mr. WOOD. That is my point of order.

Mr. MULLINS. I should like to ask the gentleman from New York a question.

The SPEAKER. Debate is not in order. The Chair overrules the point of order. It is a question for the judgment of the House and not for the decision of the Chair. It is laid down in the parliamentary law that the Chair shall not decide general questions of coherence.

Mr. WOOD. I have made my point of order and the country will understand it.

Mr. BROOKS. I demand the yeas and nays on the adoption of the preamble and resolution.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 120, nays 35, not voting 67; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allison, Ames, Anderson, Delos R. Ashley, Bailey, Baker, Banks, Beaman, Beatty, Benjamin, Benton, Blackburn, Boies, Boutwell, Broomall, Broomall, Buckland, Buckley, Benjamin F. Butler, Roderick R. Butler, Calkins, Churchill, Reader W. Clarke, Sidney Clarke, Clift, Coburn, Cook, Corley, Cornell, Covode, Cullom, Dawes, Dickey, Dixon, Dodge, Donnelly, Driggs, Eckley, Eggleston, Ela, Thomas D. Eliot, Ferriss, Ferry, Fields, French, Garfield, Goss, Griswold, Heaton, Hill, Hopkins, Chester D. Hubbard, Hunter, Ingersoll, Jenckes, Alexander H. Jones, Judd, Julian, Kellogg, Kelsey, Koonz, Ladin, Lash, George V. Lawrence, William Lawrence, Loan, Logan, Loughbridge, Lynch, Mallory, Marvin, Maynard, McCarthy, McKee, Mercer, Miller, Moore, Moorhead, Morrill, Mullins, Myers, Newcomb, Newsham, Norris, Nunn, O'Neill, Orth, Perham, Peters, Pettis, Plants, Pomeroy, Price, Prince, Raum, Roots, Schenck, Scofield, Shanks, Shellabarger, Starkweather, Stevens, Stewart, Stover, Taylor, John Trimble, Trowbridge, Twichell, Van Aernam, Burt Van Horn, Robert T. Van Horn, Van Wyck, Ward, Cadwalader C. Washburn, William B. Washburn, Welker, Thomas Williams, William Williams, and Stephen F. Wilson—120.

NAYS—Messrs. Adams, Archer, Barnes, Barnum, Beck, Boyer, Brooks, Chanler, Eldridge, Fox, Getz, Glossbrenner, Golladay, Grover, Holman, Richard D. Hubbard, Humphrey, Johnson, Thomas L. Jones, Kerr, Knott, McCormick, McCullough, Morrissey, Mungen, Niblack, Nicholson, Pruyn, Randall, Robinson, Taber, Tift, Van Auken, Van Trump, and Wood—35.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Arnell, James M. Ashley, Axtell, Baldwin, Bingham, Blaine, Blair, Bowen, Boyden, Burr, Cary, Cobb, Delano, Deweese, Dockery, Edwards, James T. Elliott, Farnsworth, Gove, Gravely, Haight, Halsey, Hamilton, Harding, Haughey, Hawkins, Higby, Hooper, Hotchkiss, Asahel W. Hubbard, Hulburd, Kelley, Ketcham, Kitchen, Lincoln, Marshall, Paine, Phelps, Pierce, Pike, Pile, Poland, Polesley, Robertson, Ross, Sawyer, Selye, Sitgreaves, Smith, Spalding, Stokes, Stone, Sypher, Taffe, Thomas, Lawrence S. Trimble, Upson, Vidal, Elihu B. Washburne, Henry D. Washburn, Whittemore, James F. Wilson, John T. Wilson, Windom, Woodward, Woodward, and Young—67.

So the preamble and resolution were adopted.

Mr. LOGAN moved to reconsider the vote by which the preamble and resolution were adopted; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ENROLLED JOINT RESOLUTIONS.

Mr. WILSON, of Pennsylvania, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled joint resolutions of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

Joint resolution (H. R. No. 466) donating condemned cannon and muskets for the McPherson monument; and Joint resolution (H. R. No. 469) granting the use of military equipments for the inauguration ceremonies.

SIXTEENTH AND SEVENTEENTH JOINT RULES.

Mr. SCHENCK. I rise to offer this resolution in reference to the business of the House.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved by the House of Representatives, (the Senate concurring,) That the sixteenth and seventeenth joint rules of the Senate and House be suspended during the remaining term of this Congress.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. What are those rules?

The SPEAKER. They are the rules prohibiting the sending of bills from one House to the other or to the President within the last three days of the session.

Mr. SCHENCK. I never knew a Congress when those rules were not suspended at this stage of the session.

The resolution was adopted.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. SCHENCK. Mr. Speaker, it is exceedingly important that some agreement or understanding be had in regard to attention to the public business from this time to the end of the session, now so near at hand. The appropriation bills are, of course, to be passed, if possible. There is on the Speaker's table an immense amount of business. Some of the bills are very important and some are not so important. I therefore ask unanimous consent, and if I cannot get it I will make the motion, that the House meet to-morrow at ten o'clock and proceed then to business on the Speaker's table, letting the appropriation bills run on through to-day and to-night as late as may be necessary.

Mr. PRUYN. How long a time does the gentleman propose to allow for the consideration of business on the Speaker's table?

The SPEAKER. The House can suspend the order whenever it sees fit.

Mr. ROSS. I suggest that there is to be another session of Congress immediately after this and there is no use working ourselves to death.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman object? Mr. ROSS. No, sir.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I object to the last part—proceeding to business on the Speaker's table.

The SPEAKER. There are two motions. Is there any objection to agreeing to the first motion, that the House meet to-morrow and the next day at ten o'clock?

No objection being made it was so ordered.

Mr. SCHENCK. I now ask unanimous consent that the House proceed to-morrow morning, as the first business in order after the reading of the Journal, to the consideration of business on the Speaker's table.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I object.

Mr. SCOTFIELD. Can the gentleman tell us something about the character of the bills on the Speaker's table that are deemed to be important.

Mr. SCHENCK. There are a great many of them. I cannot say definitely as to their character.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Allow me one moment to explain the reason of my objection.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that if this order shall be made it will stand in the same condition as a special order, which requires two thirds to make it, except as regards appropriation bills; but the order can be dispensed with at any time by a majority.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I desire to state that I propose, with the leave of the House, to have a vote upon the Indian appropriation bill very soon, and then if to-morrow we can get through the miscellaneous appropriation bill the other business can be taken up. As soon as we get through those bills I shall be quite willing and desirous to have the motion of the gentleman from Ohio prevail. But it is necessary that they should go the Senate very soon or we shall lose the miscellaneous appropriation bill.

Mr. SCHENCK. I desire to say that if we should make an order now to go to the Speaker's table to-morrow morning we can devote to-day and to-night as late as the House may be willing to sit, and that perhaps will obviate the necessity of laying aside the other business; and if we make the order now a majority of the House at any moment to-morrow after going to business on the Speaker's table can lay aside any particular bill or can stop proceedings under the order, so that the matter will be within the control of the majority of the House.

The SPEAKER. It is for the House to determine its order of business during the remainder of the session.

Mr. SCOTFIELD. Is there any way of ascertaining very briefly what the important business on the Speaker's table is?

The SPEAKER. There are one hundred and ten bills on the table. The Chair cannot state about their importance. Gentlemen can examine the Calendar.

Mr. MAYNARD. I suggest that as the Journal is very voluminous at this stage of the session we can save a good deal of time by dispensing with the reading of it for the remainder of the session.

Mr. SCHENCK. I withdraw for the present the proposition I have made, and move that the reading of the Journal to-morrow morning and the next morning be dispensed with. But first I ask unanimous consent to make that order.

Mr. BROOKS. I will not ask if this is in order, but have we not a constitutional right to have the Journal read?

The SPEAKER. It is read under the rules of the House. The Constitution requires a Journal to be kept, not that it shall be read; otherwise it could not be dispensed with by unanimous consent.

Mr. BROOKS. How will the House know we have a Journal if it is not read?

The SPEAKER. It is kept under the direction of the Speaker.

Mr. SCHENCK. I move to suspend the rules for the purpose of making the order.

The question was put on Mr. SCHENCK's motion; and (two thirds voting in favor thereof) the rules were suspended, and the order was made.

Mr. SCHENCK. I now renew my proposition; that at ten o'clock to-morrow morning the House shall proceed to the consideration of business upon the Speaker's table. It can be laid aside whenever a majority so determines.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I hope that will not be done until we get through with the miscellaneous appropriation bill. It is very necessary that that bill shall go to the Senate that it may be there examined, otherwise we shall lose it.

Mr. CULLOM. Does the gentleman suppose that the committee of the Senate will have time to consider the miscellaneous appropriation bill?

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. They will not have unless we pass it at once.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I demand the regular order of business.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is to vote on the pending proposition, which is undebatable. The Chair did not arrest the debate, because it was necessary that the House should understand the condition of its business.

Mr. WOOD. If the motion of the gentleman from Ohio should prevail will it be competent for a majority to alter the order of business to-morrow?

The SPEAKER. It will at any time, precisely as in the case of a special order. Whenever it is reached a majority can lay it aside. This is precisely the same. Between the consideration of any two bills on the Speaker's table a motion can be made to dispense with the further execution of the order.

Mr. CULLOM. Is the motion amendable?

The SPEAKER. A motion to suspend the rules is not amendable.

Mr. SCOTFIELD. Can I ask the gentleman from Ohio to modify his motion?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio can modify his motion before the vote is taken.

Mr. SCOTFIELD. I want him to modify his motion so as to move that only such bills shall be taken up as the Committee of Ways and Means shall state are important.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I object to that.

Mr. SCOTFIELD. A great many of the bills on the Speaker's table are not only useless, but some of them are mischievous.

Mr. SCHENCK. The House can lay aside any bill by a majority vote.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I wish to make a suggestion to the gentleman from Ohio.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman withdraw the demand for the regular order then?

Mr. FARNSWORTH. For that purpose I do. I suggest to the gentleman from Ohio that he can by a two-thirds vote take up any of these bills from the Speaker's table. We certainly cannot reach and dispose of the one hundred bills on the table between now and the adjournment. I suggest to the gentleman that he make his motion so as to cover only the particular bills which he wishes the House to consider.

Mr. SCHENCK. I do not know them all.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. The probability is that if we take up the bills in their regular order we shall not reach his bills.

Mr. COBURN. I desire to ask the Chair whether the effect of the adoption of the motion of the gentleman from Ohio will not be that we cannot go to business on the Speaker's table to-day?

The SPEAKER. The effect of the order would be to dispense with a motion to go to business on the Speaker's table to-day. That motion is privileged every day after the morning hour. There has been a morning hour to-day, but the gentleman from Ohio moves to postpone the right until to-morrow at ten o'clock, and to leave to-day to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I move to proceed to business upon the Speaker's table; and pending that motion I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union on the amendments of the Senate to the Indian appropriation bill.

Mr. SCHENCK. I believe I have the floor.

The SPEAKER. The Chair would state that the motion of the gentleman from Massachusetts would not take the gentleman from Ohio off the floor for the reason that he has moved to suspend the rules and to suspend all the rules that stand in the way of his motion, and the motion to go to the business on the Speaker's table is under the rules.

Mr. SCHENCK. I ask for a vote on my motion.

The question was put; and there were—ayes 72, noes 70.

So (two thirds not voting in favor thereof) the rules were not suspended.

PAY OF CONTESTANTS.

The SPEAKER. The House resumes the consideration of the business pending when the House took a recess on Saturday last, being a resolution offered by Mr. DAWES and modified by him at the suggestion of Mr. KERR. The resolution will be read.

The Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

Resolved, That the Clerk be, and is hereby, directed to pay, under the sanction of the Committee on Accounts, the sum of $2,500 each to Simon Jones, J. Willis Menard, and Caleb S. Hunt in full for time spent and expenses incurred in contesting the right to a seat in this House as a Representative from Louisiana.

The question was upon agreeing to the resolution.

Mr. DAWES. Upon that question I call for the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

The question was then taken; and upon a division there were—ayes 91, noes 39.

Before the result was announced,

Mr. HOLMAN and Mr. FOX called for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. DAWES. I would like to have the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] state his objection to this resolution.

The SPEAKER. No debate is now in order, pending the previous question.

The question was then taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—ayes 89, nays 66, not voting 67; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allison, Ames, Delos R. Ashley, Bailey, Banks, Beaman, Beck, Benton, Bingham, Blackburn, Blair, Boutwell, Boyden, Buckley, Cake, Cary, Churchill, Sidney Clarke, Clift, Cobb, Cullom, Dawes, Diekey, Dixon, Dodge, Donnelly, Eggleston, Thomas D. Eliot, James T. Elliott, Ferriss, Ferry, French, Garfield, Goss, Griswold, Haughey, Hawkins, Heaton, Hooper, Hopkins, Ingersoll, Alexander H. Jones, Judd, Julian, Kelsey, Kerr, Ladin, George V. Lawrence, Loan, Logan, Maynard, McCormick, Mercer, Miller, Moorhead, Morrell, Mullins, Myers, Newsham, Norris, O'Neill, Orth, Perham, Peters, Pierce, Poland, Pomeroy, Robertson, Sawyer, Selye, Shellabarger, Smith, Spalding, Stewart, Stover, Sypher, Taffe, Thomas, John Trimble, Trowbridge, Twichell, Robert T. Van Horn, Van Wyck, Cadwalader C. Washburn, Henry D. Washburn, William B. Washburn, Whittemore, James F. Wilson, and Stephen F. Wilson—89.

NAYS—Messrs. Adams, Anderson, Archer, Baker, Baldwin, Barnes, Benjamin, Bowen, Boyer, Burr, Chanler, Coburn, Corley, Cornell, Deweese, Eckley, Eldridge, Fields, Fox, Getz, Glossbrenner, Golladay, Harding, Higby, Hill, Holman, Hotchkiss, Chester D. Hubbard, Richard D. Hubbard, Hulburd, Hunter, Johnson, Thomas L. Jones, Ketcham, Kitchen, William Lawrence, Loughridge, Marvin, McCullough, Moore, Morrissey, Mungen, Newcomb, Niblack, Nicholson, Paine, Phelps, Pruyn, Ross, Schenck, Scofield, Shanks, Sitgreaves, Stevens, Stokes, Taber, Taylor, Van Auken, Van Trump, Ward, Welker, Thomas Williams, William Williams, Wood, Woodward, and Young—66.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Arnell, James M. Ashley, Axtell, Barnum, Beatty, Blaine, Boies, Bromwell, Brooks, Broomall, Buckland, Benjamin F. Butler, Roderick R. Butler, Callis, Reader W. Clarke, Cook, Covode, Delano, Dockery, Driggs, Edwards, Ela, Farnsworth, Gove, Gravely, Grover, Haight, Halsey, Hamilton, Asahel W. Hubbard, Humphrey, Jenckes, Kelley, Kellogg, Knott, Koontz, Lash, Lincoln, Lynch, Mallory, Marshall, McCarthy, McKee, Nunn, Pettis, Pike, Pile, Plants, Polesley, Price, Prince, Randall, Raum, Robinson, Rooks, Starkweather, Stone, Tift, Lawrence S. Trimble, Upson, Van Aernam, Bart Van Horn, Vidal, Elihu B. Washburne, John T. Wilson, Windom, and Woodbridge—67.

So the resolution was adopted.

Mr. DAWES moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. GORHAM, its Secretary, informed the House that the Senate had passed without amendment a bill of the House No. 1877, for the relief of the heirs and legal representatives of Charles C. Cook, deceased.

The message further announced that the Senate had passed with amendments, in which the concurrence of the House was requested, a bill of the House No. 1879, for the relief of certain companies of scouts and guides organized in Alabama.

The message further announced that the Senate had passed the following bills, in which the concurrence of the House was requested:

An act (S. No. 177) regulating the rights of property of married women in the District of Columbia; and

An act (S. No. 726) to authorize imprisonment with hard labor as a punishment in certain cases.

MRS. SUSAN A. SHELBY.

Mr. BINGHAM. I ask unanimous consent to report from the Committee of Claims a bill for the relief of Mrs. Susan A. Shelby. The committee look upon it as a meritorious claim, and the reason why I ask the consideration of the bill at this time is that the whole of her money for her cotton is in the Treasury of the United States, while all the property she has left is under execution for her debts, and advertised for sale this day.

Mr. WARD. Has the bill received the assent of the Committee of Claims?

Mr. BINGHAM. Undoubtedly it has; and there is a full report made by the committee.

Mr. WARD. Does not this involve the same question as the Sue Murphey claim?

Mr. BINGHAM. Not at all. The loyalty and good conduct of this lady is certified to by some of our own generals and many prominent citizens. I ask unanimous consent for its consideration at this time.

No objection was made.

Accordingly the bill (H. R. No. 2015) for the relief Mrs. Susan A. Shelby, of Port Gibson, Mississippi, was introduced; and read a first and second time.

The question was upon ordering the bill to be engrossed and read a third time.

The bill, which was read, directs the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to Mrs. Susan A. Shelby, of Port Gibson, in the State of Mississippi, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $5,000, in full for all claims for cotton taken, captured, or sold by the United States.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. BINGHAM moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. BINGHAM. I move that the report accompanying this bill be printed, so that it may go to the Senate with this bill.

The motion was agreed to.

PENSION BILLS.

Mr. PERHAM. The House has twice assigned an hour for the consideration of pension bills, but each time other business, appropriation bills, has supervened, and the Committee on Invalid Pensions have not yet been able to obtain the advantage intended by the assignment of this time for their business. I now ask unanimous consent that the House meet this evening at half past six instead of half past seven o'clock, and that the first hour of to-night's session be devoted to the consideration of pension business only, with the understanding that at the end of that hour the House shall proceed to the consideration of other business.

Mr. SCOTFIELD. I object, unless we can have a quorum present during the consideration of these pension bills.

Mr. PERHAM. Allow me to say that these wounded soldiers have made for us and their country much greater sacrifices than we would make by coming here this evening an hour earlier than usual for the purpose of spending that hour in the consideration of pension bills.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made.

Mr. SCOFIELD. I withdraw my objection with the understanding that we shall have a quorum here, and that business shall be suspended if there should not be a quorum.

The SPEAKER. If a division should be demanded upon any bill it could not pass in the absence of a quorum. If there be no objection the order proposed by the gentleman from Maine [Mr. PERHAM] will be made.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

INDIAN APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I propose to move that the rules be suspended to order that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union be discharged from the further consideration of the Indian appropriation bill, and that the amendments of the Senate be non-concurred in. The Committee on Appropriations have recommended non-concurrence in a few amendments; but they are mostly unimportant, though one or two are of some importance.

Mr. GARFIELD. Do the committee recommend concurrence in any of the amendments attaching appropriations to carry out these new treaties?

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Not one. I propose that all the amendments, those in which the Committee on Appropriations recommend concurrence as well as those in which they recommend non-concurrence, be non-concurred in.

I will state further that the impression upon the mind of the committee is that they may have to recommend an appropriation to feed some of these Indians not under these treaties, but at a very much less expense than the treaties propose. I move that the Committee of the Whole be discharged from the further consideration of the bill for the purpose I have indicated.

The SPEAKER. It can only be done by a suspension of the rules. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BUTLER] moves to suspend the rules for the purpose of ordering that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union be discharged from the further consideration of the Indian appropriation bill, that the amendments of the Senate be non-concurred in, and that the House ask the appointment of a committee of conference.

Mr. CLARKE, of Kansas. I hope the House will not agree to the motion.

Mr. SCOFIELD. The request for a committee of conference is not a part of the motion of the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. CLARKE, of Kansas. Is it designed to ask hereafter for a committee of conference?

Mr. SCOFIELD. We do not propose a conference unless the Senate shall ask it.

Mr. WINDOM. I hope, then, the House will not suspend the rules.

Mr. SCOFIELD. If the House non-concur in those proper amendments in which the Committee on Appropriations recommend concurrence we shall be obliged, of course, to have a committee of conference. Hence I am opposed to the motion of the gentleman from Massachusetts to non-concur in those proper amendments along with the improper ones. I think the House ought to concur in those amendments in which the Committee on Appropriations recommend concurrence and non-concur in the others. There will then be no necessity for a conference. If the Senate will not recede let the bill fail.

Mr. CLARKE, of Kansas. I hope the gentleman will modify his motion in the manner suggested by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. SCOFIELD.]

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that if the House should proceed to the consideration of the amendments any gentleman will have a right to demand that each amendment shall be read and acted on separately. There are about one hundred and seventy-five amendments.

Mr. WINDOM. I demand that the amendments shall be voted on separately.

The SPEAKER. That demand is not in order now. The pending motion is to suspend the rules for the purpose of dispensing with separate action on the amendments.

Mr. PILE. Would it not be in order to move to suspend the rules for the purpose of taking a vote on those amendments in which the Committee on Appropriations recommend concurrence and non-concurrence in all the others?

The SPEAKER. The House can suspend the rules for any purpose whatever not inconsistent with the requirements of the Constitution.

Mr. PILE. Then I suggest to the gentleman from Massachusetts that he make the motion in the form I have suggested.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I certainly am willing to submit to the judgment of the House. I will mention some of the amendments in which we recommend concurrence. One is No. 15, making an appropriation for a saw-mill for the Kiowas, Comanches, and Apaches; we, however, recommend an amendment reducing the amount from $8,000 to $7,000. Another is the amendment No. 19, appropriating $750 instead of $568 for building a dwelling-house for Tush-ewa, the Comanche chief. Another is the amendment No. 25, the Senate proposing to appropriate $8,000 instead of $5,600, the amount fixed by the House for the erection of a saw-mill for the Cheyennes and Arapahoes. In this amendment we recommend concurrence with an amendment fixing the amount at $7,000. We also recommend concurrence in the fifty-fourth amendment, making an appropriation of $15,000 for the Nisqually, Puyallup, and other tribes, to pay for insurance and transportation. Another amendment in which we recommend concurrence is the fifty-sixth, making an appropriation for the relief of the Navajoes at Fort Sumner. We also recommend concurrence in the one hundred and forty-sixth amendment, substituting "the President" for "the Secretary of the Interior." In the one hundred and seventy-fourth amendment, providing for medallions to be distributed among Indians, we recommend concurrence, with an amendment making it read "medallions of the President of the United States" instead of "medallions of U. S. Grant, President of the United States."

Mr. WINDOM. Does the gentleman from Massachusetts propose to send medallions of the President of the United States to the Indians with whom we have made treaties which it is now proposed to violate? Does he think that they will be glad to get the medallion of their Great Father under such circumstances?

Mr. ALLISON. I object to debate.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. In the one hundred and seventy-sixth amendment I move to insert after the words "in the presence of the head men of the tribe" the following: "and in the presence also of the agent and superintendent."

Mr. WINDOM. I desire to give notice that I shall demand a separate vote on each proposition.

The SPEAKER. If the rules are suspended it will suspend, as the gentleman well knows from his long service here, all rules that stand in the way of immediate action.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I move to concur in all the amendments of the Senate which I have indicated and that all the others be non-concurred in.

Mr. HOLBROOK. How many do the Committee on Appropriations recommend we shall concur in? I believe that they recommend this House shall concur in about twenty-one of the Senate amendments, and that it shall non-concur in all the remaining ones out of the one hundred and eighty that the Senate have sent us. Are gentlemen willing to vote down all those amendments without having them read or explained?

Mr. BURLEIGH. I wish to say a word.

Mr. ALLISON. I object to debate.

Mr. WINDOM. I rise to a parliamentary question. What becomes of this bill if the Senate should refuse to receive this bill under the direction of the House?

The SPEAKER. Each House has the right to concur or non-concur in amendments sent to it. If either House should non-concur in amendments of the other and refuse to refer the disagreeing votes to a committee of conference the bill would then be lost.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 68, noes 55.

Mr. KELSEY. I demand tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. KELSEY and Mr. WINDOM were appointed.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 75, noes 50.

So the rules were not suspended, two thirds not having voted in favor thereof.

CHINA.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States.

The Clerk read as follows:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

Referring to my communication to Congress of the 26th ultimo, concerning a decree made by the United States chargé d'affaires in China on 1st of June last, prohibiting steamers sailing under the flag of the United States from using or passing through the Straw Shoe channel on the Yangtze river, I now transmit a copy of a dispatch of the 22d of August last (No. 23) from S. Wells Williams, esq., and of such of the papers accompanying it as were not contained in my former communication. I also transmit a copy of the reply of the 6th instant made by the Secretary of State to the above-named dispatch.

ANDREW JOHNSON.

WASHINGTON, February 23, 1869.

The message was referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

MEXICO.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States.

The Clerk read as follows:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

I transmit to Congress a copy of a convention between the United States and the Mexican republic, providing for the adjustment of the claims of citizens of either country against the other, signed on the 4th day of July last, and the ratifications of which were exchanged on the 1st instant.

It is recommended that such legislation as may be necessary to carry this convention into effect shall receive early consideration.

ANDREW JOHNSON.

WASHINGTON, February 24, 1869.

The message was referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs, and the question of printing the document was referred to the Committee on Printing.

MISCELLANEOUS APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I move to suspend the rules to lay aside in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union the amendments of the Senate to the Indian appropriation bill in order to take up the miscellaneous appropriation bill.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 71, noes 39; no quorum voting.

The SPEAKER ordered tellers; and appointed Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts, and Mr. ROSS.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 94, noes 8.

So (two thirds having voted in favor thereof) the rules were suspended, and it was ordered accordingly.

Mr. SPALDING. I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union on the miscellaneous appropriation bill; and pending that motion I move that all general debate on that bill shall be closed in ten minutes.

Both motions were agreed to; and the House accordingly resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr.

DAWES in the chair,) and proceeded to the consideration of House bill No. 2007, making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1870, and for other purposes.

By unanimous consent the first reading of the bill was dispensed with.

Mr. BROOKS. Mr. Chairman—

Mr. SPALDING. Allow me two minutes and you may have the remaining eight.

Mr. BROOKS. I will allow you the first five minutes.

Mr. SPALDING. I desire to say to the committee that it is highly important to the interests of the country that this bill should be passed, and I think unless it is passed to-day it will fail in the Senate. It is a very important bill. It involves an appropriation of some eight million dollars, but the items are few, mainly embraced in three. One is to carry into execution the loan laws, printing bank notes and Treasury notes. That is an item of some thirteen or fourteen hundred thousand dollars. Then the whole light-house establishment is supported by appropriations in this bill, and the expenses of the revenue-cutters are also provided for here.

Now, I hope the committee will give the bill their attention and offer as few amendments as are practicable. We are willing to entertain all reasonable propositions for amendments, but the Committee on Appropriations, with an eye to economy, have exercised some liberality toward the Government, or toward the Administration that is to carry on the Government; and while we think we have not offered too much we hope we have not offered too little in this bill.

Mr. BROOKS. I have risen, Mr. Chairman, merely to call the attention of the committee once more to the enormous appropriations of the public money for the printing of the public money. I stated the other evening to a small House that the expenses of printing at the Public Printing Office had amounted since its establishment to over eleven million dollars. The bill now before us proposes to appropriate for the coming year $1,300,000 for that printing office. I am not in the majority, and I have no control over public affairs; therefore I submit no proposition. But I invoke the attention of gentlemen on the other side to the fact that this printing establishment is an enormously costly thing, far more so, I think, than it ought to be. I have not examined into the particulars, but the cost of printing the public money and bonds has been, is, and promises to be in the coming years, enormous. It is time the printing of the public money was separated from the public Treasury building. The printing office there is a nuisance, a nuisance to all the officers and employés in that Department, and unless it is separated therefrom and those who have charge of the disbursements necessary therefor are held to a strict responsibility or it is given out by contract there is no probability whatsoever that there will be any decrease in the expenses. Nor is there any certainty in my mind that the public money can be safely printed hereafter as it has been done heretofore. As we approach that desirable era, though far, far in the distance, when a dollar again may once more mean a dollar, when the golden eagle may once more jingle in our pockets and be visible to the public eye, I trust the attention of Congress, and more especially of the Committee on Appropriations, will be directed to an entire reform in this bureau, which within six years has grown up to be one of the most expensive bureaus of this Government.

The Clerk proceeded to read the bill by paragraphs for amendment, and read the following:

In the Treasurer's office:

For four clerks, at $1,800 each, $7,200; fourteen clerks, at $1,600 each, $22,400; eleven clerks, at $1,400 each, $15,400; ten clerks, at $1,200 each, $12,000; three messengers, at $840 each, $2,520; six laborers, at $720 each, $4,320; four laborers, at $432 each, $1,728; fifty female clerks, at $900 each, $45,000; contingent expenses, $1,000; in all, $111,588.

Mr. HOLMAN. I notice the Committee on Appropriations in reporting this bill have overlooked a change which the House has made in relation to the pay of female clerks. I therefore move to strike out "$900" as the pay of female clerks and to insert "$1,200;" and also to increase the aggregate from "$45,000" to "$60,000."

Mr. SPALDING. I wish the committee to understand that these appropriations upon which we are now acting have heretofore been made in gross; that is, we have appropriated a million and a half or two million dollars, as the case might be, to cover all the expenses of the loan department and the printing department. But our chairman, [Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois,] who, I regret to say, is kept away by sickness, feeling as if economy might be introduced into this branch of the Government, visited in person the Treasury Department and ascertained what kind of employés of the several descriptions were necessary in order to carry out this object, and after his interview with persons who are skilled in this matter in the Department made out these estimates.

Now, I am informed that some of these females are very young misses who receive only two, three, and four hundred dollars each; little girls who carry papers and notes and bills from one room to another, and their pay is graduated according to the importance of their work, some of them getting as high as $900, some $720, some $500, and some perhaps $250. Now, really I do not know where to make the discrimination here. If the chairman of the committee were present he could tell where it occurs; but I think it safe for us to adopt the schedule as he has presented it. I know he does not put the salary of any female clerk above $900, and I hope the committee will evince no disposition in this printing department to put them above $900. I do not say that these females are not of as good character as any of the females employed in other bureaus; I will not say that, but I do say that they are well paid with the compensation as it stands in this bill.

The amendment offered by Mr. HOLMAN was rejected.

The Clerk read the following paragraph:

In the Register's office:

For five clerks, at $2,500 each, $12,500; fourteen clerks, at $1,800 each, $25,200; nine clerks, at $1,600 each, $14,400; one clerk at $1,200; five messengers, at $840 each, $4,200; four laborers, at $720 each, $2,880; one hundred and forty female clerks, at $900 each, $126,000; for contingent expenses, $1,000; in all, $184,880.

Mr. HOLMAN. I move to amend the paragraph by striking out in line fifty-two the word "nine" and inserting "twelve," so as to make the salary of the one hundred and forty female clerks $1,200 each. I have made this motion for the purpose of ascertaining, if I can, the reason for distinguishing between these female clerks and those provided for in the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill. The Committee on Appropriations agreed that if it was deemed expedient by the House to put the female clerks on the same footing as to the lowest class of male clerks, $1,200, that principle should be carried out in all the provisions of that bill. Now, if the gentleman from Ohio, who has charge of this bill, is able to say that the one hundred and forty female clerks authorized to be employed in the Register's office are to perform different labors from those enumerated in the other bill, then I will not press this motion. But, on the other hand, if they stand upon the same footing and discharge the same class of duties, I think the principle which has been already adopted should be carried out here. There is no reason for the discrimination apparent on the face of the bill, and the House has already expressed its determination to do away with this ungallant and almost unaccountable discrimination that is made. If these female clerks are to perform the same amount of labor they ought to get the same pay. It is a mere question of even-handed justice. Unless the gentleman from Ohio will say that the service to be performed by these one hundred and forty female clerks in the Register's office is different from the service required of clerks in other bureaus, then I insist that the House is already committed to the adoption of the principle of fixing their compensation at the same that is paid to male clerks of the same class. I know the gentleman from Ohio, with his sense of justice, will not consent that for the same labor these women shall receive a smaller compensation than is paid to men.

Mr. SPALDING. I understood the amendment offered by the gentleman the other day to the legislative, &c., appropriation bill to relate to the clerks in the office of the Treasurer of the United States, and that officer, I think, at one time recommended that where his female clerks performed the same duties as his first-class male clerks they should have the same pay. That did not seem to me so objectionable. But with respect to this class of clerks with whom we are now dealing we have no request of that sort from the head of the bureau, or from any quarter. We do not know that the female clerks themselves are at all dissatisfied with the pay we allow them, $900 a year, and we are paying some men in this same Printing Bureau much less than we pay these female clerks. I think $900 is enough.

The question was put on Mr. HOLMAN's amendment; and there were—ayes 20, noes 52; no quorum voting.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. SPALDING and Mr. HOLMAN were appointed.

The committee divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 42, noes 71.

So the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

In the First Comptroller's office:

For three clerks, at $1,400 each, $4,200; eight female clerks, at $900 each, $7,200; in all, $11,400.

Mr. BARNES. I move to amend the clause relating to female clerks by striking out "$900" and inserting "$1,200."

Mr. Chairman, the question of rewarding female labor employed by the Government of the United States has frequently been referred to in the discussions upon appropriation bills at this session and at previous sessions. The Government of the United States stands in a different position with reference to labor and rewarding its employés from that occupied by a commercial or manufacturing establishment employing labor. A commercial house or a manufacturing establishment employing labor is compelled to look upon the price paid for that labor as a part of the cost of the article which it buys or which it manufactures for sale. And they are compelled to hire that labor in the cheapest market in order to sell in competition with other manufacturers conducting the same business.

The Government of the United States is in an entirely different position. It is not compelled to look at the wages of its employés in the light of competition, because it has no competition. It can reward its employés in a just and a fair manner. When we look at the amount of labor and the character of the labor to be performed by these employés here sought to be provided for we find that it is as well done by the women of the country as it can be done by the men. And we have the authority of the the Secretary of the Treasury that in many of the bureaus under him the labor has been done better by the female employés than it has been done by the male employés. Therefore I say this is simply a question of justice, not only to the individuals directly concerned, but to others. And it is necessary to have this indorsement by the Government in order to call the attention of the country to this large class of helpless and needy individuals. The avenues to female labor in this country are so much restricted that the greatest amount of suffering prevails among the classes who are dependent upon their own resources for a livelihood. A recent advertisement in the city where I reside, asking for one employé, at a compensation of $4 50 per week, was answered by five hundred and forty applicants. I submit to the intelligence and fairness of gentlemen upon this floor that there can be no occasion for them to reject my amendment.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. SPALDING. We have twice taken the sense of the Committee of the Whole on this very subject; and as I am not to be hereafter a candidate for either Congress or matrimony, [laughter] I shall say nothing further on the subject.

The amendment of Mr. BARNES was not agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

For carrying out the provisions of the acts of August 30, 1852, for the better protection of the lives of passengers on vessels propelled in whole or in part by steam, and of the acts amendatory thereof, the following sums, to-wit: for the salaries of the supervising and local inspectors, $76,800; for the traveling expenses of the supervising inspectors, $10,000; for the traveling expenses of the local inspectors, $15,000; Provided, That whenever the public interest requires it any local inspector may be allowed for travel in any one year a sum not exceeding $700; for the salary and traveling expenses of a special agent of the Department, $3,600; for the expenses of the meeting of the board of supervising inspectors, including travel and necessary incidental expenses, printing of manual and report, $4,000; for stationery, for furniture of offices and repair thereof, for repair and transportation of instruments, and for fuel and lights, $15,000.

Mr. SPALDING. The paragraph following this is headed "Miscellaneous." I move that that heading be transferred to just preceding the paragraph last read.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. PRICE. I move to insert after the paragraph last read the following:

For continuing the work, according to existing law, on the rapids of the Mississippi river, known as the Rock Island rapids, $150,000.

Mr. SPALDING. I hope my friend from Iowa [Mr. PRICE] will withdraw his amendment for the present; he will have an opportunity to make it in another part of the bill.

Mr. PRICE. This is a very good place for my amendment. I offer it to come in after a paragraph which begins—

For carrying out the provisions of the acts of August 30, 1852, for the better protection of the lives of passengers on vessels propelled in whole or in part by steam, and of the acts amendatory thereof, the following sums, &c.

It will be remembered that a year ago an appropriation was made by this House for the improvement of these rapids. The bill making that appropriation went to the Senate, where it still lies unacted upon.

There are five bars or chains of rocks across these rapids within a distance of sixteen miles. Three of those chains have been taken out by the appropriations made by Congress within the last two years; two of them still remain to be taken out. The parties who are there taking out these rocks have their machinery and appliances on the spot. I need not say to the Committee of the Whole that if we do not continue the work now while the tools, machinery, and appliances are there, but these contractors are compelled to abandon the work, it will require additional expense to the Government to get the same tools, the same machinery, the same appliances on the ground in order to get at the work on a future day.

In addition to that, it must be very plain to any gentleman who will give the subject a moment's consideration that although three of these chains of rocks have been taken out a boat cannot be taken over the rapids until the other two chains of rocks are taken out. Therefore the expenditure up to this time does not avail the commerce of the country anything until the other two chains are removed. The Committee on Commerce at this session have not reported; they have not had an opportunity to report. Consequently no appropriation could come before the House in the river and harbor bill, no such bill having been reported. Hence I offer this amendment to the miscellaneous appropriation bill that the work on these rapids may not cease.

Mr. SPALDING. Mr. Chairman, I should be very glad to see my friend from Iowa [Mr. PRICE] accommodated in this respect by an appropriation of $150,000 to improve the rapids of the Mississippi river. But, sir, this is not a river and harbor bill; and if we commence with one appropriation of this kind it will be followed by the offering of every river and harbor appropriation that was contained in the bill we sent to the Senate some time ago. We here are not responsible for the failure of the Senate to act on that bill. I hope we shall not commence putting appropriations of this character in the miscellaneous bill, which is designed to contain only such items as are necessary to carry on the wheels of Government.

Mr. PRICE. I desire to say that, according to my recollection, the bill which was sent to the Senate contained no other appropriation resting upon the same ground as this.

Mr. SPALDING. I will say to the gentleman that I have just received information that the bill which we sent to the Senate has been amended there by inserting this very appropriation, and will probably pass the Senate.

On agreeing to the amendment, there were—ayes 8, noes 52; no quorum voting.

Mr. PRICE. I must insist on tellers, for I am satisfied that if this amendment were properly understood it would be adopted.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. PRICE and Mr. SPALDING were appointed.

The committee divided; and the tellers reported—ayes thirty, noes not counted.

So the amendment was not agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

For supplying deficiency in the fund for the relief of sick and disabled seamen, $100,000.

Mr. BENJAMIN. I move to amend by striking out the paragraph just read.

Mr. Chairman, it will be recollected that in the deficiency bill passed here last Friday there was an item of $50,000 to supply a deficiency in this same fund. I suppose there must be a mistake in inserting this item in this bill.

Mr. SPALDING. I will state for the information of my friend from Missouri [Mr. BENJAMIN] that the Department asked for $200,000 for this purpose for the next fiscal year. The committee cut down the amount to $100,000. We could not do any less. These sailors pay every month their hospital money into the Treasury to be taken care of for this very purpose. In these expenditures we only return to them their own money.

Mr. BENJAMIN. Do I understand the gentleman to say that this appropriation is for the next fiscal year?

Mr. SPALDING. Yes, sir.

Mr. BENJAMIN. Then why is it called a deficiency?

Mr. SPALDING. We did not appropriate a sufficient amount last year; and in the deficiency bill we made an appropriation for the present fiscal year. This appropriation is for the fiscal year beginning next July.

Mr. BENJAMIN. Then you ought to strike out the word "deficiency."

The amendment was not agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

For the construction of four steam revenue-cutters, namely, one for Alaska; one for Columbia river, Oregon; one for Mobile, Alabama, and one for Charleston, South Carolina, $300,000; Provided, That said cutters shall not cost more than the sum hereby appropriated: And provided further, That the Secretary of the Navy be authorized to transfer the revenue-cutter S. P. Chase from the great lakes to Boston, Massachusetts.

Mr. HULBURD. I raise the point of order that the last proviso of the paragraph just read is out of order because it proposes new legislation.

Mr. SPALDING. I do not question the right of the gentleman from New York [Mr. HULBURD] to raise the point of order; but I beg that he will hear me first. This cutter S. P. Chase—

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order on the ground that the proviso proposes independent legislation.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I move to amend by striking out the paragraph. I do not know whether this motion ought to prevail, but I make it for the purpose of getting information. Has not the Government enough vessels of one kind or another not in use to supply the place of these revenue-cutters? Is it necessary that we should build three more revenue-cutters for this service?

Mr. SPALDING. The chairman of the Committee on Commerce [Mr. ELIOT, of Massachusetts] can explain this matter to the satisfaction of the gentleman. I think that these cutters are imperatively necessary to prevent smuggling on those coasts; and the Secretary of the Treasury assures us that these cutters will save annually four times the cost of their construction. I ask the chairman of the Committee on Commerce to tell what he knows about it.

Mr. ELIOT, of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, in reply to the inquiry of the gentleman from Illinois, I have to say that the Committee on Commerce, under the instruction of the House, had this matter in charge, and they gave to it a good deal of consideration. When I had the honor to take charge, of the business of the committee as chairman I found several memorials and requests from the Treasury Department calling the attention of the committee to the importance of having these steamers built. Last year the Secretary of the Treasury did all he could to induce Congress to make the appropriation at that time. No action was taken then; and it has been found since then that there has been in point of fact no power within the control of the Secretary of the Treasury to perform the duties which the law imposed upon him, because Congress has withheld from him the steamers absolutely necessary for the performance of the duties required. There was not any of the naval vessels of a suitable character and description for the purpose wanted either on the coast of Alaska, the Pacific coast, or in the waters of the Gulf States. There are two side-wheel steamers wanted at the South and two propeller steamers wanted at the North; and I take it upon myself to say, from the information I have from the Department, that it will be utterly out of the power of the incoming Secretary of the Treasury, as it has been out of the power of the outgoing Secretary of the Treasury, to fulfill his duties in that regard unless this appropriation is made.

I was inclined to urge that the amount called for might be reduced, and went personally to the Treasury Department for the purpose of having that investigated. I examined the estimates and found that the amount asked for was the lowest sum for which these vessel could be constructed.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Wisconsin. Are there not revenue-cutters on the lakes which will answer for that purpose?

Mr. ELIOT, of Massachusetts. There is but one steamer which can be brought out at all, as I understand. There are some on the lakes out of commission, and something ought to be done in reference to them. As I understand, excepting the steamer S. P. Chase, which is the subject of the proviso, there are none of these steamers which can be taken for that purpose.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. FARNSWORTH's amendment was rejected.

Mr. PAINE. If it be in order after the vote just taken I move to strike out the first three words, "one for Alaska."

Mr. MAYNARD. I ask the gentleman from Massachusetts, who knows these things much better than I do, whether there are not vessels in the Navy which can be used for that purpose without this expense?

Mr. ELIOT, of Massachusetts. From the best information I have there is not one that can be used for that purpose.

Mr. GARFIELD. I wish to inquire in that case whether we did not last year, when this bill was under consideration, vote to lay up three or four revenue-cutters that we did not need in the service?

Mr. ELIOT, of Massachusetts. I will explain that matter. The revenue-cutters to which allusion has been made by the gentleman from Ohio were never constructed for the lakes at the instance either of the Committee of Commerce of this House or of the Treasury Department. They were originally built because of a clause in the appropriation bill inserted in the Senate, as I recollect, at the instance of one of the Senators from Ohio. These steamers were built; and they are perhaps as admirable vessels as any which can be made to float on the water, but it was found for the purpose of the revenue service, at least so the House decided, they were not wanted upon the lakes at the instance, I believe, of the gentleman from New York [Mr. CHURCHILL] last year. They were put out of commission, and are now upon the lakes. They are not of value, and cannot be put in service in the Gulf or upon the Pacific coast, because they cannot be got out of the lakes, as they were built there and there they must remain.

Mr. GARFIELD. How do you mean to get the S. P. Chase out?

Mr. ELIOT, of Massachusetts. That is a small vessel.

Mr. CHURCHILL. It is of the same tonnage precisely as the others.

Mr. PIKE. These six steamers for the lakes we all understood at the time were to form a kind of fleet of which Assistant Secretary Harrington was to be the commodore. They were steam-vessels, and were intended to increase our force upon the lakes without violating the treaty of 1818, which allowed us to keep only one armed vessel on the lakes. It was a sort of beating the devil around the stump. Now, there is still remaining in the Navy a large class of vessels of five hundred tons and upwards, and I do not know why some of them could not be fitted for this service. It is well known that the English system is to use the naval vessels almost entirely. We have a large number of double-enders of a thousand tons, and they would be capital vessels for that purpose if they are not too large. We have another class of side-wheel double-enders of five hundred tons, the others being propellers, some of which might be selected to answer the purpose. Then there are intermediate vessels that might possibly be suitable. It has seemed to me for a long time that this revenue-cutter system as now organized is entirely wrong, and that it should be attached, together with the coast survey and light-house system, to the Navy Department and be under the conduct of naval officers.

Mr. PILE. I move to strike out the last two words, and I yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. PAINE. Mr. Chairman, I have no objection to constructing a revenue-cutter for the service in Oregon if that shall be necessary, nor to constructing one for Alabama and for South Carolina, if we have not, as my friend seems to think we have, in the service already vessels that will answer the purpose. But I do object to constructing one for the service in Alaska. The amount of appropriation for that revenue-cutter is $75,000. I shall oppose all appropriations for service of that kind or any other kind in Alaska. I am opposed to investing $75,000 in a revenue-cutter for that purpose. I desire to have the Treasury Department to employ such vessels as can be found in the service now, and if none can be found I am inclined to leave them without any service in Alaska.

Mr. SPALDING. I ask to have read the letter which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, January 5, 1869.

SIR: In respect to the steam revenue vessels required at Mobile, Charleston, Puget sound, and Alaska, as stated in communications from this Department to the House of Representatives, dated January 23 and April 23, 1868, to which reference is made in your letter of the 4th instant, I have the honor to reply to your inquiries that the necessity for the vessels is still more urgent than at the time of my first communication, and that the estimates then given of the cost of construction, &c., cannot, I am satisfied, be reduced.

For Charleston and Mobile it is contemplated to build side-wheel steamers of light draft that can follow smugglers into the shallow inlets abounding on those coasts, into which the vessels we have been hitherto to employ in that region have been unable to enter. The Department has reason to believe that the absence of vessels of this description has been taken advantage of by smugglers to a very considerable extent.

On the Pacific coast it is hardly necessary to do more than call attention to the present obvious inadequacy of the revenue marine to meet the requirements of the service along so extensive a coast, particularly since the addition of Alaska, for which it has been necessary to withdraw two vessels from former stations in California and Washington Territory.

On the whole Pacific coast there are at present but four revenue vessels, two steamers and two sailing vessels, of which one of the latter is old and unfit for service.

I regard the early construction of these additional vessels as of the highest importance, and take the liberty to inclose a draft of a bill adapted to enable the Department to accomplish it, to which I earnestly request favorable attention.

I am, sir, very respectfully,

H. McCULLOCH,

Secretary of the Treasury.

Hon. T. D. ELIOT, Chairman of the Committee on Commerce, House of Representatives.

Mr. PILE. I withdraw the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. MAYNARD. I renew it for the purpose of inquiring of the gentleman from Maine [Mr. PIKE] whether we have already vessels that will answer the purpose which is expected to be accomplished by these revenue-cutters. If we have we ought to apply them in that direction; if not, I agree that we ought to build them. It is necessary, of course, to be prepared to follow smugglers everywhere, but I understand we have already many small steamers of light draft that may be used for this purpose. I am not, however, sufficiently acquainted with the subject to know whether they can be used, and therefore I ask for information.

Mr. PIKE. I suppose that Alaska ought to have a vessel to shed rain. That, I suppose, would be quite important, but I do not know what peculiar quality may be necessary for the northwest coast. I only know there is a variety of small and large vessels in the Navy not now in commission, being laid up. I do not suppose it will be necessary to use iron-clads for the purpose. There are light-draft and heavy-draft vessels, some of them side-wheels and some propellers. I am not a professional man, and not being a professional man in this matter I should suppose that a selection might be made from some of these vessels which would answer this purpose. As I said just now, it does seem to me that this whole system needs remodeling, and instead of building another vessel to add to the forty or fifty of this fleet of custom-house vessels it does seem to me that it will be proper for the new Congress to remodel the system and transfer the whole of it to the Navy Department, as is now done in England with great efficiency.

Mr. MAYNARD. I withdraw the amendment to the amendment.

The question recurred on Mr. PAINE's motion to strike out the words "one for Alaska."

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I move to strike out the paragraph and to insert in lieu thereof the following:

The Secretary of the Navy shall transfer to the Secretary of the Treasury for the revenue service any number of vessels suited to the said service, not exceeding four, one for Alaska, one for Columbia river, Oregon, one for Mobile, Alabama, and one for Charleston, South Carolina.

Mr. SPALDING. I make a point of order on that. The committee has once refused to strike out the whole paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. The committee refused to strike out, but the amendment is to strike out and insert. The amendment of the gentleman from Wisconsin must first be voted on.

Mr. PAINE. In order to give the gentleman from Illinois an opportunity to have a vote on his amendment, I withdraw mine.

Mr. WOOD. I make the point of order on the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FARNSWORTH] that it is independent legislation and is not in order on an appropriation bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. For what reason?

The CHAIRMAN. On the ground that the amendment is independent legislation.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. It certainly is germane to the paragraph and germane to the proviso to the paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. The objection is not that it is not germane, but that it proposes independent legislation. The Chair sustains that point of order.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I renew the amendment of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. PAINE] to strike out the words "one for Alaska." It seems from what has been said here by the chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs and the chairman of the Committee on Commerce that there is at least very grave doubt whether we have not in the naval service a great number of vessels suited to this purpose, and which could just as well be transferred to the Treasury Department as not. That being the case, I ask the committee what propriety there is for us to be selling with one hand and building with the other, laying up vessels in ordinary at the various navy-yards while we are building revenue-cutters for the revenue service? It seems to me that without more light upon the subject we ought not to appropriate money for the building of any more of these revenue-cutters. If anything is to be done, let us by some proper provision of law, where it may be in order, provide for the transfer of such naval vessels as may be suited to the service to the Treasury Department for this purpose.

Mr. ELIOT, of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, I wish to call the attention of the committee to the question before the committee. It is on the motion of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FARNSWORTH] to strike out the words "one for Alaska." The argument of the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. PIKE], the chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs, would go to show that the whole system in regard to our revenue-cutters is wrong, and that it ought to be revised and the whole matter placed under the care of the Navy. I want to say that that cannot be done now. It is utterly out of the question for this Congress to do it. The gentleman from Maine has been at the head of the Committee on Naval Affairs for many years, and yet we have had no proposition in the shape of a bill brought into the House on the recommendation of that committee to reorganize in the way that he now thinks would be desirable this revenue-cutter system. But it is impossible that we can at this late day of the session accomplish what the gentleman from Maine [Mr. PIKE] thinks ought to be done, because we have not time.

Now, in regard to the boat for Alaska, I undertake to say that unless this Congress desires that there shall be smuggling indefinitely along that coast, and unless they desire that the Secretary of the Treasury shall by law have imposed upon him a duty the power to perform which we take from him, then we must pass this appropriation. Because, I say to the gentlemen of this committee that there is no power now in the hands of the Secretary of the Treasury to enforce the law without this legislation. How would the members of this House undertake to have the laws enforced? It is conceded by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MAYNARD] that there ought to be a steamer there. I say that there is none within the control of the Treasury now. And I go further than that, and say that there is not in the Navy of the United States at this moment such a steamer as is wanted by the revenue service on that coast.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. The next Congress convenes on the 4th of this month. Does not the gentleman believe that that Congress can pass a bill for the transfer of these vessels sooner than these four vessels can be constructed?

Mr. ELIOT, of Massachusetts. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FARNSWORTH] can answer that question as well as I can; just as well. I know that for more than a year past the Secretary of the Treasury has had his hands tied and has had his power crippled because of the want of such a steamer as this.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I move to amend the amendment by striking out the word "Alaska." I only desire that members may understand exactly the position of this matter as it appeared to the Committee on Appropriations, and then I will submit the whole matter to the good judgment of the House. In the first place, it will not do for gentlemen to get up here and say that there are vessels in the Navy fit for service on this coast of Alaska, for there are none now actually in commission. Double-enders will not do; it will not do to take light-draft vessels for this purpose. These steamers must be sea-going, strong, and made perfect in all their parts, in order to carry out one of their important duties, that of going to the rescue of distressed and shipwrecked vessels.

In regard to the vessels in the Navy, I desire to say that all the vessels of this description that were in the Navy were merchant vessels, bought at the time they were so imperatively needed during the rebellion, and some few that were constructed in great haste. But none of them are now fit for this duty, and some of them, if put up at auction to-day, would not fetch the price of old iron. I have no greater love for Alaska than the rest of mankind. But we have Alaska on our hands; we must sustain our custom-houses there. If we have no protection to the revenue on that coast all that the people interested in the trade with China and Japan will have to do will be simply to smuggle the tea and silks into Alaska, when they will become subject to the coast-trade regulations, and in that way the whole of the United States may be supplied without the revenue receiving any benefit therefrom.

I believe, on the examination we have made, that these vessels are necessary. Now, to say "Do something else" is simply to say "do nothing." Gentlemen remain on committees here all during Congress and make no proposition to do anything. Then the moment the Committee on Appropriations undertake to make an appropriation for the purpose they get up and say, "O, let us have this great reform done first," or "We will reform this, that, or the other;" "We will have a new system of marines;" or "We will have a new system of the Navy;" or "We will abolish the light-house boards," or something of that kind. They are ready to do all things, but they never think of them except when they are opposing the amendments of the Committee on Appropriations.

[Here the hammer fell.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I withdraw the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. WOOD. I renew the amendment. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman who has just addressed the committee has taken, I think, the practical, common-sense view of this question. There is a very great distinction between vessels employed by the Treasury Department for service along our coasts in protecting the revenue and vessels constructed for the regular naval service. It is totally impracticable to use naval vessels for any such purpose as that here contemplated. Their draught of water is too great; they cannot run along the coast and into the inlets and bayous, and thus prevent or detect smuggling. Hence the proposition to substitute naval vessels for revenue-cutters is simply a proposition to refuse any provision whatever for this object. Now, sir, we have acquired Alaska. While I was opposed to that acquisition; while I believe it will never compensate the Government for one tenth of the amount that it cost, yet we have that territory and must put it to the best possible use. Its geographical position is such as to make it a commercial entrepot, by means of which, under a proper revenue system, there will be brought into the Treasury millions of dollars which will be lost if a suitable revenue service be not maintained.

Mr. PIKE. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BUTLER] suggests that the proposition now advocated by those who oppose this appropriation might have been brought in before; and so it might. In introducing propositions of this sort there is a kind of divided honor between the Committee on Commerce and the Committee on Naval Affairs. The latter being disposed to defer to the Committee on Commerce has never brought in the proposition, and consequently does not feel itself involved in this imputation of neglect. But there is another reason, which is that none of these propositions are ever made without the aid of a Department. Now, during the last two or three years we have had, as gentlemen no doubt are aware, an exceedingly bad time for the introduction of reforms; but we shall have in the future a very excellent time for bringing forward measures of reform. This appropriation, whatever may be its amount, cannot take effect until the 1st day of next July. Now, between this time and that a session of Congress will intervene, and then we shall have a very suitable period for the introduction of these reforms. We shall then have a new Secretary of the Navy, and gentlemen, when a proposition of this kind is introduced, cannot say, "We have not a properly efficient man at the head of the Navy Department." We shall then have a proper and competent man in that position, and hence that will be a suitable time to say, "Having an efficient officer at the head of the Department we will extend its operations." Consequently, if this matter should be properly investigated, and undoubtedly the incoming Congress will attend to all its duties at the proper time, that Congress meeting next Thursday will, doubtless, before it adjourns take this matter into consideration. The proper business will be assigned to the Navy Department; the vessels now laid up in ordinary at our navy-yards will be set to work watching for smugglers; the unemployed naval force, of which there is now great abundance, will be used for the detection of smugglers in all quarters. The consequence will be that on the coast of Alaska, and on the Pacific as well as on the Gulf—for I see that this proposition makes provision for all these—there will be stationed suitable vessels with expert officers, who will not only act as a detective force in taking care of the revenues of the country, but will also protect its honor in time of war. [Here the hammer fell.] I withdraw my amendment to the amendment.

The amendment of Mr. FARNSWORTH was not agreed to, there being—ayes twenty-one, noes not counted.

The Clerk read as follows:

To defray the expense of a preliminary survey of the site for the proposed navy-yard at League Island, $2,000.

Mr. O'NEILL. I move to amend the paragraph just read by striking out "$2,000" and inserting "5,000." Mr. Chairman, it will be recollected by many members that in the Thirty-Ninth Congress an act was passed accepting from the city of Philadelphia the gift of League Island, a tract of land embracing some six hundred acres fronting on the river Delaware, upon which to erect a navy-yard. In accordance with one of the provisions of that act a narrow strip of land on the opposite bank of what is called the back channel was also to be presented by the city to the Government. The city authorities acquired by purchase from different owners the title to this strip of land and conveyed it by deed with the island to the United States, and thus vested the whole of this valuable property in the Government. It is valued at $500,000 at least.

Preliminary to constructing docks, basins, workshops, and other buildings required to make this an unsurpassed navy-yard it will be necessary to have surveys of the land upon which to base such plans as will eventually and when carried out give the Government all the conveniences demanded by naval architecture for the present and future time. The Secretary of the Navy has asked for an appropriation of $10,000 for this purpose. The Committee on Appropriations, however, reports but $2,000. This amount is too small for the work contemplated, hence my amendment, although I should prefer $10,000, and it seems to me to be so obviously just that we should increase it to at least $5,000 that it is scarcely necessary to detain the Committee of the Whole by any arguments on the subject. The title conveyed it by deed to the United States, and this valuable property is now vested in the Government, preliminary to constructing docks, basins, workshops, and other buildings necessary to make a navy-yard such as is required.

Mr. Chairman, this great navy-yard, which is to be built at League Island, and which for the sake of the country and for the sake of the Navy ought to be commenced as soon as possible, must be preceded as a preliminary step by proper surveys, and then its construction will go on in regular order and according to proper plans. The Secretary of the Navy has recommended that provision should be made at once for the surveys, so that there may be no delay in carrying to completion at no distant day a navy-yard much needed. My amendment only proposes $5,000. It is the very lowest amount with which the Navy Department can get along, and it is absolutely necessary for the beginning of the preparations for a naval station at this, the fittest place in the country, if not in the world. I hope that it will be adopted.

Mr. MAYNARD. This is mere earnest money, and we might as well reduce it to $1,000.

Mr. O'NEILL. I withdraw my amendment in order that my colleague may renew it.

Mr. MYERS. I renew the amendment. All that could be said on the subject has been well said by my colleague who has just taken his seat, but the gentleman from Tennessee has just made a remark which deserves some reply. The Committee on Appropriations, I will say here, however, have no objection to increasing the appropriation to $5,000. The city of Philadelphia has spent $500,000 in the purchase of this island for the purpose of making it a free gift to the Government of the United States in view of the construction there of a great naval station. The gift has been offered and the Government has accepted it. The question now is whether we shall appropriate sufficient money to make the necessary preliminary survey. The amount asked by the Navy Department for this purpose is $10,000, but the amendment of my colleague merely asks for $5,000, one half of the amount recommended by the Secretary of the Navy.

Let me add another word. I see that a civil engineer is employed at the Portsmouth navy-yard at a salary of $2,500, and there is one at the New York navy-yard, and almost every principal navy-yard in the country. The regular business of the engineers of the Navy is in reference to machinery, and therefore it is necessary that there should be a civil engineer at this station, and for that purpose this sum of $5,000 is absolutely required.

Mr. SPALDING. I beg to say to the committee that no estimate was made for this appropriation from any Department of the Government, that it comes to us in no official way; but the members of this House from Philadelphia applied for a small appropriation to survey this island, and the committee, out of the excess of their good nature, put in the bill this appropriation for $2,000. Now, if the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union are better natured than the Committee on Appropriations they will increase the appropriation to $5,000. The Committee on Appropriations have at least done their duty.

Mr. RANDALL. I move to increase the appropriation to $10,000, simply for the purpose of stating that I consider this appropriation necessary and not a single cent too little. I am sorry to see the spirit which the gentleman in charge of this bill has exhibited toward the members of the city of Philadelphia.

Mr. SPALDING. My friend is mistaken. I said that in the excess of their good nature the Committee on Appropriations put in an appropriation of $2,000, but that if the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union are better natured they could increase the appropriation to $5,000.

Mr. RANDALL. I understand that the Secretary of the Navy recommended $10,000, and that the committee in a spirit of great economy reduced the appropriation to $2,000. Now, I have good reason to believe from information which I have received that a sum less than $5,000 will be altogether insufficient. I hope, therefore, that there will be no objection on the part of any one to increase the appropriation to $5,000. I withdraw my amendment to the amendment.

Mr. PIKE. I renew it merely to express the hope that the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Pennsylvania will be adopted. It seems to me wise economy to improve this valuable property which has been presented to the Government by the city of Philadelphia. We are already using it very profitably by laying up there a large number of steamers which have been put out of commission. This naval station should be gradually improved; and if I had charge of the matter I would expend $100,000 year by year at that station until the navy-yard at Philadelphia can be sold. The lowest estimate which the present navy-yard can be sold for is $1,500,000.

Mr. O'NEILL. It has been assessed by the board of revision of taxes of Philadelphia, the board of last appeal of valuation, at $3,500,000.

Mr. PIKE. It will bring more than is necessary for building this navy-yard at League Island. It would therefore be a matter of economy to go on improving the naval station at League Island at once.

Mr. MULLINS. I oppose this amendment on the ground that we have only a very little while back got possession of this ground, and now this appropriation is for no other purpose than to make a preliminary survey of that ground. It is clear to every thinking man that looks at the subject that as soon as the necessity develops itself a further survey can be had, but I cannot see now the propriety of raising this appropriation to the extent proposed by the gentlemen from Pennsylvania, that is, to $5,000, as proposed by one gentleman, [Mr. MYERS] and to $10,000, as proposed by the other, [Mr. RANDALL.] The committee have had this bill under consideration and have inserted these appropriations after an investigation of the case more definitely than any other members of the House can do upon a casual examination or mere superficial idea of the facts. Go on and expend the amount already appropriated by the bill, and when you have done that if the necessity exists for more this House is always ready to give what is required.

The question being taken on the amendment of Mr. RANDALL, it was disagreed to.

The question recurred on the amendment of Mr. O'NEILL, as renewed by Mr. MYERS, and there were—ayes 41, noes 26.

Mr. SPALDING. I give it up.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. KELSEY. I offer, by direction of the Committee on Appropriations, the following amendment as a new paragraph:

For the completion of bridge over the Dakota river, located and surveyed, and road from said bridge to Vermilion bridge, $1,000.

Mr. SPALDING. That is right.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

For Washington asylum and hospital, Washington, District of Columbia, $25,000; for Richmond asylum and hospital, Richmond, Virginia, $15,000; for Vicksburg asylum and hospital, Vicksburg, Mississippi, $10,000: Provided, That on and after the close of the present fiscal year the said asylums and hospitals shall be discontinued.

Mr. PAINE. I move to strike out the word "present" and insert the word "next," so that it will read "close of the next fiscal year." I supposed this must be a mistake, for this is not an appropriation bill to supply deficiencies for the present fiscal year, but is a miscellaneous appropriation for the next fiscal year, after the present shall have terminated. Now, if we terminate the existence of these hospitals on the 30th of June next, then we shall have an appropriation of $50,000 for the three hospitals to be expended during the year ending the 30th June, 1870. I would inquire of my friend from Massachusetts how that was intended?

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. It was intended that the hospitals should be wound up on the 30th of June next.

Mr. PAINE. Then let me inquire why is it that we appropriate in the aggregate for three hospitals $50,000 for the year commencing the 30th of June?

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. We do not. It reads:

Provided, That on and after the close of the present fiscal year the said asylums and hospitals shall be discontinued.

Mr. PAINE. Now let us see how that is. I turn back to the enacting clause of the bill, as follows:

That the following sums be, and the same are hereby, appropriated for the objects hereinafter expressed for the fiscal year ending the 30th June, 1870.

Now, the appropriation here is $50,000 for the fiscal year ending the 30th of June, 1870, yet this discontinues all the hospitals before the year closes.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. But the subsequent proviso controls the opening statement. These hospitals by law ended with the Freedmen's Bureau on the 1st of January; but as it would be cruel to have to turn out into the world poor wounded men and sick men in the middle of the winter, we move this appropriation to run them till June of this year and then wind them up. We were asked for a much larger appropriation, but we did not give it—only what is here reported. But I call attention to the fact that if this amendment prevails there will be nothing to run these hospitals between now and the 1st of July.

Mr. PAINE. I did not wish to continue these hospitals after the end of this fiscal year, but what I did want is this: that the committee should make some provision for their maintenance during this fiscal year, which we have not done by this bill; for I call attention to the fact that not a cent is appropriated in this bill for the current fiscal year.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. It is generally understood that in a miscellaneous appropriation bill the appropriations become due and payable at once.

Mr. PAINE. When the miscellaneous appropriation bill provides an appropriation of $50,000 for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1870, there is no room for any doubt about it. The appropriation is for that year and it makes no difference what the usage has been. It gives us no money to expend on these hospitals for the fiscal year commencing June 30, 1869. The consequence is that it defeats the very object the gentleman has in view. I am willing to discontinue these hospitals at the end of the year, but I think some provision should be made for defraying the expenses while the year is running, and no such provision has been made. I withdraw the amendment, but I call the attention of the gentleman to the fact that he has made no provision at all.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. To remove all doubt I move to insert after the word "dollars," in line one hundred and eighty-five, the words "during the current fiscal year;" so that the paragraph will read:

In connection with the late Bureau of Freedmen and Refugees:

For Washington asylum and hospital, Washington, District of Columbia, $25,000; for Richmond asylum and hospital, Richmond, Virginia, $15,000; for Vicksburg asylum and hospital, Vicksburg, Mississippi, $10,000, during the current fiscal year: Provided, That on and after the close of the present fiscal year the said asylums and hospitals shall be discontinued.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

For collection and payment of bounty, prize-money, and other legitimate claims of colored soldiers and sailors for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1870, and for salaries of agents, clerks, &c., $145,000.

For rent of offices, fuel, light, &c., $25,000.

For office furniture, $3,000.

For stationery and printing, $20,000.

For mileage and transportation of officers and agents, $18,000.

For telegraphing and postage, $3,000. Being in all $214,000.

Mr. HOLMAN. I move to strike out the first paragraph. I make that motion for the purpose of inquiring what is the object of this appropriation. I trust the gentleman from Ohio will explain it.

Mr. SPALDING. I will endeavor to explain it to the satisfaction of the gentleman from Indiana. Although the Freedmen's Bureau was considered to be closed on the 1st of January, the Commissioner made a requisition upon the Committee on Appropriations for quite a large appropriation to continue a number of hospitals, among which were the three named in the paragraph that we have just passed, during the next fiscal year. He also required appropriations for some of the officers and agents of that establishment to collect bounty and pay for freedmen who have been in the service of the United States. I hold in my hand letters from the Commissioner of the Freedmen's Bureau in relation to the matter, and if the committee desires to have them read I will have them read. The chairman of our committee of his own volition inserted these clauses in the bill; I mean all these clauses in relation to the Freedmen's Bureau, involving an expenditure of perhaps two or three hundred thousand dollars. The committee at its session this morning passed upon this matter and instructed me to say to the Committee of the Whole that these paragraphs were put in the bill by mistake, and that they have not received the approbation or sanction of the Committee on Appropriations. It was no fault of our clerk; but the chairman, for some purpose of his own, put these clauses in the bill without any action by the committee. In pursuance of the instructions of the committee, I ask that all those paragraphs may be stricken out.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] accept that as a modification of his amendment?

Mr. HOLMAN. I do.

Mr. SPALDING. I hope all those clauses will be stricken out, as they have not received the sanction of the Committee on Appropriations; but before the committee acts upon the question it is but fair that the letters from the Commissioner should be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

WAR DEPARTMENT.
BUREAU OF REFUGEES, FREEDMEN, &c.,
WASHINGTON CITY, December 31, 1868.

DEAR SIR: I find by necessity that I am compelled to ask for a larger appropriation than I anticipated in my report. I have not been able to reduce the hospitals and asylums for the aged and for helpless orphan children so rapidly as was then contemplated. The hospitals remaining at this date are: one at Washington, District of Columbia, one at Louisville, Kentucky, one at New Orleans, Louisiana, one at Vicksburg, Mississippi, one at Talladega, Alabama, and one at Richmond, Virginia. There is an orphan asylum either connected with or separate from each of the hospitals named. The detail of my estimate is as follows:

Washington asylum and hospital.....	$75,000
Richmond asylum and hospital.....	60,000
Vicksburg asylum and hospital.....	50,000
New Orleans asylum and hospital.....	70,000
Louisville asylum and hospital.....	10,000
Talladega asylum and hospital.....	10,000

This item for appropriation will then be as follows:

For hospitals and asylums for freedmen and refugees.....$275,000

For collection and payment of bounties, prize money, and other legitimate claims to colored soldiers and sailors, I will be obliged to ask an appropriation for the next fiscal year to the amount of $300,000. The details of the estimate are as follows:

Salaries of agents, clerks, &c.....	$170,000
Rents of offices, fuel, and lights.....	45,000
Office furniture.....	5,000
Stationery and printing.....	50,000
Mileage and transportation of officers and agents.....	20,000
Telegraphing and postage.....	10,000

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,
O. C. HOWARD,
Major General, Commissioner.

Hon. E. B. WASHBURN,
Chairman of Committee on Appropriations.

The question was then taken on the motion to strike out submitted by Mr. SPALDING; and it was agreed to.

Mr. KELSEY. By direction of the Committee on Appropriations I move to insert the following:

To enable the Secretary of the Interior to pay Vinnie Ream the sum now due her on the contract authorized under the joint resolution approved July 23, 1863, for a statue of the late President Lincoln, $5,000.

This amendment is necessary to carry out a contract made on behalf of the United States by the Secretary of the Treasury with Vinnie Ream. She has performed her part of the contract so far as to be entitled to $5,000, according to the strict terms of the contract. This amendment is to carry out a vested right.

Mr. BALDWIN. I wish to say that the contract provides that $5,000 shall be paid at a certain stage of the work. How are the members of the House to ascertain when that point has been reached? There has been no examination or report in this matter. Consequently the House can have no sufficient ground upon which to make this appropriation. When an examination and report has been made it will then be time to make the appropriation.

Mr. KELSEY. Even if the gentleman is right in the position he takes there is no reason why we should not appropriate this money in this bill. Vinnie Ream cannot draw this money until the terms of the contract are complied with on her part and until her work has been accepted. But it has been represented to our committee that the work has been perfected to a point which entitles her to this sum. It may be necessary to have a formal report to that effect upon the subject before this money can be drawn from the Treasury. But the examination and report can be made in a very short time, and we ought to put the power into the hands of the Secretary of the Treasury to comply with our part of the contract as soon as the report has been made.

The amendment of Mr. KELSEY was agreed to.

Mr. HOOPER, of Utah. I move to insert the following after the amendment just adopted:

For printing and binding three thousand copies of the laws of the Territory of Utah, as estimated by the First Comptroller of the Treasury, $4,005 12.

I ask the Clerk to read the letter I send to his desk, showing good and sufficient reason why this printing and binding should be done and paid for.

The Clerk read as follows:

WASHINGTON CITY, D. C., December 14, 1867.

SIR: I have received your note of the 9th instant with regard to the account of the public printer of Utah Territory for publishing three thousand copies of the compiled laws of that Territory amounting to some nine thousand dollars, and asking from me a statement of facts as to that matter. I have been secretary of the Territory of Utah for something over four years past, having charge of the laws and the distribution of the same. The laws of the Territory were revised and published in one volume in 1855, since which time no codification or compilation of the laws of the Territory has been made and published until the one for which this amount is rendered. Each year a limited number of copies of the current session laws were printed, limited by the Comptroller of the United States Treasury, but quite sufficient during the early years of the Territory. The rapid increase of population, the formation of new counties and townships, and consequent increase of the number of officers and the continual changes of officers throughout the Territory, soon exhausted these session laws so that I do not think there has been a time during my whole term of office that I have been able to furnish a full set of the laws of the Territory to those entitled to them. Besides, as in all new countries rapidly filling up, the great development of its varied material interests required continual changes in the laws of the Territory by way of amendment, repealing, &c., until it became almost impossible to tell what laws were in force in the Territory. It was apparent to all that the laws must be compiled and republished, but it was postponed from year to year by the Legislature, expecting that the Territory would be admitted as a State, which would require a new revision of the laws until the session of 1865-66, when the Legislature provided for the compilation and publication of three thousand copies in one volume of all the laws then in force in the Territory. I informed the public printer at the time that under the instructions of the Comptroller of the Treasury I could, as Secretary, pay for only one thousand copies of the current session laws, and that he must look to Congress for his pay of the balance. It is for this that the account referred to is made. This republication of the laws was very necessary, and it seems to me just and proper that Congress should provide for the payment of the expense.

Truly, yours,

AMOS REED,
Secretary of Utah Territory.

I concur in the view expressed by Mr. Reed in reference to the necessity of the amount of printing done.

GAIL P. McCUNDY,
Associate Justice, Supreme Court, Utah Territory.
Hon. WILLIAM H. HOOPER, Delegate in Congress.

The question was on the amendment of Mr. HOOPER, of Utah.

Mr. SPALDING. I do not think this is in order at all. The amendment is to provide for some incidental expense.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is of the opinion that the point of order is made a little too late.

Mr. SPALDING. The Committee of the Whole will see that the communication which has been read is from officers of the Territory of Utah, and not from any of our Departments here. There has been no estimate or anything of that sort sent to us by any Department; and I desire to say further, that Congress has already made an appropriation for one thousand copies of the laws of the Territory of Utah. But they are not satisfied with that; they want three thousand more.

Mr. HOOPER, of Utah. I desire to say, Mr. Chairman—

The CHAIRMAN. No further debate on this amendment is in order.

Mr. HOOPER, of Utah. I move to amend the amendment by increasing the sum to $6,000 for the purpose of obtaining an opportunity to explain this matter. The members will have noticed from the letter just read that this printing actually cost $9,000. The Legislature of Utah, when this printing was authorized to be done, felt itself in duty bound to see that the public printers were paid, and they performed that duty, and they now ask Congress to refund the amount which was advanced by the Territory to those printers. But knowing the discrepancies that sometimes arise between the accounts coming from my Territory and the amounts allowed by the Comptroller in auditing those accounts, I referred the bills to the First Comptroller, who had the work measured, and whose finding in the matter is stated in the communication which I send to the Clerk to be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
COMPTROLLER'S OFFICE, January 18, 1868.

SIR: In compliance with the request contained in your letter to me of the 23d December, 1867, I have had measured the volume of laws of the Territory of Utah, accompanying said letter, the execution of which work was performed by Messrs Melwen & Thompson, whose account for printing and binding the same has been placed in your hands, and respectfully advise you of the result of said measurement, as follows:

For printing and binding 3,000 copies of laws of Utah:
Composition, 308 pages, 3,168 ems each, 975,744, at $1 50.....	$1,463 61
Presswork, 8 pages to a form, 39 signatures, 12 tokens each, 463 tokens, at $1 50.....	702 00
Paper, 122 reams, at $10 per ream.....	1,220 00
Binding, estimated for law sheep, at seventy-five cents per volume.....	2,250 00
Total amount estimated.....	5,635 61
From which deduct amount previously allowed for 1,000 copies of laws of Utah, session of 1865-67.....	1,630 49
Total amount to be provided for.....	$4,005 12

Respectfully, yours,

R. W. TAYLOR, Comptroller.
Hon. W. H. HOOPER,
Delegate to Congress from Utah Territory.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. KELSEY. The Committee on Appropriations decided not to recommend an appropriation for this purpose, because it is to pay for the publication of a compilation of the laws of the Territory; and, as we understand, the Government has heretofore paid for the publication of the laws annually passed by the Legislature. It appears, however, that we have made an appropriation to pay for one thousand copies of this compilation—an expense that was entirely unnecessary on the part of the Government. The committee therefore decided not to recommend this appropriation, as the Territory of Utah had already received the same amount in this respect as other Territories.

Mr. HOOPER, of Utah. I withdraw my amendment to the amendment.

The question being taken on the amendment of Mr. HOOPER, of Utah, it was not agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

For this amount to pay B. A. Shepherd the sum due him on a lost check drawn by Robert S. Neighbours, United States special Indian agent, on the 2d of June, 1859, on the Assistant Treasurer of the United States at New York city, for supplies furnished the Indian department, $1,200.

Mr. MAYNARD. I move to amend by striking out this paragraph. It simply provides for the payment of a claim, and a very old claim at that. It is ten years old. It ought to go to the Committee of Claims and be investigated and reported upon by that Committee before any action upon it by the House.

Mr. SPALDING. This paragraph has been inserted at the instance of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, who says that the Government in 1859 had the benefit of this sum of $1,200 in supplies for the Indians. The Indian agent, Mr. Neighbours, drew his draft on the Assistant Treasurer in New York city; but the draft never reached its destination; and the money then on deposit in New York was withdrawn by the bureau, so that a specific appropriation is needed in order to pay this sum. He further states that the whole subject has been thoroughly investigated by two or three different Commissioners of the Indian Bureau who were thoroughly satisfied that this money ought to be paid. The man has been deprived of the use of this money ever since 1859, and he ought to have it, the claim having accrued under the operation of law. The Committee on Appropriations agreed to this appropriation without a dissenting voice.

Mr. MAYNARD. How does it happen that this claim has slept ten years?

Mr. SPALDING. For the reason that it has been undergoing investigation from time to time. Mr. Neighbours, the Indian agent, was killed soon after the occurrence of the transaction, and this rendered it more inconvenient to furnish the proof.

Mr. MAYNARD. What is there to distinguish this claim from any of the claims against the Government that are sent to the Committee of Claims?

Mr. SPALDING. It was contracted under the laws regulating the Indian Bureau, and the money was actually paid out by this man.

Mr. MAYNARD. As the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SPALDING] appears to have some feeling about this matter, I withdraw the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

For compensation of the acting chargé d'affaires ad interim at Venezuela, at the rate of $4,500 per annum from the 1st day of June last until such time as a minister shall be appointed and shall take charge of the legation, such sum as may be necessary.

Mr. FLANDERS. I move to amend by inserting after the paragraph just read the following:

For the completion of the work of the commission for determining and marking the boundary line between Washington Territory and the British possessions, $13,600.

Mr. SPALDING. If the provisions in reference to the chargé d'affaires at Venezuela is still pending I make the point of order that this amendment is not germane.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment is to add a new paragraph.

Mr. MAYNARD. After the House has disposed of the amendment of the Delegate from the Territory of Washington to add a new paragraph, will it be in order to go back to move an amendment in reference to the chargé d'affaires at Venezuela?

Mr. FLANDERS. I will withdraw my amendment.

Mr. MAYNARD. I move to strike out the following paragraph:

For compensation of the acting chargé d'affaires ad interim at Venezuela, at the rate of $4,500 per annum from the 1st day of June last until such time as a minister shall be appointed and shall take charge of the legation, such sum as may be necessary.

I ask the gentleman from Ohio why that was not included in the consular and diplomatic appropriation bill of this year?

Mr. SPALDING. This is made in obedience to an express request of the Secretary of State, who says that under very peculiar circumstances, a gentleman, the son of one very near to me, became chargé d'affaires and performed valuable services when our minister ran away, and this provision is for the purpose of compensating this gentleman who did so well for his services while acting as chargé d'affaires.

Mr. MAYNARD. I withdraw the amendment. The circumstances had for a moment escaped my attention.

Mr. FLANDERS. I move to add the following:

For the completion of the work of the commission for determining and marking the boundary line between Washington Territory and the British possessions, $13,600.

Mr. Chairman, that is the amount asked for by the Secretary of State to continue the present commission for the completion of the northwestern boundary. The committee has, for some reason best known to itself, left out that appropriation, and I hope the amendment will be agreed to.

Mr. MAYNARD. That is an old acquaintance. It was here when I first came to Congress, and I should like to ask the gentleman when he expects this work will be done.

Mr. FLANDERS. That it is not already completed is no fault of the commission on the part of the United States, for they have already prepared their report and signed the papers. The work was commenced on the 11th of August, 1856, and the United States Government have expended in the survey for marking that boundary $500,000. It is also well known that, although the boundary line has been run and marked, the papers have never yet been signed. That would have been done if a question had not arisen between the United States and Great Britain in regard to the water boundary. The settlement of this question has been delayed up to the present time, but the commission is now ready, as I understand it, to sign the papers. It is therefore necessary that this sum should be appropriated.

Mr. MAYNARD. How long will it take to complete the signing of these papers?

Mr. FLANDERS. When the English commission is ready the papers will be signed.

ENROLLED BILLS.

The committee informally rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. WILSON, of Pennsylvania, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bills with the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

An act (H. R. No. 568) explanatory of the act entitled "An act declaring the title to land warrants in certain cases;"

An act (H. R. No. 1758) to incorporate the Masonic Mutual Relief Association of the District of Columbia; and

An act (H. R. No. 1877) for the relief of the heirs and legal representatives of Charles C. Cook, deceased.

MISCELLANEOUS APPROPRIATION BILL.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. SCOTFIELD. The gentleman from Washington Territory [Mr. FLANDERS] says that the Committee on Appropriations have omitted this amendment of his for reasons best known to themselves. If the gentleman had the same information the committee had I think he would never have proposed it. This commission has been in existence a great number of years; the work is all done and has been done for a long while; the line is run and the boundary has been substantially marked upon the ground, and there is no necessity for any appropriation at all. As a friend near me says, the boundary has been marked by a good engineer. The work is all complete and has been for a long time, but the English commissioners refuse to sign the report. It seems that the Secretary of State proposes that we shall keep this commission in existence without anything to do at an expense of $13,000 a year.

Mr. FLANDERS rose.

Mr. SCOTFIELD. I will yield to the gentleman as soon as I get through my statement. The English commission refuse to sign on account of the difficulty with reference to the Island of San Juan. The work is all done, all complete; the report is all drawn, and yet the English commissioners refuse to sign it, expecting that we will keep the commission alive till some future time. I had a conversation with one of the commissioners on the subject and he told me he had no duty to perform. He admitted that the work was all done and all they had to do was to sign their names. Therefore I say if the gentleman from Washington Territory had known some of the reasons as we do I think he would not have offered his amendment.

Mr. PRUYN. I move to amend by striking out "$600," making it "$13,000," and for the purpose of stating two or three facts bearing upon the matter which the House ought to understand. This survey was going on for many years under the treaty of 1846 with Great Britain under direction of a commission appointed by the two Governments. Mr. Campbell, of this city, is one of the acting commissioners now on the part of this Government. The survey, as the gentleman from Pennsylvania correctly stated, has been made and I believe completed, or very nearly so. The commission are now to sign the requisite maps and certificates which under the treaty are to be evidence of the completion of the survey and the establishment of the line. Now, for certain diplomatic reasons most likely the British commissioners have declined thus far for some time past to meet our commissioners for this purpose. The reason probably the gentleman from Pennsylvania has already alluded to—the negotiations going on between the two Governments which have ended in the San Juan treaty, a confirmation of which has been reported upon in the Senate, and probably by this time it is confirmed. The survey has continued for six hundred miles over a broken territory, and the question is now whether we shall break it up before the result is arrived at and the whole thing is completed when this small appropriation will close it all up. I withdraw the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. MUNGEN. I renew it for the purpose of saying a word. The gentleman from Pennsylvania says this is completed. In a legal point of view I dispute that very respectfully. Where a commission is appointed to run a boundary line and make a survey, if they break up when they run the first mile it is incomplete; and if they break up after they have run the last line without concluding and signing the survey it amounts to nothing, and we will have to rerun the line. Now, I am in favor of this appropriation because it is much cheaper for the Government to allow this sum and get the signatures of these men than it will be to appoint a new commission, which would undoubtedly have to be appointed to rerun this line. We have settled this question in the settlement of the line of the territory acquired from Mexico in 1846 or 1847. It is true as a legal proposition that the survey is incomplete until it is signed.

Mr. SCOTFIELD. How long does the gentleman propose to pay these large salaries to these commissioners simply to sign their names? They have had about two years to do it.

Mr. MUNGEN. I propose nothing further than to leave it open and see if we can get it done. It is simply a matter of economy, because we shall have to start again from the initial point and pay the expense all over again if this is not completed. I would rather pay $13,000 as a matter of economy than run the risk of having to rerun the entire line at an expense of $600,000.

The amendment of Mr. FLANDERS was disagreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, a message from the Senate was communicated by Mr. GORHAM, its Secretary, announcing that that body had concurred in the resolution of the House suspending the sixteenth and seventeenth joint rules during the remainder of this session of Congress.

MISCELLANEOUS APPROPRIATION BILL.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. DODGE. I move to amend by inserting the following as a new paragraph:

For reimbursing the State of Iowa for expenses incurred and payments made during the late rebellion, as examined, audited, and found due the State by General Robert C. Buchanan's commission under the act of Congress approved July 25, 1866, $229,848 23.

Mr. SCOTFIELD. Is not this new legislation?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair does not so understand it. The terms of the amendment are expressly in accordance with an act of Congress.

Mr. DODGE. This matter has been fully discussed in this House, and I believe there is no gentleman who denies that this amount is justly due. This claim was reported by General Buchanan, and I read from his report the following:

"In the examination of the question of reimbursement to the State of Iowa for the expenses incurred by these several bodies of troops two questions arise, by the answers to which the whole matter must be decided:

"First. Was there such necessity for their employment as to justify their organization?

"Second. Were the expenditures made under the several heads reasonable and proper, and in accordance with the spirit of the laws in such cases made and provided?

"With regard to the necessity, the facts stated above show, in my opinion, that it was absolutely imperative. On the one border the lives and property of the inhabitants of the State were threatened by a sanguinary and savage foe; and on the other the integrity of the State itself as a member of the Union was in imminent jeopardy from armed traitors and rebels seeking its conquest; no one can doubt the necessity and propriety of employing these troops.

"As to the expenditures, the Legislature, by the act referred to, directed that all accounts arising under the employment of these troops should be submitted previous to payment to a board of commissioners then in existence, whose duty it was to audit and allow all claims against the State. Fortunately the members of this board were intelligent and discreet, and consulted a rigid economy in their allowances, being somewhat controlled, perhaps, by the idea of the uncertainty of the amount being refunded by the Government. The board had plenary powers; its decisions were final, as no appeal could be taken from them, nor could any account be paid without its approval, with the amount allowed indorsed upon it and verified by the signatures of its members. My examination of these accounts shows me that they are carefully made up in accordance with the laws of the State, verified on oath, and though not in the forms used by the Treasury Department, yet sufficiently like them for all practical purposes. I therefore did not attempt to apply to them the regulations of the accounting officers of the Treasury, for had this been possible it did not seem likely that Congress would have provided by law for a commissioner 'to examine and report upon' claims that could have been as well decided upon by those officers themselves. The letters of the Secretary of the Treasury and the Second Comptroller, hereto appended, sanction this opinion."

This officer has been nearly a year examining these claims—six months of the time in the State of Iowa—and he reports that the total amount due the State is $229,848 23. Similar claims have been paid to the States of Ohio and Missouri, and I hope there will be no objection to this amendment.

The question was put on the amendment; and there were—ayes 22, noes 44; no quorum voting.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. DODGE and Mr. SCOTFIELD were appointed.

The committee divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 45, noes 67.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. ALLISON. I offer the following amendment:

For reimbursing the State of Iowa for expenses.

incurred and payments made during the rebellion, as examined, audited and found due by General Robert C. Buchanan's commission under the act of Congress approved July 25, 1866, §229,848 23: Provided, That in determining the claims to be allowed under this act the same principles, rules, and regulations shall be observed by the accounting officers of the Treasury Department in auditing said expenses as have been applied to the claims allowed to States under the acts of Congress approved July 17 and 27, 1861, for reimbursing expenses incurred in raising, &c., troops to suppress the rebellion against the United States.

Mr. SCOFIELD. I rise to a point of order. The proviso is general legislation, which is excluded under the rules, and the amendment itself is the same thing which has been voted down.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I offer the following amendment:

For reimbursing the State of Iowa for expenses incurred and payments made during the rebellion, as examined, audited, and found due by General Robert C. Buchanan's commission under the act of Congress approved July 25, 1866, §229,848.

That is the same amendment that was offered by my colleague, [Mr. DODGE,] only leaving off the odd cents so as to make it a different proposition. The amount of money represented by this claim is justly due to the State of Iowa. A portion of the claim arises out of the fact that the State had erected barracks for troops and turned them over to the United States. The United States sold the property, and the money to-day is in the Treasury of the United States. Another portion of the claim arises out of the fact that a portion of the militia of the State of Iowa went to the aid of the United States in the State of Missouri. That part of the claim is precisely of the same nature as that allowed and paid to the State of Missouri. So that in addition to having part of this money in the Treasury the Government has heretofore reimbursed another State for precisely such services and such claims.

Now, I insist that in the adjustment of the claims of the State of Iowa by the officers of the Government the same liberality has not been manifested that has been manifested toward other States. For instance, the gentleman from New York [Mr. WOOD] objected to this claim some time ago because the State of New York had not been paid. But I find that while the accounting officers of the Government deducted from the claim of the State of Iowa every dollar of the direct tax levied upon the people of that State in 1861 there stands to-day unliquidated against the State of New York the sum of $650,000 of the direct tax of 1861. The claims of New York under the original legislation for the adjustment of claims against the Government were paid without the deduction of that direct tax. Now, we simply ask that after the Government has deducted all the direct tax levied upon us they will give us back the money which we spent in the service of the Government as represented by this claim, which has been thoroughly examined. It was examined by a special commissioner appointed in pursuance of an act of Congress, and it has been referred to the Committee on Military Affairs of this House, who have unanimously reported that this money is due to the State of Iowa. If other States have claims yet unpaid that constitutes no reason for not paying this debt which the Government owes to our people. I hope, therefore, the committee will adopt this amendment and adjust this claim, right and proper as it is in every sense.

Mr. WOOD. The House has already during the present session had this subject before it, when it was very fully and ably discussed by the gentleman from Iowa and his colleagues, and there was a report in favor of the claim from the Committee on Military Affairs. After that discussion the House voted to refer the subject back again to that committee with instructions to report a bill that would cover all similar cases. I objected to it then and I object to it now. I object to it on the ground that there are other States, and the city of New York itself, that have far more meritorious claims against the Government than has the State of Iowa.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I resume the floor for the purpose of saying in the remainder of my time that I made a misstatement in regard to the amount of direct tax standing against the State of New York. I said it was $650,000. Instead of that amount it is more than nine hundred and sixty thousand dollars.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I move to amend the amendment by adding to it the following:

Provided, That an amount be appropriated from the Treasury to pay the war claims of the rebellion from all the States which have been reported upon favorably by commissioners appointed by Congress.

When this claim came before the Committee on Appropriations I had been instructed by my State to present precisely the same kind of claim for the State of Massachusetts. That State had expended $400,000 in coast defense under the orders of the Government. She managed to get $200,000 of that sum back by selling some of her heavy ordnance. A commission was established of three persons; one was Judge Verplanck, of New York, another was Mr. Collyer, of Philadelphia, and the third I do not remember. That commission passed upon the claim of Massachusetts and reported in favor of it, after making the proper deductions. We had no direct tax nor any other tax. We owe nothing on earth to this Government but loyalty, good will, and fealty. I only desire that the same rule shall be applied to us that is applied to Iowa or to any other State. We have passed through the same stages precisely that Iowa has passed through.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I accept the amendment of the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. BUTLER.]

Mr. SCOFIELD. I rise to a point of order. The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state his point of order.

Mr. SCOFIELD. My point of order is that the amendment of the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. BUTLER,] as accepted by the gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. WILSON,] is new legislation and not in order on this bill.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. The point of order is raised too late.

Mr. SCOFIELD. Not at all; I raised the point as soon as the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. WILSON] accepted the amendment.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. The gentleman should have raised the point of order as soon as I offered the amendment.

Mr. SCOFIELD. I raised the point as soon as the gentleman took his seat.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is of opinion that the point of order was raised too late.

Mr. PRICE. I find no fault with the proviso of the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. BUTLER.] If Massachusetts has expended money in good faith in defense of the Union against the rebellion she should have the amount refunded to her. But there is one strong point in favor of the claim of Iowa in this matter that has escaped observation. The gentleman from Massachusetts states that Massachusetts has received back over two hundred thousand dollars of the money she expended by selling the heavy ordnance for which a part of this money was expended at the commencement of the rebellion. But right there I want to say that a part of the money which we claim to-day for the State of Iowa was expended in the construction of barracks which were taken possession of by United States troops. Those barracks were sold, and the money received from the sale was paid not into the treasury of the State of Iowa, but into the Treasury of the United States at the other end of the avenue here. We come here to-day and ask that the United States shall pay us back the money they took from us and paid into the Treasury of the United States.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. How much money was paid into the Treasury from that source? Perhaps $10,000.

Mr. PILE. I ask that the amendment be read as it is now modified.

The amendment was read, as follows:

For reimbursing the State of Iowa for expenses incurred and payments made during the rebellion, as examined, audited, and found due by the State by General Robert C. Buchanan's commission, under the act of Congress approved July 25, 1866, §229,848: Provided, That an amount be appropriated from the Treasury to pay the war claims of the rebellion from all the States which have been reported upon favorably by commissioners appointed by Congress.

Mr. CLARKE, of Kansas. I move to amend the amendment, as modified, by adding to it the following:

To reimburse the State of Kansas for the services and supplies of the militia called out by the Governor of Kansas upon the requisition of Major General Curtis to repel the invasion of General Price, $259,000.

When the claim of the State of Iowa was before the House a few weeks ago I had occasion to appeal to the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, [Mr. GARFIELD,] who reported the claim, to allow me to offer the amendment which I have now offered; but it was ruled out of order, and I did not then have an opportunity to present my amendment. The whole question, as I understand it, and as has already been stated by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. WOOD,] was sent to the Committee on Appropriations, with instructions to report a bill providing for the payment of the indebtedness due all the States. I hold in my hand a bill which has twice passed the Senate of the United States, having for its object the reimbursement of the State of Kansas for an expenditure of $259,000 made under the order of the Federal commander at that time, the late Major General Curtis, to repel the invasion of the rebel General Price, near the close of the late rebellion. I say that this bill—

The hour of half past four o'clock p. m. having arrived, the committee rose informally, the Speaker resumed the chair, and the House took a recess till half past six o'clock p. m.

EVENING SESSION.

The House reassembled agreeably to order at half past six o'clock p. m.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. The business in order during the first hour of this evening's session is business of the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

ABIGAIL DICK.

Mr. MILLER, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, reported a bill (H. R. No. 1016) granting a pension to Abigail Dick; which was read a first and second time.

The bill directs the Secretary of the Interior to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Abigail Dick, mother by adoption of Elijah R. Dick, alias Richard Clemens, late a private in company E, fifteenth regiment United States infantry, and pay her a pension at the rate of eight dollars per month, commencing November 14, 1863.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. MILLER moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

JOSEPH WHEAT.

Mr. MILLER, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, reported a bill (H. R. No. 1017) granting a pension to Joseph Wheat; which was read a first and second time.

The bill directs the Secretary of the Interior to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Joseph Wheat, late a private of Company E, fifteenth regiment West Virginia volunteers, and pay him a pension commencing August 9, 1865.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. MILLER moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

SARAH E. HAINES.

Mr. MILLER, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, reported back a bill (S. No. 942) granting a pension to Sarah E. Haines.

The bill directs the Secretary of the Interior to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Sarah E. Haines, widow of George H. Haines, late a private in company K, eighteenth regiment Missouri volunteers, and to pay her a pension at the rate of eight dollars per month, to commence on the 18th of July, 1864, and to continue during her widowhood.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. MILLER moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ELIZABETH CLARKE.

Mr. MILLER, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, reported back a bill (S. No. 906) granting a pension to Elizabeth Clarke.

The bill directs the Secretary of the Interior to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Elizabeth Clarke, widow of Newman S. Clarke, late colonel of the sixth regiment of infantry, United States Army, and to pay her a pension at the rate of thirty dollars per month, to commence from and after the passage of this act, and to continue during her widowhood.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. MILLER moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

MARY A. DAVIS.

Mr. HOLMAN. There is on the Speaker's table a bill (H. R. No. 598) granting a pension to Mary A. Davis, widow of William P. Davis, a private in the eighteenth regiment of Indiana volunteers in the war of 1861. To this bill the Senate has made a verbal amendment, filling up a date. I trust there will be no objection to taking up that bill and acting on the amendment.

Mr. PERHAM. I would consent, but I know that the proposition will be resisted, and the matter will consume time.

Mr. HOLMAN. I will consent that the blank shall be filled with the date of the original application for a pension. There were two reports in favor of Mrs. Davis by subordinate clerks for the allowance of this pension.

Mr. BENJAMIN. I object to the consideration of this bill. I did not understand that the session to-night was for the consideration of Senate bills upon the Speaker's table. The amendment of the gentleman from Indiana is of very great importance, and I cannot consent at this time to taking up that bill.

BENJAMIN C. STONE.

Mr. PERHAM, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, reported back Senate bill No. 941, granting a pension to Benjamin C. Stone, with an amendment.

The bill, which was read, directs the Secretary of the Interior to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Benjamin C. Stone, late a private in company I, ninth regiment Vermont infantry volunteers, and to pay him a pension at the rate of fifteen dollars per month, to commence on the 27th of June, 1865.

The amendment of the committee was agreed to, as follows:

Strike out the words "at the rate of fifteen dollars per month."

The bill, as amended, was ordered to a third reading; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. PERHAM moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

HORACE PECK.

Mr. PERHAM, from the same committee, also reported back Senate bill No. 908, granting a pension to Horace Peck, of Charlton, Massachusetts, with the recommendation that it do pass. It proposes to direct the Secretary of the Interior to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Horace Peck, of Charlton, Massachusetts, and to pay him a pension at the rate of eight dollars per month, to commence on the 24th day of May, 1862, and to continue during his natural life.

The bill was ordered to a third reading; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. PERHAM moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

MARTIN N. SLOCUM.

Mr. PERHAM, from the same committee, also reported back Senate bill No. 910, granting a pension to the minor children of Martin N. Slocum, deceased, with the recommendation that it do pass.

The bill provides that the Secretary of the Interior is authorized and directed to continue the pension allowed by private act, approved February 25, 1867, to Mrs. Josephine Slocum, widow of Martin N. Slocum, late a second lieutenant in the sixty-fifth regiment United States colored infantry, who has remarried, and to pay the same to Ireton N. Slocum and Lucilla J. Slocum, children of the said Martin N. Slocum, or to their legally authorized guardian or guardians, from the 3d day of March, 1867, until they severally attain the age of sixteen years.

The bill was ordered to a third reading; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. PERHAM moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

WILLIAM B. LOONEY.

Mr. VAN AERNAM, from the same committee, reported back Senate bill No. 900, granting a pension to William B. Looney, of Alabama, with an amendment.

The bill directs the Secretary of the Interior to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of William B. Looney, of Alabama, late a scout in the service of the United States, and to pay him at the rate of fifteen dollars per month, to commence on the 1st day of July, 1864.

The amendment, which was agreed to, strikes out "fifteen" and inserts "eight;" so it will read "eight dollars a month."

The bill, as amended, was ordered to a third reading; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. VAN AERNAM moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

LYDIA W. FORD.

Mr. VAN AERNAM, from the same committee, also reported back Senate bill No. 949, granting a pension to Mrs. Lydia W. Ford, with the recommendation that it do pass.

The bill directs the Secretary of the Interior to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Mrs. Lydia W. Ford, widow of Jefferson Ford, late an acting master in the United States Navy, and to allow and pay her a pension at the rate of twenty dollars a month, to commence June 18, 1864, and to continue during her widowhood, to be paid out of the naval pension fund.

The bill was ordered to a third reading; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. VAN AERNAM moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

BENJAMIN T. RAINES.

Mr. VAN AERNAM, from the same committee, reported back without amendment the bill (S. No. 904) granting a pension to Benjamin T. Raines, of Indiana. It directs the Secretary of the Interior to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Benjamin T. Raines, of Indiana, late a private in Captain Branham's company, one hundred and fifth regiment Indiana militia, and to pay him a pension at the rate of fifteen dollars per month, to commence on the 14th day of July, 1863.

Mr. HOLMAN. How is it that this is fifteen dollars a month?

Mr. BENJAMIN. Read the report.

The report was accordingly read.

Mr. HOLMAN. I have no objection; I know the facts.

The bill, as amended, was ordered to be read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. VAN AERNAM moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

SOPHIA D. HARMON.

Mr. VAN AERNAM, from the same committee, reported a bill (H. R. No. 2018) granting a pension to Sophia D. Harmon; which was read a first and second time. It directs the Secretary of the Interior to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provision of the pension laws, the name of the petitioner, widow of James Harmon, late a private in company M, eleventh regiment United States colored artillery, and pay her a pension, commencing January 1, 1866.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. VAN AERNAM moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

SARAH E. BROOKER.

Mr. BENJAMIN, from the same committee, reported adversely on the bill (S. No. 790) for the relief of Mrs. Sarah E. Brooker; and the same was laid on the table.

Mr. BENJAMIN moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was laid on the table; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

MARY WHITTEN.

Mr. PERHAM, from the same committee, reported a bill (H. R. No. 2019) granting a pension to Mary Whitten; which was read a first and second time. It directs the Secretary of the Interior to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions of the pension laws, the name of the petitioner, widow of Eli Whitten, late of company B, fourteenth Maine volunteer infantry, and pay her a pension, commencing December 6, 1867.

The bill was then ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. PERHAM moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

GENERAL PENSION LAW.

Mr. PERHAM. We have now disposed of all but one or two private bills that we have ready to report, upon which there will be some discussion, but we have a general bill that was referred to the committee some time since. Members of the House will undoubtedly be disposed to discuss it, but I will say that the committee have endeavored to strike out the provisions of those sections to which objections were made and have retained such as they deemed to be important. I wish now to report that bill.

Mr. HOLMAN. Allow me to make a suggestion. There are a few pension bills left undisposed of on the Speaker's table, and I suggest that we take them up. This is certainly a proper time to dispose of them, and I believe it was the general understanding that we should consider these pension bills on the Speaker's table at this time.

Mr. PERHAM. Personally I have no objection to that if it would be deemed proper to go to the Speaker's table under the order under which we are now acting.

The SPEAKER. In the opinion of the Chair it would. The hour was reserved to the Committee on Invalid Pensions exactly as the evening sessions have been for some time past reserved to the Committee on Appropriations, and they can call up whatever they see fit, subject to a vote of the House.

Mr. PERHAM. So I supposed. There are other bills on the table which the committee desire to have considered, and which they will be ready to act on when they are reached in their order.

Mr. HOLMAN. Does the gentleman from Maine propose to call them up during this hour?

Mr. PERHAM. As I understand the decision of the Speaker we cannot do so during this hour.

Mr. HOLMAN. I understand just the reverse.

The SPEAKER. The decision of the Chair was the other way. The hour belongs to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and they can call up those bills if they see fit.

Mr. BENJAMIN. I hope the gentleman from Indiana will not press the calling up of the bill to which he refers.

The SPEAKER. It is a matter for the committee and not for any member.

Mr. HOLMAN. I am aware of that.

Mr. BENJAMIN. There is an important amendment to the bill to which the gentleman refers which the committee have not examined, and if it comes up at all it is sure to cause discussion and a division. It should be considered by the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Mr. HOLMAN. That would be to defeat it at this stage of the session.

Mr. PERHAM. The committee are particularly desirous that the House shall act upon the general bill, and if there should be time afterward we can take up the bill to which the gentleman refers.

Perhaps a brief statement of the provisions of the bill will facilitate the action of the House in regard to it. It will be recollected that the section of the bill which was attacked with the greatest severity and to which there was the greatest objection made was the third section, the one in reference to that class of widows drawing pensions who live in violation of the marriage laws. An amendment has been prepared to that section which I would be glad under different circumstances to have the House vote upon. It is that whenever any of the persons referred to shall be convicted in any court of competent jurisdiction of the crimes alluded to, then the pension shall be withdrawn. But I do not propose to offer that amendment. The committee have concluded to strike out that section entirely and have freed the bill, so far as they knew, from every provision to which objection was made except the proviso in the present third section of the bill, which will be remembered as the provision relating to the pensioners from whom pensions were withheld from 1865 to 1866. We propose to leave that just as the law of 1866 left it, thinking that under all the circumstances it had better be deferred to be acted on at some future time. I wish to say here that one of these sections extends the time within which applications may be made in order to have the pension date from the time that the right thereto accrued from five to seven years. The committee have some thirty or forty cases of that kind, nearly all of which seem to be meritorious, where good reasons are presented why the parties did not make their applications in time. They have declined to act upon them as individual cases, but they have assured the applicants and their friends in the House here that they would provide for them by a general bill. One section of the bill provides for that. We think an extension to seven years will include them all.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Indiana. I desire to ask the gentleman what is the necessity for this proviso to the third section of the bill.

Mr. BENJAMIN. What is before the House?

The SPEAKER. The chairman of the Committee on Invalid Pensions. [Laughter.]

Mr. BENJAMIN. Is there any question before the House?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Maine has indicated his purpose to bring something before the House, but he has not yet presented it.

Mr. PERHAM. I will present it now.

Mr. BENJAMIN. There seems to be a discussion going on.

Mr. PERHAM, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, then reported a bill (H. R. No. 2020) relating to the operation of the pension laws, and for other purposes; which was read a first and second time.

Mr. PHELPS. I move to dispense with the first reading of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Any member has a right to demand the reading.

Mr. BEAMAN. I demand the reading.

Mr. STEVENS. I suggest that by unanimous consent we consider this bill as in Committee of the Whole, section by section, with discussion under the five minutes rule.

Mr. BEAMAN. I object.

Mr. PERHAM. In regard to the reading of the bill—

The SPEAKER. It must be read, as the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. BEAMAN] has called for the reading of it. Any member has a right to call for the reading of the bill, and it must be read at some stage of its consideration.

The bill was then read. The first section provides that hereafter no claim of a widow for a pension, pay, or bounty on account of the service and death of her husband shall be allowed nor shall payment of such pension, pay, or bounty heretofore allowed be continued in any case when the widow has for five consecutive years immediately preceding his death voluntarily lived separate and apart from him and without receiving from him any support.

The second section provides that pension agents may, under such regulations as the Secretary of the Treasury may prescribe, issue duplicate checks to pensioners in lieu of such original checks as may be lost or destroyed by transmission in the mails and in other cases before the same shall have been received by the pensioner or his or her agent or attorney.

The third section provides that section six of an act relating to pensions, approved July 27, 1868, be, and is hereby, repealed, and the following shall stand in lieu thereof:

That all pensions which have been granted in consequence of death occurring or disease contracted or wounds received since the 4th day of March, 1861, or may hereafter be granted, shall commence from the discharge or from the death of the person on whose account the pension has been or shall hereafter be granted: Provided, That the application for such pension has been or shall hereafter be filed with the Commissioner of Pensions within seven years after the right thereto shall have accrued; except that applications by or in behalf of insane persons and children under sixteen years of age may be filed after the expiration of the said eight years, if previously thereto they were without guardians or other proper legal representatives: And provided further, That nothing in the several acts relating to pensions shall entitle any person who was in the service of the United States between March 3, 1865, and June 6, 1866, as mentioned in section one of an act supplementary to the several acts relating to pensions, approved March 3, 1865, to a pension during such period.

The fourth section provides that in all cases upon the death of any person to whom a pension has been granted, and in every case when any person shall die while an application for a pension is pending, all arrears due such person at the time of his death shall be paid only to such person or persons as would have been entitled to a pension had such deceased person been killed or died of wounds received or disease contracted while in service and in the line of duty, or to such person as the deceased may be indebted to for care and expense during his last sickness, including burial expenses; provided that such arrears, if due a female pensioner, shall be paid only to the children of such deceased, or the person to whom the deceased may be indebted as aforesaid.

The fifth section provides that no pension claim now on file, or hereafter filed, unless proof sufficient to establish the same shall be presented within five years from the date of such filing, shall be allowed without satisfactory record evidence to establish the same; and when so allowed it shall commence from the date of completing the proof.

The sixth section provides that if any person entitled to a pension or bounty shall, by affidavit or otherwise, having guilty knowledge thereof, aid in procuring or attempting to procure any fraudulent claim upon the Government, or knowingly aid in the preparation of any fraudulent paper, or present or cause to be presented such fraudulent paper, to procure the allowance or payment of any such claim, his or her right to such pension shall be forfeited; provided that the forfeiture of the pension shall be only for the lifetime of the original claimant, and shall not affect the right of those who are by law entitled to succeed to the pension, to apply therefor from the date of his death; and no person guilty of aiding in committing the offense specified in this section shall be recognized as an attorney or agent in the prosecution of any claim against the Government.

The seventh section provides that whenever it shall be discovered that any amount of arrears of pay, bounty, or pension has been overpaid any claimant, either by error or by reason of any concealment or misstatement of matter of fact on the part of such claimant, it shall be lawful for the Second Auditor, Second Comptroller, or Commissioner of Pensions to withhold from such claimant the amount of overpayment from any claim pending before either of said officers, and to turn the same into the Treasury of the United States by certificate of deposit to the credit of the appropriation from which the amount was paid.

The eighth section provides that the joint resolution in reference to the collection and payment of moneys due colored soldiers, sailors, and marines, or their heirs, approved March 29, 1867, be, and the same is hereby, amended so as to read as follows:

That all checks, Treasury certificates, and pension warrants hereafter issued in settlement of claims for arrears of pay, bounty, prize-money, pension or other moneys due to the colored soldiers, sailors, or marines, or their legal representatives residing, or who may have resided, in any State in which slavery existed in the year 1860, shall be made payable to the Commissioner of the Freedmen's Bureau, who shall be held responsible for the safe custody and faithful disbursement of the funds hereby intrusted to him; and whenever the claimant shall be properly identified and his account is ready for settlement the amount shall be paid him in current funds and not in checks; and it shall be the duty of said Commissioner, the officers and agents of his bureau, to facilitate as far as possible the discovery, identification, and payment of claimants, and to pay attorneys such fees as are now prescribed by law; but in no case shall any allowance be made for advances or loans claimed by any attorney.

The ninth section provides that all moneys held or disbursed under this act shall be held and disbursed under the same rules and regulations governing other disbursing officers.

The tenth section provides that hereafter all applications for pay, bounty, pension, prize-money, or other moneys in behalf of colored claimants, with the evidence necessary to the correct settlement of the claim, shall be rendered direct to the office of the Commissioner of the Freedmen's Bureau for preliminary examination; that the correctness of the application and that the party claiming is the proper claimant shall then be certified to, when the papers shall be forwarded to the bureau to which they pertain for examination and settlement of the claim; and no claim suspected of being fraudulent shall be settled upon any application now pending in any bureau, filed by attorneys; but the attorneys filing them shall be required to present new applications and submit them to the Commissioner of the Freedmen's Bureau to be examined and disposed of by him the same as original applications under such rules and regulations as he may prescribe.

The eleventh section provides that all officers and agents disbursing money or certifying the correctness of claims under this act shall give bond to the Treasury Department in such sum as the Second Auditor, Second Comptroller, and Commissioner of Pensions may direct for the faithful performance of their trust, and for the reimbursement of money paid upon claims certified by them which may be ascertained to have been paid to any party not entitled thereto; provided that the Secretary of the Treasury, upon the recommendation of the Second Auditor, Second Comptroller, Commissioner of Pensions, and Solicitor of the Treasury, may grant relief upon the bonds in such cases as are deemed by them equitable and just.

The twelfth section provides that all uncalled for moneys shall be disposed of as provided in the act approved March 2, 1867, entitled "An act to regulate the disposition of an irregular fund in the custody of the Freedmen's Bureau;" and that the officers and agents giving bonds as provided in the preceding section of this act shall be allowed such additional compensation, to be paid from the uncalled for funds, as the Commissioner of the Freedmen's Bureau, the Secretary of War, and the Secretary of the Treasury may fix and establish.

The thirteenth section provides that sections twelve and thirteen of an act entitled "An act supplementary to an act entitled 'An act to grant pensions,' approved July 14, 1862," approved July 4, 1864, be, and the same are hereby, amended and reenacted so as to read as follows:

That the fees of agents and attorneys for writing out and causing to be executed the papers necessary to establish an original or a suspended or rejected claim for pension and other allowance before the Pension Office, or for procuring a pension by special act of Congress, shall not exceed the following rates: For making out and causing to be duly executed a declaration by the applicant, with necessary affidavits, and forwarding the same to the Pension Office, with the requisite correspondence, ten dollars; which sum shall be received by such agent or attorney in full for all services in obtaining such pension, and shall not be demanded or received in whole or in part until the certificate for such pension shall be obtained.

The section provides that the sixth and seventh sections of an act entitled "An act to grant pensions," approved July 14, 1862, are hereby repealed.

The fourteenth section provides that any agent or attorney who shall directly or indirectly demand or receive any greater compensation for his services than is prescribed in the preceding section, or who shall contract or agree to prosecute an original or a suspended or rejected claim for a pension, bounty, or other allowance, on the condition that he shall receive a per cent. upon the amount of such claim, or who shall wrongfully withhold from a pensioner or other claimant the whole or any part of the pension or claim allowed and due to such pensioner or claimant, shall be deemed guilty of a high misdemeanor, and upon conviction thereof shall, for every such offense, be fined not exceeding $800, or imprisoned at hard labor not exceeding two years, or both, according to the circumstances and aggravations of the offense.

The fifteenth section provides that section two of an act entitled "An act supplementary to the several acts relating to pensions," approved June 6, 1866, be, and the same is hereby, repealed, and the following shall stand in lieu thereof:

That any pledge, mortgage, sale, assignment, or transfer of any right, claim, or interest in any pension not included in the fee prescribed in the preceding sections, which has been or may hereafter be granted, shall be void and of no effect; and any person acting as attorney to receive and receipt for money not included in such fee for and in behalf of any person entitled to a pension shall, before receiving said money, take and subscribe an oath, to be filed with the pension agent, and by him to be transmitted, with the vouchers now required by law, to the proper accounting officer of the Treasury, that he has no interest in said money, not included in the fee prescribed in the preceding sections, by any pledge, mortgage, sale, assignment, or transfer, and that he does not know or believe that the same has been so disposed of to any person; and any person who shall falsely take the said oath shall be guilty of perjury, and on conviction shall be liable to the pains and penalties of perjury.

The sixteenth section provides that section four of an act entitled "An act supplementary to an act entitled 'An act to grant pensions,'" approved July 14, 1864, be, and the same is hereby, so amended as to empower the clerks detailed by the Commissioner of Pensions in accordance with said section to investigate any violations of the pension laws by any of the agents or employes of the Government or attorneys, claim agents, examining surgeons, or claimants; and for such purposes to examine persons, books, papers, accounts, and premises, to administer oaths, to summon any person to produce books and papers, or to appear and testify under oath, and to compel a compliance with such summons in the same manner as United States commissioners may do.

The seventeenth section provides that section nine of an act entitled "An act supplementary to an act entitled 'An act to grant pensions,' approved July 14, 1862," approved July 4, 1864, be amended and reenacted so as to read as follows:

That those persons, not enlisted soldiers in the Army, who volunteered for the time being to serve with any regularly organized military or naval force of the United States, or where persons otherwise volunteered and rendered service in any engagement with rebels or Indians since the 4th day of March, 1861, shall, if they have been disabled in consequence of wounds received in battle, or who were captured in such temporary service and disabled from disease contracted in rebel prisons, be entitled to the same benefits of the pension laws as those who have been regularly mustered into the United States service; and the widows or other dependents of any such persons as may have been killed in the temporary service aforesaid or who were captured in such service and died in rebel prisons shall be entitled to pensions in the same manner as they would have been had such persons been regularly mustered: Provided, That no claim under this section shall be valid unless presented and prosecuted to a successful issue within five years from and after the passage of this act.

The eighteenth section repeals all acts and parts of acts inconsistent with the foregoing provisions of this act.

Mr. PERHAM. I have been instructed by the Committee on Pensions to move some verbal amendments to section thirteen of this bill, so that it will read as follows:

SEC. 13. And be it further enacted, That sections twelve and thirteen of an act entitled "An act supplementary to an act entitled 'An act to grant pensions,' approved July 14, 1862," approved July 4, 1864, be, and the same are hereby, amended and reenacted so as to read as follows: That the fees of agents and attorneys for writing out and causing to be executed the papers necessary to establish an original or a suspended or rejected claim for pension and other allowance before the Pension Office, or for procuring a pension by special act of Congress, with necessary affidavits, and forwarding the same with the requisite correspondence, shall not exceed ten dollars; which sum shall be received by such agent or attorney in full for all services in obtaining such pension, and shall not be demanded or received, in whole or in part, until the certificate for such pension shall be obtained. And the sixth and seventh sections of an act entitled "An act to grant pensions," approved July 14, 1862, is hereby repealed.

It will be noticed, Mr. Speaker, that there is very little time left in which to dispose of this bill. If we do not dispose of it between now and half past seven o'clock that will be the last of the bill for this Congress.

And allow me to say right here, before we proceed any further, that in addition to the particular sections to which I have already referred there are other sections in regard to frauds that are being committed against the Government. I desire to state the character of those frauds. They obtain chiefly in connection with the claims made by the widows of colored soldiers for bounties and for pensions. Facts have recently been developed going to show that certain claim agents in different parts of the country where these colored people are located have obtained possession of company rolls, by which they have been able to ascertain what colored men have died or been killed while in the military service of the United States. Having done that they select certain names, and in reference to each one they adopt this plan of operations: they call in one of their runners and say to him, "Can you find a widow for this colored man?" To which he replies, "Yes, I guess I can." Then they give him three or four dollars and he goes out and finds some ignorant colored woman, who is induced to go into the claim agent's office and there to affix her mark to some paper which is read to her perhaps in part, and which is a declaration that she is the widow of such or such a colored man who was killed or who died of disease while in the service. And some instances have come to light in which the woman has been questioned a half an hour afterward as to the name of her husband or the man whose widow she personated and she was unable to tell his name.

And it has been ascertained from an examination of claims filed in the Second Auditor's office that one man has certified that he was present at the marriages of eighty of these widows who have made these claims; and he also declares that he was present at the death of all the husbands of these eighty claimants. There have recently been filed in the Second Auditor's office some eight or ten thousand of these claims, of which it is estimated that at least three fourths are forgeries. And what is worse, when the money is paid on these claims it does not go to these colored widows except to a very small extent; but these claim agents manage to retain nearly the whole of it by charging the most exorbitant interest, sometimes upon money they may have advanced three, four, or five hundred per cent., and also by making extraordinary charges for their services. In that way they manage to retain in their possession nearly the whole of the money paid on these claims.

If no steps are taken to correct these evils the Commissioner of Pensions and the Second Auditor of the Treasury Department will be obliged to shut down upon these colored claimants entirely and refuse to settle any of them, although many of them may be meritorious, or they will be obliged to pay the claims that are founded upon fraudulent papers.

Now, the provisions of this bill, as members who have noticed its reading will have observed, is calculated, so far as the Committee on Pensions were able to devise, and so far as the Second Auditor's office and the Pension Office have advised us in regard to this bill, to prevent such frauds as I have described. That is the general purpose of this bill in that respect.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection the amendments of the committee will be regarded as agreed to.

There was no objection.

Mr. HOLMAN. I infer that the gentleman from Maine [Mr. PERHAM] intends to call the previous question on this bill. I ask him to allow me before he does that to submit an amendment to strike out all of the twelfth section after the word "bureau," in the fifth line. The portion which I propose to strike out reads as follows:

And that the officers and agents giving bonds as provided in the preceding section of this act shall be allowed such additional compensation, to be paid from the uncalled-for funds, as the Commissioner of the Freedmen's Bureau, the Secretary of War, and the Secretary of the Treasury may fix and establish.

Mr. PERHAM. This provision, as the gentleman will see, is important with reference to the system which the committee has adopted for the disbursement of these claims.

Mr. HOLMAN. I think that the gentleman from Maine must see the impropriety of allowing any officer to increase without limit the compensation of other officers of the Government. That is the effect of the provision which I desire to strike out.

Mr. BENJAMIN. These officers have to give bonds.

Mr. HOLMAN. I know that; but still their salaries are very good.

Mr. PERHAM. I know that my friend from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] does not wish to antagonize the general provisions of this bill, and if he will defer offering his amendment until another amendment shall have been moved and acted upon, I think he will meanwhile become convinced by examination that the provision to which he now objects is absolutely necessary.

I yield to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. WASHBURN.]

Mr. WASHBURN, of Indiana. I desire to offer an amendment, to strike out the last proviso of the third section, which is in these words:

And provided further, That nothing in the several acts relating to pensions shall entitle any person who was in the service of the United States between March 3, 1865, and June 6, 1866, as mentioned in section one of an act supplementary to these several acts relating to pensions, approved March 3, 1865, to a pension during such period.

Mr. PERHAM. I yield for the purpose of allowing that amendment to be offered, but as gentlemen will see I cannot yield to allow speeches to be made upon it.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Indiana. I move, then, the amendment which I have just stated.

Mr. LOGAN. I move to amend the amendment, by striking out in the proviso the word "entitle," in the nineteenth line, and inserting in lieu thereof the word "deprive;" and by striking out the word "to," in the twenty-fourth line, and inserting in lieu thereof the word "of." The proviso will then read as follows:

And provided further, That nothing in the several acts relating to pensions shall deprive any person who was in the service of the United States between March 3, 1865, and June 6, 1866, as mentioned in section one of an act supplementary to the several acts relating to pensions, approved March 3, 1865, of a pension during such period.

I will explain my object in offering this amendment. I know it has been argued by the Committee on Pensions that persons in the civil service of the United States should not be entitled to receive a pension during the time they are so employed. I could never see any good reason for that position.

Mr. BENJAMIN. Does the gentleman say that the Committee on Pensions have argued in that way?

Mr. LOGAN. I do not say that they argue it here on the floor, but they bring forward in their bill a provision involving that principle, the effect of which will be to deprive of their pensions any persons who were in the civil service of the United States between March 3, 1865, and June 6, 1866.

Now, sir, let me illustrate the position which I take upon this question, and in pursuance of which I have offered my amendment. We have standing at one of the doors of this House a man who in the service of his country lost both his arms, and who cannot possibly earn a living for himself and his family except by some such occupation as that in which he is now engaged here. He has a hook attached to the stump of each arm, and by means of a cord he opens and shuts the door. Now, I ask members of this House whether they think that man is not entitled to a pension because he has been fortunate enough to be appointed one of the attachés to attend the doors of this House. Because a man happens to be called upon to perform a certain duty, or is employed in a civil capacity, whether legless or armless, he is prevented from receiving his pension. It is a great hardship, and I say that it is not a correct principle for this House to insist upon.

We give a pension as a gratuity. We do not give it because he is a poor man or because he is a rich man, but because he has lost a leg or an arm or an eye. It is because the man has been wounded and disabled in the service of his country.

Mr. PERHAM. I must resume the floor, or otherwise we will lose the bill.

Mr. LOGAN. One minute is all I ask. Up in the Departments there are about one hundred and fifty clerks who have been soldiers in the Army and a majority of whom have lost an arm or a leg. Some of them cannot follow any other employment. Some of them write with their left hand. They are there upon very small salaries, which are just enough to keep them. I insist because of that employment their pension shall not be stopped. I want them to receive their pension the same as all others. It is only just and equitable.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Indiana. I will accept the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois as a modification of my own.

Mr. PERHAM. I now yield to the gentleman from Missouri for a minute or two, and when he concludes I shall ask for the vote.

Mr. BENJAMIN. The gentleman from Illinois has very unfairly stated this case. There is no member of the committee who is in favor of depriving these persons of their pensions. On March 3, 1865, Congress passed an act which provided that persons in the civil service at full compensation should not be entitled to pensions. June 6, 1866, Congress repealed the law, and since then pensions are continued to such persons. The law is the same now, and no attempt is made to change it. But there is a class of persons who were in the civil service during that period who have never made application for pensions or whose application was made subsequent to the repealing act; and by a decision of the Secretary of the Interior their pensions will when granted extend back through the fifteen months the law was in force. The committee think they should be on the same footing of those whose cases have been passed upon. This section is to carry out that idea, and that is all of it.

Mr. LOGAN. Let me explain this matter, for I understand it as well as the committee.

Mr. PERHAM. I cannot yield any longer.

Mr. LOGAN. I only ask for half a minute.

Mr. PERHAM. I yield to the gentleman for half a minute.

Mr. LOGAN. I assert this to be the fact, that those men were deprived of their pensions who were unfortunate enough not to put their applications on file at a certain time, while those who did still receive their pensions. My proposition is they shall all be put upon a par, and that they shall all receive their pensions.

Mr. PERHAM. I now demand the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

The question first recurred on the amendment of Mr. WASHBURN, of Indiana, as modified.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 85, noes 26.

The Speaker voted in the affirmative to make a quorum.

So the amendment was adopted.

The bill, as amended, was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. LOGAN moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

JOHN LAW.

Mr. VAN AERNAM. I now move that the House resume the consideration of House bill No. 1972, granting a pension to John Law, which was pending at the expiration of the morning hour some two weeks ago.

The motion was agreed to.

The bill directs the Secretary of the Interior to place upon the pension-roll, subject to the limitations and restrictions of the pension laws, the name of John Law, late private company

I, one hundred and fourth New York volunteers, commencing May 15, 1865.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. VAN AERNAM moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

MARINE HOSPITAL, CHICAGO.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a report of the supervising architect relating to the marine hospital at Chicago, Illinois; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

ART DECORATION OF THE CAPITOL.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of the Interior, in reference to the art decorations of the United States Capitol; which was referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, and ordered to be printed.

BANK OF METROPOLIS, WASHINGTON.

Mr. RANDALL, from the Committee on Banking and Currency, by unanimous consent, presented the following report; which was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed in the Globe:

The Committee on Banking and Currency, which was by resolution of the House of Representatives of December 18, 1868, directed to inquire into the condition of the Bank of the Metropolis, of Washington, which said bank is now in course of liquidation, and whether the public money placed therein had been recovered to the Treasury of the United States, beg leave to report that in obedience to instructions of the House the committee addressed letters of inquiry to the Comptroller of the Currency and the Treasurer of the United States, the replies to which are herewith annexed, together with the original resolution. As an answer to the first portion of the resolution, upon the further inquiry whether any legislation is necessary to prevent in future any loss in public deposits, the committee would state that they have heretofore recommended such legislation as will in their judgment prevent in the future any recurrence of such risk in reference to the funds of the Government deposited in national banking associations as has occurred in the case of the Bank of the Metropolis, of Washington, and that the House has passed the same. The committee therefore desire to be discharged from the further consideration of the subject.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF COMPTROLLER OF THE CURRENCY,
WASHINGTON, January 20, 1869.

SIR: In response to the inquiries contained in the resolution passed by the House of Representatives December 18, 1868, relative to the affairs of the National Bank of the Metropolis, of Washington, and in compliance with your verbal request made by authority of the Committee on Banking and Currency, I have to state that with said bank as a designated depository of Government moneys I have never had anything whatever to do. By the provisions of section forty-five of the national currency act, national banking associations may be designated as depositories of public moneys by the Secretary of the Treasury, who is authorized to require associations so designated to deposit United States bonds "for the safekeeping and the prompt payment of public money deposited with them," &c.

The statement made by the bank in question on the first Monday of October, 1867, showed $400,000 of United States bonds held by the Treasurer of the United States to secure Government deposits; and it showed United States deposits amounting to $552,713 45. This is all the official information I have on that branch of the subject.

The quarterly report made on the first Monday of October, 1868, showed the same amount of securities held by the Treasurer, $470,950 75 of United States deposits, and $1,357 69 deposits to United States disbursing officers. The apparent addition of deposits of United States disbursing officers between October, 1867, and October, 1868, is owing to the fact that the form furnished to the banks for their quarterly reports was so changed as to require statements in greater detail. The item "deposits of United States disbursing officers" was added to the report subsequent to October, 1867, although the money placed under that head was in the bank at the date of said report under the head of "individual deposits." So that it may be safely stated that no Government deposits or deposits of United States disbursing officers were placed in the bank subsequent to its going into liquidation.

In response to that part of the resolution which calls upon the committee to "inquire and report what legislation, if any, is necessary to enable the Comptroller of the Currency to wind up the affairs of a bank which has no office or place of business and stop the payment by the United States of interest to a bank upon a debt which the bank owes to the United States, and to prevent an insolvent bank from becoming a depository for United States disbursing officers," I would respectfully refer to the suggestions contained in my last annual report to Congress, to be found under the head of "Banks in Voluntary Liquidation," on page 21 of said report. So far as interest upon the bonds held by the Department to secure the circulating notes of banks in liquidation is concerned, I think a law compelling banks in that condition to deposit lawful money for their circulation and take up their United States bonds within ninety days from public notice given of going into liquidation would prove a sufficient remedy. I think I have already made it clear that no bank has ever been made a depository of Government money or of United States disbursing officers after it had become insolvent or gone into liquidation. I am quite sure such is the fact, but the Treasurer of the United States will be able to give you positive information upon that point.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, yours,
H. R. HULBURD,
Comptroller.

HON. SAMUEL J. RANDALL,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

TREASURY OF THE UNITED STATES,
WASHINGTON, January 27, 1869.

SIR: Your letter of the 25th instant has been received. The resolution of the House of Representatives, passed December 18, 1868, is herewith returned you as you requested. I answer it and your letter that the National Bank of the Metropolis of Washington was designated as a depository of public money and a financial agent of the Government as early as October 12, 1864. There never has been any other designation of this bank for any purpose whatever. From the day of its designation until the 11th of September, 1868—being nearly two years—it had promptly responded to all requirements and had paid all orders and drafts for money made upon it by this office. On the day last named it failed to comply with my order to deposit $25,000 in the Treasury of the United States. Previous to this time this bank was employed by and did a heavy collecting business for the Treasury in the States then lately in insurrection against the Government of the United States, and in consequence thereof received and at times held large sums belonging to the Treasury of the United States. It held still larger sums of money to the credit of disbursing officers of the Government. The Merchants' National Bank of Washington failed early in May, 1868. This created a panic. The Secretary of War and other officers immediately thereupon ordered all disbursing officers to withdraw their balances from all banks, and to place them in the Treasury. At this time the National Bank of the Metropolis held public moneys as follows:

To the credit of disbursing officers.....	$923,499 99
To the credit of the Treasurer of the United States.....	757,158 31

Total amount of public money in the bank.....$1,685,658 30

Every dollar of these large amounts has since been paid. I have never received any official notice that the bank was in liquidation. The Attorney has all along insisted that it had an office in the city for the transaction of banking business. But the fact that it did not respond to my order to deposit $25,000 in the Treasury in September, 1868, was proof sufficient to satisfy me that the bank deserved to be wound up; yet, for want of legal authority, I was powerless to bring about that result.

The bank was placed in the hands of an attorney, and it was claimed that the interest of the Government would thus be better protected than it would be by the appointment of a receiver. That the whole nominal amount of its indebtedness to the United States has since been paid into the Treasury is pretty strong evidence of the correctness of the course that was pursued in order to secure the payment of this large sum of money. The semi-annual duty levied upon the bank in lieu of taxes has been regularly paid. For the half year ending with 30th June last it paid into the Treasury on this account $959 05. There was a duty due on the 1st instant that will probably amount to about a like sum. This will be retained from the interest that falls due on the 1st of March next on a part of $202,000 of United States stocks still in my hands to secure the redemption of $180,000 of its outstanding circulating notes.

On application I have declined to surrender these stocks, and have stated that should a tender be made of lawful money for the whole amount of outstanding circulation I would refuse to accept it and deliver the stocks to the bank, because I have made a claim upon the bank for interest that accrued on the average balance due from the bank to the Government from the day that it failed to comply with my order to deposit the $25,000 in the Treasury until the day on which the whole balance was finally paid, with, at six per cent., amounts to $72,590 39.

My statement of this claim and the answer of the bank thereto have been referred by the Secretary of the Treasury to the Attorney General. As yet that officer has not given his opinion in the case.

Very respectfully, yours,
F. E. SPINNER,
Treasurer of the United States.
HON. SAMUEL J. RANDALL,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.
WELLS, FARGO AND COMPANY.

Mr. ELA. I move to reconsider the order for printing the evidence taken in the investigation of the contract with Wells, Fargo & Co. The cost will be some sixteen hundred dollars, and inasmuch as all the material facts have been made known in the public press, and as the committee have come to no conclusion in the matter, I think it unnecessary to print the evidence.

The SPEAKER. The motion will be entered on the Journal.

PURCHASE OF ALASKA.

Mr. ELA. I make the same motion in regard to the evidence taken in the Alaska matter. The cost of printing will be $3,000, and as it has gone abroad pretty fully through the Associated Press, I deem it unnecessary to print it.

Mr. MUGEN. Mr. Speaker, I think in this investigation there has been a great deal of smoke and very little fire. Now, I want the order to be executed to show how utterly absurd this whole proceeding has been.

The SPEAKER. Under the rule (page 162 of the Digest) it is in order at any time, even when a member is on the floor, to move to reconsider a vote and have it entered; but it cannot be taken up and considered while any question is before the House. This order to print was made on Saturday, and it is in order to make the motion to-day (Monday) to reconsider it.

Mr. BROOMALL. It is only the order to print the evidence that is moved to be reconsidered.

The SPEAKER. That is all. The motion will be entered.

APPOINTMENT OF MIDSHIPMEN.

Mr. NEWSHAM. I ask unanimous consent to introduce for present action a joint resolution (H. R. No. 472) providing for the filling of vacancies in the Naval Academy from the State of Louisiana.

The joint resolution was read a first and second time. It authorizes the Secretary of the Navy to appoint to present existing vacancies on or before the 1st of July, 1869, midshipmen to the United States Naval Academy from the State of Louisiana, on the nomination thereof by the members from Louisiana in the present Congress.

Mr. BROOKS. I do not know whether to object or not.

Mr. GARFIELD. It only allows the members of Congress from Louisiana to fill the vacancies now existing.

Mr. BROOKS. I do not object.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. NEWSHAM moved to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

Th latter motion was agreed to.

MISCELLANEOUS APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. SPALDING. I move that the rules be suspended, and that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union to proceed to the consideration of the miscellaneous appropriation bill, and pending that motion I move that all debate be closed on the pending paragraph in one minute.

The question being put on the latter motion, there were—ayes 66, noes 26; no quorum voting.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. SPALDING and RANDALL were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 95, noes 24.

So the motion was agreed to.

Mr. SCHENCK. I ask unanimous consent to take up from the Speaker's table the amendments of the Senate to the bill to strengthen the public credit, for the purpose of non-concurring in the same and asking for a committee of conference. The amendments may or may not be modified upon further consideration.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I object.
Mr. SCHENCK. I move to suspend the rules for that purpose.

Mr. SPALDING. I cannot yield for that purpose.

Mr. SCHENCK. Then, be it understood that upon the objection of the gentleman from Massachusetts we cannot get at that bill.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Be it understood that you cannot get at that swindling brokers' bill because of the objection of the gentleman from Massachusetts.

The question being put on the motion of Mr. SPALDING that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole, there were—ayes 69, noes 29; no quorum voting.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. SCHENCK, and Mr. BUTLER of Massachusetts were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 88, noes 26.

So the motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. DAWES in the chair,) and resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 2007) making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1870, and for other purposes.

The CHAIRMAN. When the committee was in session before the recess the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. WILSON] had offered the following amendment:

Page 9, after line two hundred and eleven, insert: For reimbursing the State of Iowa for expenses incurred and payments made during the rebellion, as examined, audited and found due the State by General Robert C. Buchanan's commission, under the act of Congress, approved July 25, 1866, $229,848: Provided, That an amount be appropriated from the Treasury to pay the war claims of the rebellion from all the States which have been reported upon favorably by commissions appointed by Congress.

The gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CLARKE] moved to amend the amendment by adding thereto the following:

To reimburse the State of Kansas for the services and supply of the militia called out by the Governor of Kansas upon the requisition of Major General Curtis to repel the invasion of General Price, $250,000.

The question is on the amendment to the amendment; and all debate is closed by order of the House in one minute.

Mr. CLARKE, of Kansas. I was stating to the House when arrested by the recess that this claim of the State of Kansas stands on precisely the same footing as the claim of the State of Iowa. I have no opposition to make to the claim of the State of Iowa, because I believe, notwithstanding the principle of economy which prevails here, that the Government of the United States can always afford to pay its honest debts. But, sir, by the action of the House, as stated by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. WOOD,] this claim of the State of Iowa was sent to the Committee on Military Affairs with definite instructions to that committee to report, not the claim of the State of Iowa separately for the consideration of the House, but to report the just claims of all the States.

The amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The question recurred on the amendment offered by Mr. WILSON, of Iowa; and being put, there were—ayes 35, noes 58; no quorum voting.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. ALLISON, and Mr. JONES of Kentucky, were appointed.

The committee divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 60, noes 58.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LOGAN. I offer the following amendment, to come in at the end of line two hundred and thirty-one:

For geological surveys of the Territories of Colorado and New Mexico, $10,000; to be prosecuted under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. CLARKE, of Kansas. I move to amend the amendment by inserting after the words "New Mexico" the words "and that part of the State of Kansas west of the one hundredth meridian of longitude."

Mr. LOGAN. If the gentleman will bear me a moment I think he will be satisfied with the amendment and let it stand on its own basis. By reading the report of the Commissioner of the General Land Office gentlemen will see the necessity for this appropriation for the development of these Territories. Nothing tends so much to promote the development of the Territories as these geological surveys. No estimate was made for surveys of these two Territories for some reason that I do not know, and therefore the Committee on Appropriations did not report this item. I understand, however, from those members of that committee with whom I have spoken on the subject that they think this appropriation ought to be made. We make large appropriations for the coast survey and for Army surveys, and no surveys which can be made are more valuable to the country than these geological surveys of the Territories. I hope the amendment will be adopted without any additions to it.

Mr. CLARKE, of Kansas. The amendment which I have proposed to the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. LOGAN] does not in any way interfere with the purpose which he proposes to accomplish by his amendment.

I agree with him that there exists a great necessity for a geological survey and exploration of the Territories of Colorado and New Mexico. But there is an equal necessity for the geological survey and exploration of that most interesting section of country comprised between the one hundredth meridian of longitude and the eastern borders of the Territory of Colorado. It is not a great many years since that most interesting portion of the American continent was laid down on the maps as "the great American desert."

Yet this country has been entered by miners and others, the railroad has been extended into the very heart of that "desert," and explorations have developed the fact that that portion of the American continent promises to become most valuable and interesting. Indeed, during the last year this portion of our country has been visited by some of our most distinguished scientific men, and discoveries have been made in the extent and character of our national resources which promise the most interesting results to our national prosperity in the future. At this moment it is comparatively an undeveloped, and but for the railroad which penetrates it I might say an almost undiscovered country, over which roam vast numbers of buffaloes, elk, antelopes, and other wild animals. In that unexplored region there are vast deposits of salt, iron, lead, copper, tin, and other minerals.

Now, if $10,000 are expended in the geological survey of the country immediately adjoining, I do not think the purpose indicated by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. LOGAN] would be in any way affected injuriously by allowing this geological surveying party to go over the western borders of Kansas and inform the country of the resources there.

Mr. LOGAN. Will the gentleman allow me to make a suggestion right here?

Mr. CLARKE, of Kansas. Certainly.

Mr. LOGAN. My suggestion is that geological surveys of the States are made by the States themselves. The Government of the United States never appropriates money for the geological survey of a State, or of any part of a State. The Government of the United States makes appropriations for surveys of Territories only.

Mr. CLARKE, of Kansas. I have noticed since I have been in Congress that the Government of the United States, and the Congress of the United States especially, occasionally does a new thing. And I think there is no more proper thing to do, nothing that would bring a better return for the amount expended than to let this scientific commission which the gentleman proposes to organize for the exploration of the Territories of Colorado and New Mexico—than to let that commission go over into this interesting portion of Kansas, west of the one hundredth meridian of longitude, and give us the result of their scientific exploration of that region. As I said before, this would in no way defeat the purpose indicated by the gentleman from Illinois. And inasmuch as it will not defeat the object he has in view,

I hope he will not object to the slight amendment I have moved.

Mr. LOGAN. I certainly would interpose no objection to the amendment of the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CLARKE] but for the fact that every State in the Union to-day that desires a geological survey has it done by appropriations made by their own Legislatures. This certainly would be a new kind of legislation, and therefore I hope the amendment will not be adopted.

Mr. RAUM. I think that members may well examine and consider the proposition of my colleague from the State at large [Mr. LOGAN] before they agree to adopt it, and you must bear in mind that if you commence this work you will probably have to appropriate $500,000 in time to perfect these surveys. Ten thousand dollars will not amount to much in a geological survey.

Mr. LOGAN. A moment for explanation which will probably satisfy the gentleman. These surveys in the other Territories have been going on for fifteen years. In Kansas and Nebraska and in many of the Territories there have been surveys, and it is usual to appropriate $5,000 for the survey of a Territory. It is supposed that this will be sufficient to make such a survey as will indicate the general geological characteristics of the Territory. It is all that has been asked heretofore and it is all that is asked now. I say that after $5,000 have been expended in this way in a Territory during its territorial condition, it should when it becomes a State be permitted to take care of such matters for itself.

Mr. RAUM. Let me say that for the purposes of a geological survey the sum of $5,000 scarcely amounts to anything. It might be sufficient for the making of a cursory geological examination and a slight report on the geological characteristics of the Territory, but a regular geological survey of one of these Territories would cost at least $250,000.

Mr. LOGAN. The gentleman will allow me to correct him. If he will read the report of the Commissioner of the General Land Office he will find there a full account of the mineral resources, &c., of Nebraska, which was surveyed by Professor Hayden, only $5,000 having been appropriated for that work. This is all that has ever been asked and all that is asked now.

Mr. RAUM. I suggest, then, that the gentleman add to his amendment the words "and no more."

The amendment to the amendment was not agreed to.

The question recurred on agreeing to the amendment of Mr. LOGAN.

Mr. CAVANAUGH. I move to amend the amendment by striking out "$10,000" and inserting "$15,000," and by inserting after the words "New Mexico" the word "Montana;" so as to make an additional appropriation of $5,000 for a geological survey of the Territory of Montana.

Mr. Chairman, I desire in a few words to call the attention of this committee to the claims of Montana to an appropriation for this purpose. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. LOGAN] says that according to the policy heretofore adopted each of the Territories is entitled to an appropriation of $5,000 for a geological survey. Now, if there be any Territory where such an expenditure should be made it is the Territory of Montana. I beg leave to refer the gentleman from Illinois and other members of this House to the figures exhibited by our official reports in regard to the mineral resources of that Territory. I affirm that Montana has within the last five years contributed more gold and silver, five times over, to the wealth of the nation than has been contributed by the Territories of Colorado and New Mexico combined. In proof of this I refer to the report of J. Ross Browne, made last year. Such being the mineral wealth of Montana I cannot see why she is not entitled to an appropriation of at least $5,000 for a geological survey.

Mr. SPALDING. Mr. Chairman, the Committee on Appropriations have had this subject before them; and while they approve very highly of the efforts of Professor Hayden in his geological explorations, they think that perhaps at this time the Government had better keep the money in the Treasury to meet the interest upon its debt than pay it out to continue what we have been doing heretofore in the way of exploring the mineral resources of those Territories. They thought also that if they should commence with these two Territories of Colorado and New Mexico the others would of course ask, as they are asking, that similar appropriations shall be made for them. I have no particular objection to the proposition of the gentleman from Illinois, if it can be limited to the two Territories which he names; but I think we ought not to go any further.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate is exhausted.

Mr. CAVANAUGH's amendment to the amendment was not agreed to.

On agreeing to the amendment of Mr. LOGAN there were—ayes eighteen, noes not counted.

Mr. LOGAN. I call for tellers.

Tellers were not ordered.

So the amendment was not agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

For fuel and quarters for officers of the Army serving on light-house duty, the payment of which is not made or provided for by the quartermaster's department, $10,000.

Mr. LYNCH. I move to amend by inserting after the paragraph just read the following:

For a light-house on Half-way Rock, Casco bay, Maine, $50,000.

I wish to say that this is one of the most important points on the Atlantic coast. This appropriation was made by the Senate at its last session and was reported in the estimates for the present session. I understand the amendment is assented to by the Committee on Appropriations. I suppose it was omitted through inadvertence.

Mr. SPALDING. It was an oversight, and the amendment ought to be adopted.

The amendment was adopted.

The Clerk read as follows:

For range lights to mark the channel into Presque Isle harbor, Lake Huron, $7,500.

Mr. CHURCHILL. I move the following amendment:

For building light-house on Spectacle reef, Lake Huron, $100,000.

Mr. Chairman, I ask the attention of the gentlemen interested in the commerce of the lakes to a consideration of this amendment. They are aware that the commerce between Lake Huron and Lake Michigan has to pass through the Straits of Mackinaw. Where that narrows lies this Spectacle reef, which is more dreaded by the navigators of those lakes than any other unmarked point. The construction of this light-house is not merely a question of the preservation of property, but a question of the safety of life. These lakes in May and June and October and November, when the commerce on them is the greatest, are swept with continuous storms, and it is necessary that this country, which depends so much for its prosperity upon these navigators, should make ample provision for their safety. I will ask the Clerk to read an extract from a report on the Light-House Board.

The Clerk read as follows:

"Spectacle reef is a very dangerous shoal in Lake Huron, ten miles to the eastward of Bois Blanc light-house. It is in the way of all vessels beating through Lake Huron, and is probably more dreaded by navigators than any other danger now unmarked throughout the entire chain of lakes, and a light-house there would be scarcely second in importance to Waquoitance. The board has recently authorized placing a buoy of the first-class upon it. But this, of course, is of use only in the daytime. The reef is composed of boulders and is exposed to the whole sweep of Lake Huron; therefore the construction of a light-house upon it would be both difficult and expensive. It would cost probably not less than $300,000 to build a proper structure. Large as this sum is the wreck upon it last fall of two vessels at one time involved a loss greater than required to mark the danger, and it is not unlikely that the aggregate of all the losses which have occurred here would build several such light-houses. In view of the great commerce upon the lakes and its prospective increase the board feel that they are justified in now bringing the matter to the attention of Congress, and in submitting an estimate for an appropriation to begin the work."

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I am instructed by the Committee on Appropriations to oppose any appropriations of this sort. You will observe that the theory of the bill is not to start any new light-houses, except where they have already been built and have been destroyed during the rebellion; as, for instance, the light-house at Cape Hatteras and some in the Gulf of Mexico. One or two had to be rebuilt where they had been for a long time. It was thought to be good economy to prevent what was left of the structure going to destruction. If you allow this one you would have to allow others for which there are calls as loud to the extent of $1,500,000. If we yield to this one I do not see why we should not yield to the others. I agree there is no place among those to which I allude where a light-house is more needed than at this; but under the present circumstances, after a great deal of examination, for this was a subject as you must see which called for great circumspection, the committee came to the conclusion not to make an appropriation for any of these new light-houses. Such were the unanimous instructions of the committee.

The amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

Construction branch of the Treasury Department:

For completing main stairway west wing, $8,500.
For fencing and approaches to south front, $20,000.

Mr. SPALDING. I move to add the following proviso:

Provided, The moneys appropriated for the extension of the Treasury buildings shall be disbursed only by one of the regular disbursing clerks of the Treasury Department, who shall receive no extra compensation for his services.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. UPSON. I move to strike out the appropriation of $20,000 for fencing, and I should like to have some explanation of the gentleman from Ohio. I supposed that fencing had already been provided for, and I do not see where this money is to be expended.

Mr. SPALDING. The approaches to the Treasury Department on the south end have never been finished, and this sum was requested for that purpose. It was estimated for and required by the Secretary of the Treasury. The architect of the Treasury was before us this morning, and he states that this is indispensably necessary to complete that part of the building.

Mr. UPSON. Is it intended to pay for putting a curb-stone on the line of the circular road that has been laid out on the south of the President's grounds leading to the Treasury?

Mr. SPALDING. Really I cannot go into the particulars. The matter was explained to the satisfaction of the committee.

Mr. UPSON. I withdraw the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

For laying the foundation and commencing the building for the post office and sub-Treasury in Boston, Massachusetts, $200,000.

Mr. BROOKS. I desire to suggest a point of order for a future purpose. Is this appropriation in order? Under what existing law is it recommended?

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I will state that at the last session the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads reported a bill to buy a site for an office in Boston; and we paid $453,000 for it. The city of Boston, in order that the approaches might be convenient to it, laid out in paving and widening the streets—for they are not very wide in that city—$400,000 more, without any expense to the United States. They also raised the grades and cut down buildings. The consequence is that when the building came to be commenced it was necessary to arrange the grade of the streets to put in the foundations or else it would cost the city some one hundred thousand dollars more and the United States about fifty thousand dollars more to do the work after the grade was altered. Besides, we are laying out of our entire investment in the mean time. Now there was an estimate from the Department of $400,000. The Committee on Appropriations appealed to me not to press it, and although I believe it would be economy to expend that sum, yet in order that we might keep on with this rigid economy which we have tried to bring before the House I consented to have it cut down to the amount contained in the bill.

Mr. BROOKS. Having settled the precedent I withdraw the point of order, and I now propose to amend by inserting the following:

For laying the foundations and commencing the building for the post office in New York, $200,000.

Mr. CHURCHILL. I insist upon the point of order, and desire a ruling upon it.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands it to be in order on the statement of the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. BUTLER.]

Mr. BROOKS. I desire to state that the Federal Government has paid $500,000 for the converging point of the City Hall Park in New York city, property worth $1,000,000, and now I propose to go on with the building just as they have done at Boston. It is exactly a parallel case.

Mr. BENJAMIN. Does the gentleman state that there is an existing law for this post office in the city of New York?

Mr. BROOKS. There is an appropriation for it.

Mr. BENJAMIN. I did not understand that the act we passed last year appropriating money to buy a piece of ground in New York authorized the building of a post office there, but only for the purchase of the ground.

Mr. BROOKS. For the post office.

Mr. BENJAMIN. Perhaps it did so. Appropriating for the purpose of a post office and for building a post office are different things.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair overrules the point of order.

Mr. BROOKS. The city of New York sold property to the Government for $500,000 which is worth over a million, solely and especially for the purpose of a post office. Certainly everybody who has ever been in the city of New York knows that there is need of a new post office there. This is not a post office for the city of New York alone. It is a post office for the whole United States, and not alone for the United States, but it is a post office for the whole world. The foreign mails center there, and it is utterly impossible in the present condition of the existing building to perform the necessary work for the Government. The mails are unsafe. The building is not fire-proof. The business cannot be done there with facility. And if ever the country needed to have a proper post office at that great commercial emporium, it is quite time to commence it now. If a post office is not to be erected there the city will soon claim that that property which was sold for $500,000, and is worth $1,000,000, shall revert to it.

Mr. SPALDING. The difference between New York and Boston is this: the United States purchased at both places a site for a post office. In Boston the people are satisfied with the lot purchased and are ready and anxious to go on with the construction of the building. In New York, I am informed, they are not satisfied.

Mr. BROOKS. Who?

Mr. SPALDING. The people of New York; the citizens are not satisfied to have the post office erected in the park, where the Government has purchased a site.

Mr. BROOKS. Here are six Representatives of the city who do not object.

Mr. SPALDING. The Government did not pay that money with a view to speculation, and if the city of New York wants the lot back again unquestionably they can have it. But I am here to say in behalf of the Committee on Appropriations that if they had been prepared to commence the post office in the city of New York they would have got an equal appropriation, if not a larger one, than that now given to Boston. No one objects to giving to New York at the proper time the necessary appropriation. But we have it from credible authority, from official authority, that they are not yet prepared to commence the post office there.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I was about to say exactly the same thing.

Mr. BENJAMIN. I move to reduce the appropriation $1,000. I do it for the purpose of saying that in my judgment the condition of the Treasury of the United States is such as to forbid our entering at this time upon the expenditure of millions of dollars for new buildings. I understand that neither of these buildings is commenced. We have merely purchased sites for the buildings when we wish to use them for that purpose.

Now, here are two propositions before the committee asking for an appropriation of some four or five hundred thousand dollars at this time. That, we all know, is but the entering wedge for an expenditure of millions of dollars. These, I believe, are the only cases in which the committee ask for appropriations to commence new public buildings. It has been urged here that we have already expended money upon buildings, and that economy requires that we should go on and complete them. To that the House has assented, and voted sums of money for the completion of various buildings. But this is a case of a different character. These appropriations can be postponed. The post office facilities are just as good in the cities of Boston and New York now as they were twelve months ago. I think we should wait until we are in a better financial condition before we enter upon these works. The public debt statements show an increase of indebtedness every month. The debt is growing to giant proportions, and here is a proposition before us to expend millions and millions more for this purpose. I hope the amendment of the gentleman from New York will be rejected, and then I shall move to strike out the original paragraph. I withdraw the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. BROOKS. I move to amend the amendment by increasing the amount $1,000. The gentleman from Missouri can have no idea of the amount of rent paid by the Federal Government for rent for court-rooms and offices for the Federal officers, marshal, deputy marshals, district attorney, and others in the city of New York. It is over twenty-five thousand dollars a year. The building at present occupied as a post office is so inconvenient that more than one third more clerks are needed than would be required in a properly arranged post office. There is no light in the office; gas has to be used all the time. It is an old church, perhaps a hundred years old.

Mr. BENJAMIN. How much does the gentleman estimate that this building will cost?

Mr. BROOKS. I do not know. It must be built some time or other, let the cost be what it may.

Mr. BENJAMIN. I suppose the cost of the building will be two or three million dollars. The gentleman can estimate the interest on that amount and see what it will amount to.

Mr. BROOKS. It must be built some time or other. As the Government is now provided there, there is not a foreign letter that comes through the office that is safe from fire, robbery, and burglary. I do not care anything about this matter simply on account of the city of New York. It is not a New York city post office, but a Federal post office; and the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BENJAMIN] is as much interested in this post office as I am, except that I am a Representative of a portion of the city of New York. I withdraw my amendment to the amendment.

The question was then taken on the amendment of Mr. Brooks; and on a division there were—ayes 37, noes 37; no quorum voting.

Tellers were appointed; and Mr. BENJAMIN and Mr. BROOKS were appointed.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported that there were—ayes 78, noes 42.

So the amendment was agreed to.

The committee rose informally; and the Speaker resumed the chair.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. GORHAM, its Secretary, informed the House that the Senate had agreed to the amendments of the House to Senate bill No. 941, granting a pension to Benjamin C. Stone.

The message further announced that the Senate had disagreed to the amendments of the House to Senate bill No. 900, granting a pension to William B. Looney, of Alabama, and ask a committee of conference upon the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. VAN WINKLE and Mr. WARNER as the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The message further announced that the Senate had passed, with amendments, in which the concurrence of the House was requested, bills of the House of the following titles:

A bill (H. R. No. 1867) for the relief of the Illinois Iron and Bolt Company; and

A bill (H. R. No. 1989) for the relief of Peter McGough, collector of internal revenue and disbursing agent, twentieth district of Pennsylvania.

The message further announced that the Senate had passed a joint resolution, in which the concurrence of the House was requested, of the following title:

A joint resolution (S. R. No. 208) authorizing Commander Charles B. Baldwin, United States Navy, to accept a gold medal from the king of the Netherlands.

MISCELLANEOUS APPROPRIATION BILL.

The Committee of the Whole resumed its session and the consideration of the miscellaneous appropriation bill.

Mr. SPALDING. I move to insert, after the amendment last adopted, the following:

For removing the hydraulic weights and for construction of the northwest stairway in the Treasury building, $10,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

For custom-house in Bangor, Maine, $15,000.

Mr. PETERS. I move to amend the clause just read by striking out "$15,000" and inserting "$25,000." I wish to say to the Committee of the Whole that the estimate calls for the amount I have named. I hold in my hand a dispatch from the resident architect, who is a perfectly reliable gentleman. He says:

I have received your letter. It is impossible to pay existing bills and finish the work for $15,000. Must have amount asked for, which is $25,000; and I will have to exercise great prudence to make that answer. Can prove by figures that I am right.

I wish to say further that the buildings for which this appropriation is asked are the extension and completion of the custom-house, court-house, post office, and offices for the officers of the internal revenue. This amount of $25,000 is the sum required by the estimates to make this completion, and if we do not have that amount now the whole work of all of those offices will go uncompleted until another year.

I supposed from what my colleague, who is on the committee, [Mr. BLAINE,] told me that the Committee on Appropriations had agreed to make the appropriation asked for of $25,000. Now, I have letters from the postmaster of that city, I have been called upon by custom-house officers, I have had all kinds of appeals from the citizens, asking that we shall have now this sum, which is necessary for the completion of this building, appropriated at this time and have an end of the matter. I know, if human testimony can be relied on, that the last dollar of this $25,000 is necessary.

As my colleague [Mr. BLAINE] is well informed with reference to this matter I yield to him the residue of my time.

Mr. BLAINE. I desire to say simply that $25,000 is the amount stated in the estimates for this work. This estimate was made in the belief, as has been stated by my colleague, [Mr. PETERS,] that this amount will finish the building, which is now advanced about seven eighths toward completion. It appears to me it would be very poor economy to dribble out this appropriation of $25,000 between two years. Such a course would only tend to cause delay and would possibly lead to the dilapidation of the building which $25,000 appropriated now will finish at once. I hope the committee will have no hesitation in adopting this amendment.

Mr. SPALDING. I wish to say that the Committee on Appropriations did not feel as if the country were now in a condition to justify us in making appropriations for these custom-houses according to the amounts named in the estimates. Hence they acted as the Committee of the Whole did the other evening in considering the deficiency bill; they concluded that one half the estimated amounts would serve the purpose for the present. Hence, for the custom-house at Bangor they propose to appropriate $15,000 instead of $25,000. Then again, in the next appropriation for the custom-house at Cairo, Illinois, we have named $30,000 instead of $60,000, as proposed in the estimates. Again, in the appropriation for the custom-house at Portland, Maine, which we shall reach very soon, we have fixed the amount at $60,000, while the estimates propose an expenditure of $120,000. Now, if the Committee of the Whole are prepared to double in every instance the appropriations proposed in this bill for custom-houses and court-houses be it so; but the Committee on Appropriations had supposed that this could not well be done at the present time; that these public works could afford to wait for another year before receiving the full amounts estimated, thereby relieving the Treasury in the meanwhile. I hope the committee will not adopt the amendment.

Mr. BLAINE. I beg to say, in answer to my colleague on the Committee on Appropriations, [Mr. SPALDING,] that the case of the custom-house in Bangor, Maine, is entirely different from the other cases which he has named, because in this instance the $25,000 asked for will assuredly complete all that the Government set out to do; while the others are cases of continuous appropriations, which are not expected this year to complete the respective buildings.

Mr. SPALDING. I ask my colleague on the committee whether he did not agree in committee to the amount reported in the bill?

Mr. BLAINE. I agreed to take all that I could get, and was undoubtedly glad to get what the committee propose to appropriate.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Wisconsin. I wish to ask the gentleman from Maine [Mr. BLAINE] and his colleague [Mr. PETERS] whether they will pledge themselves never to ask another dollar for Bangor if we make the appropriation now asked? [Laughter.]

Mr. PETERS. Well, as people say when they are taken into church, "I will." [Laughter.]

Mr. BLAINE. I suppose that the pledge of my colleague is so good that nothing additional is required from me. [Laughter.]

[Here the hammer fell.]

The CHAIRMAN. Debate is exhausted. The amendment was adopted.

The Clerk read as follows:

For court-house and post office, Madison, Wisconsin, $50,000.

Mr. MAYNARD. I move to amend by inserting after the paragraph just read the following:

For the completion of the custom-house, court-house, and post office building at Nashville, Tennessee, in addition to former appropriations, $5,000.

This is a small appropriation, and very necessary. I hope the committee will not hesitate to grant it.

The amendment was adopted.

The Clerk read as follows:

For appraisers' stores, Philadelphia, $25,000.

Mr. HOLMAN. For the purpose of eliciting an explanation, I move to amend by striking out the paragraph just read. I had supposed that the deficiency bill lately passed contained appropriations for all these works.

Mr. SPALDING. The deficiency bill contained appropriations to supply deficiencies for the present fiscal year. The appropriations in this bill are for the same works for the next fiscal year.

Mr. HOLMAN. I withdraw the motion.

Mr. AXTELL. I move to amend by inserting after the paragraph just read the following:

For branch mint at San Francisco, California, $250,000.

I desire to state to the committee that this work has been appropriated for heretofore and is considered very necessary for the public service; that this sum is the sum estimated for; that the building now occupied is insufficient; that the United States is paying rent at the rate of more than twelve thousand dollars a year as accommodation for the branch mint; that the supervising architect is unwilling to go forward and put up the walls; that although a fine lot was bought some three years ago, and although a small sum of money is on hand, probably enough to quarry the stone, yet the supervising architect is unwilling to go forward and put up the work without this additional sum. I stated on the deficiency bill these facts at some length, showing that the branch mint at San Francisco had coined some fifteen or sixteen million dollars in gold, while the parent Mint at Philadelphia had coined only $4,000,000.

I wish to say a word in regard to the fairness of these appropriations. We have no public buildings at San Francisco and the United States is paying rent all over the city. I desire to say on the score of economy that a public building is as much the property of the United States situated in San Francisco as in the city of Washington. You appropriate twenty and thirty thousand dollars for building fences in the city of Washington or in decorating public buildings here, as if they were any more public buildings of the United States because they were in the city of Washington than if situated in New York, Boston, or San Francisco.

In my judgment, Mr. Chairman, it is poor economy on the part of the United States to pay rent when it is able to build. It is poor economy on the part of the United States to continue buildings during five or six years when they could be completed in one year. If we build them at once we do away with the necessity of keeping up architects and superintendents at very high salaries from year to year. The Government paid $100,000 in gold for a lot in San Francisco for the United States branch mint, and an appropriation of $100,000 was made to commence the work, which amount is still on hand. You are lying out of the interest of your money paid for the lot and the interest of the money which you have, while at the same time you are paying rent for the use of the buildings there. Now, sir, what is good economy in an individual is good economy in the Government. We ought to have a building of our own, and I think that a liberal and just Government requires the expenditure of this money.

[Here the hammer fell.]

The committee divided; and there were—ayes twenty, noes not counted.

So the amendment was disagreed to.

Mr. HIGBY. I renew the amendment, making the appropriation $200,000.

Mr. Chairman, I am aware of the difficulty we have in struggling to secure any of these appropriations. My colleague, who more immediately represents the city of San Francisco, cannot feel a deeper interest in this matter than I do myself. A public building there which is necessary to do the Government work not only belongs as a matter of interest to that State, but to the General Government.

As my colleague has stated, the Government to-day is paying a rent for this branch mint of $12,000. It is a small building and entirely inadequate for mint purposes. If the Government constructs a building of its own it will save this $12,000, which is the interest on $200,000, the same interest which we pay on our five-twenty bonds and in reference to which there is so much complaint. We will not only save this interest or rent, but we will also save the interest on the money which we have already appropriated provided we go on and complete this branch mint. There is a lot there owned by the Government which may be sold and will probably bring eighty or one hundred thousand dollars, which may go toward defraying the expense of this building when the branch mint is removed from its present location.

I have no doubt it costs at least $20,000 a year to cover all the expenses, which would not be incurred if the Government had a proper building there. It is a wise economy on our part to go on with this work and complete it at the earliest practicable moment. It is a fact that we are expending yearly in rent more than the interest of the money which would complete the construction of the work.

The present building is entirely inadequate. The labor done there is done at a great disadvantage. I know that it costs more than it should, but that is because the building is not fitted for the purpose. It has not the conveniences and accommodations which are necessary.

Why are such appropriations put in here? Because the Government is paying large amounts of money for the hire of buildings. The expenses on this side of the country are the same as they would be there, with this slight difference that the rate of interest and rents are higher in San Francisco than in Boston when we take into consideration the difference between paper and gold. For that reason it would be economy for the Government to make this appropriation.

The question being put on the amendment of Mr. HIGBY, there were—ayes 19, noes 40; no quorum voting.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. AXTELL and SPALDING were appointed.

The committee divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 51, noes 63.

So the amendment was disagreed to.

Mr. AXTELL. I now move to amend by inserting the following:

For branch mint at San Francisco, $150,000.

I desire to say in regard to the amendments that have been passed for buildings at Madison and Springfield and other points, that were moved to the deficiency bill, gentlemen came in and sustained the appropriations for one half the amount of the estimates.

Mr. SCOFIELD. I ask the gentleman if there is not an appropriation now unexpended of $150,000 for San Francisco? I believe it is the fact and I suppose the gentleman is aware of it. It is probably more than they will need till another appropriation bill is passed.

Mr. AXTELL. The gentleman from Pennsylvania had charge of the deficiency bill, and this appropriation was defeated in the same shape that is now presented here; and I understood him to assure me and others that we should have the money for our mint, but not in that bill. It is true there is a sum of money unexpended in this case, I do not know exactly how much, but I think about one hundred thousand dollars.

Mr. SCOFIELD. One hundred and fifty thousand dollars.

Mr. AXTELL. But it is also true that we have paid $100,000 for the lot and that there is not sufficient money left to go on with the work of building the walls. The lot was purchased in 1866. We are now quarrying the stone and laying out money for superintendence and making preparation for building, but we dare not go on and put up the walls lest we should not be able to inclose them.

Now, sir, I say to the gentlemen on the Republican side of the House that they are not dealing in the spirit of justice with the city of San Francisco. You have given to Boston and to New York liberally in this bill. I am glad of it. You make appropriations for your harbors and rivers, to erect light-houses and remove bars, to erect public buildings in various places, but we on the Pacific cannot obtain a dollar for our harbors and our public works because we are represented by only three members. You combine and carry appropriations for your side because you are strong, but you permit ours to be lost because we are weak. New England obtains all she asks for; her members work well together. Now, sir, let her be fair to San Francisco, whose commerce outranks that of Boston. She pays more money into the Treasury than Boston. You look to our coast for the coin to pay the interest on your public debt. You look there for your revenue to enable you to meet your obligations, and you should not deal with us in a niggardly spirit.

And you men of the Northwest, with your combinations here, are able to get through your appropriations for your buildings and your improvements. Now, the same buildings are required in San Francisco that you require. I assure you we have no post office and no custom-house building, and the Department of War on our coast has no buildings. The Government is renting rooms in various parts of the city. I beg gentlemen to give us this appropriation.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. SPALDING. I ask for a vote on the amendment.

The question was put; and there were—ayes 29, noes 42; no quorum voting.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. AXTELL and Mr. SPALDING were appointed.

The committee divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 61, noes 64.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CLARKE, of Kansas. I move to add to the amendment just adopted the following:

For court-house and post office at Topeka, Kansas, $50,000, to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. HOLMAN. I raise the point of order that this is independent legislation, an original proposition to expend money.

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman from Kansas state if there is any law providing for the erection of this building?

Mr. CLARKE, of Kansas. The amendment speaks for itself.

Mr. SPALDING. There is no law for it.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

The Clerk read the following paragraph:

For court-house, Springfield, Illinois, $25,000: Provided, That the Secretary of the Treasury may, at his discretion, designate any officer of the United States who has given bonds for the faithful performance of his duties, as disbursing agent for the payment of all moneys that are or may be appropriated for the construction of public buildings authorized by law in their respective districts.

Mr. HOLMAN. I move to strike out that paragraph. My motive in making that motion is this: when the deficiency bill was pending an appropriation of $25,000 was inserted in that bill for this purpose, and I certainly understood the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CULLOM] who offered the amendment to say that $25,000 was all that was necessary to complete this building.

Mr. CULLOM. The gentleman misunderstood me. I meant to say that I supposed the amount that was in the regular bill with what I finally succeeded in getting put in the deficiency bill would finish the building, and I hope it will. I knew at the time I offered the amendment that the Committee on Appropriations had allowed $25,000 in this bill, and I believed that if I could get $25,000 more in the deficiency bill the Government might be able to complete the building with that amount. I did not intend to represent that the $25,000 put in the deficiency bill would complete the building.

Mr. SPALDING. Will the gentleman be content with what is in the estimate? The estimate is only $5,000.

Mr. CULLOM. That is for another purpose. The Secretary estimates for $5,000 for the approaches to the building, but that is not reported by the committee.

Mr. HOLMAN. I understand, then, that the amount already appropriated in the deficiency bill is the sum estimated for the completion of the building.

Mr. CULLOM. The amount estimated to complete the building is $50,000. Twenty-five thousand dollars has already been put in the deficiency bill, and this is $25,000 in the regular bill for next year.

Mr. HOLMAN. I withdraw the amendment.

Mr. MULLINS. I offer the following amendment:

For post office and custom-house at Nashville, Tennessee, $20,000.

Mr. Chairman, I gave the committee the other night all the arguments and all the evidences touching the propriety of this amendment. I merely desire to add now a statement of interest lost which I have hastily summed up. You appropriated $100,000 for this purpose in 1852 or 1853. I put it at fifteen years, although that would make it seventeen. You have lost every dime of interest on that $100,000, which would amount to $90,000 in fifteen years, and in addition to that you have been paying on an average $1,500 a year in rent for buildings for those fifteen years, which would make nearly one hundred thousand dollars in all. We never had a building of this character in the city of Nashville. I do not represent that district directly, but I claim that I represent the State and the United States in part, and I am for doing justice to all parts of it. I cannot, under my oath, stand here and say that I am for an appropriation for one spot and against appropriations for others.

And I ask if the Government does not need an office in the city of Nashville as much as it does at any other point that has no more inhabitants than the State of Tennessee? Nashville is one of the great central points of the State. It is located on the banks of a navigable stream; of a stream that for nine or ten months of the year has not its equal there in point of its length, being some ten or twelve hundred miles long. Then there are railroads centering at that city which carry the mails there, and from there all through the South. And yet, my dear sir, there is not a public building in the shape of a post office or custom-house in that city. In addition to that they pay a rent of $1,000 a year for a revenue office and $1,500 a year for a post office, making $2,500 a year the Government is paying out there. I now leave the matter to the House.

The question was taken upon the amendment of Mr. MULLINS; and upon a division there were—ayes ten, noes not counted.

Before the result of the vote was announced, Mr. MULLINS called for tellers.

The question was taken upon ordering tellers; and there were seven in the affirmative.

So (the affirmative not being one fifth of a quorum) tellers were not ordered.

Accordingly the amendment of Mr. MULLINS was not agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

INTERIOR DEPARTMENT.

Rent of office for surveyors general:
For rent of surveyors general's office in the Territory of Dakota, fuel, books, stationery, and other incidental expenses, $2,000.

Mr. LOGAN. I move, with the consent and approval of the Committee on Appropriations, to insert the following after the paragraph last read:

For the continuance of the geological survey of the Territories of the United States by Professor Hayden, under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior, $10,000.

I have drawn this amendment so that there can be no objection to it on the part of any of the territorial Delegates, as it applies to all the Territories. I have but one other remark to make. Not more than half an hour ago we voted to appropriate, according to a calculation I have made, the sum of $450,000 for a continuation of the Coast Survey.

The amendment of Mr. LOGAN was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

For finishing the work on the north front of the Patent Office building, and for improving G street from Seventh to Ninth street, $10,000: Provided, That the corporation of Washington city cause the north half of G street, between Seventh and Ninth streets, to be paved at the same time, the cost thereof to be assessed against the private property fronting thereupon in the manner usual in cases of such improvements.

Mr. SPALDING. I move to amend this paragraph by striking out "$10,000" and inserting "$8,500;" that is sufficient.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Smithsonian Institution:

For the preservation of the collections of the exploring and surveying expeditions of the Government, $4,000.

Mr. GARFIELD. I move to amend this paragraph by striking out "$4,000" and inserting "$10,000." And I wish briefly to call the attention of the Committee of the Whole to the facts upon which I base my motion.

In 1846, when the Smithsonian Institution was founded, the Government of the United States, by a law of Congress, transferred to that institution all the articles now belonging to the museum which the Government then owned. At that time it was costing $4,000 a year to take care of and preserve those articles. Since then a great number of exploring expeditions have been sent out by the Government, and large additions have been made to the museum. And the actual cost of taking care of and keeping the articles which the Government now owns amounts to more than $10,000 a year. Having imposed this duty upon the Smithsonian Institution, it is wrong for the Government to ask that institution to pay $6,000 out of its own fund—donated by a foreigner to the cause of science in this country—for the care, preservation, and custody of Government property, to say nothing of the use of the building for that purpose.

Mr. MAYNARD. What are the items of the expenditure for that purpose? It certainly is not all for personal supervision.

Mr. GARFIELD. Only so far as the Board of Regents have to employ persons to take care of and watch that these things are properly guarded. I have here a memorial of the Board of Regents, of which I am a member. It is signed by the chancellor of the institution, Chief Justice Chase, and by the secretary of the institution, Professor Henry. Accompanying that is a detailed statement of the expenses of the National Museum for the year 1868. I ask the attention of members to these papers, which are as follows:

To the honorable the Senate and House of Representatives in Congress assembled:

In behalf of the Board of Regents of the Smithsonian Institution the undersigned beg leave respectfully to submit to your honorable body the following statement, and to solicit such action in regard to it as may be deemed just and proper:

The act of Congress organizing the institution ordered the erection of a building which should accommodate on a liberal scale, besides a library and a gallery of art, a museum consisting of all the specimens of natural history, geology, and art, which then belonged to the Government, or which might thereafter come into its possession by exchange or otherwise. Although the majority of the regents did not consider the maintenance of these objects to be in accordance with the intention of Smithson, as inferred from a strict interpretation of the terms of his will, yet in obedience to the commands of Congress they proceeded to erect a building of the necessary dimensions, and to take charge of the Government collections.

The erection and maintenance of so large and expensive an edifice, involving an outlay of $450,000, and the charge of the Government museum, have proved a grievous burden on the institution, increasing from year to year, which, had not its effects been counteracted by a judicious management of the funds, would have paralyzed the legitimate operations of the establishment and frustrated the evident intention of Smithson.

It is true that Congress at the time the specimens were transferred to the institution granted an appropriation of $4,000 for their care and preservation, that being the equivalent of the estimated cost of the maintenance of these collections in the Patent Office where they had previously been exhibited. But this sum, from the rise in prices and the expansion of the museum by the specimens obtained from about fifty exploring expeditions ordered by Congress, scarcely more than defrays, at the present time, one third of the annual expense. In this estimate no account is taken of the rent of the part of the building devoted to the museum of the Government, which at a moderate estimate would be $20,000 per annum.

Besides the large expenditure which has already been made on the building, at least $50,000 more will be required to finish the large hall in the second story necessary for the full display of the specimens of the Government. But the regents do not think it judicious further to embarrass the active operations for several years to come by devoting a large part of the income to this object, and have therefore concluded to allow this room to remain unfinished until other means are provided for completing it.

It is not by its castellated building nor the exhibition of the museum of the Government that the institution has achieved its present reputation, nor by the collection and display of material objects of any kind that it has vindicated the intelligence and good faith of the Government in the administration of the trust; it is by its explorations, its researches, its publications, its distribution of specimens, and its exchanges, constituting it an active, living organization, that it has rendered itself favorably known in every part of the civilized world, has made contributions to almost every branch of science, and brought more than ever before into intimate and friendly relations the Old and the New Worlds.

A central museum for a complete representation of the natural products of America, with such foreign specimens as may be required for comparison and generalization, is of great importance, particularly as a means of developing and illustrating our industrial resources, as well as of facilitating the study of the relations of our geology, mineralogy, flora and fauna, to those of the Old World. But the benefit of such an establishment is principally confined to this country, and does not partake of the cosmopolitan character of an institution such as Smithson intended to found, and therefore ought not to be supported from his bequest.

The Board of Regents are confident that upon a full consideration of the case your honorable body will grant an adequate support for the collections of the Government, and also an appropriation for finishing the repairs of the building, and eventually, when the financial condition of the country will permit, for the independent maintenance of a national museum.

It may not be improper in addition to what has been said to recall the fact that the Smithsonian Institution has transferred, without cost, to the library of Congress, one of the most valuable and complete collections of the transactions of scientific and learned societies and serial publications in existence, consisting of at least fifty thousand works, which, with the annual continuations of the same series, must render Washington a center of scientific knowledge, and the library itself worthy of the nation; and that it has also presented to the Government its valuable collection of specimens of art, illustrating the history of engraving from the earliest periods. It is prepared to render a similar service to a National Museum, by the exchanges from foreign museums to which it has been a liberal contributor, and which may be obtained as soon as means are provided for their transportation and accommodation.

It may also be mentioned that the Institution has rendered important service to the Government through the scientific investigations it has made in connection with the operations of the different Departments, and it is not too much to say that through the labors of its officers it has been the means of saving millions of dollars to the national Treasury.

In conclusion your memorialists beg leave to represent on behalf of the Board of Regents that the usual annual appropriation of $4,000 is wholly inadequate to the cost of preparing, preserving, and exhibiting the specimens, the actual expenditure for that purpose in 1867 having been over twelve thousand dollars; and they take the liberty of respectfully urging on your honorable body the expediency of increasing it to $10,000, and that a further sum of $25,000 be appropriated at this session of Congress toward the completion of the hall required for the Government collections.

And your memorialists will ever pray, &c., &c.

S. P. CHASE,
Chancellor Smithsonian Institution.
JOSEPH HENRY,
Secretary Smithsonian Institution.

The following is a statement of the expense of the National Museum for the year 1868:

Glass for cases.....	$154 33
Carbolic acid, insect powder, and arsenic.....	72 85
Glass bottles and jars.....	96 68
Trays.....	180 01
Wrapping-paper.....	63 90
Benzine, paint, oil, varnish, putty, brushes	201 87
Sauces for nests and eggs.....	22 30
Stationery, index-books, and blanks.....	123 57
Labels for specimens.....	208 04
Locks, keys, handles, funnels, measures, tools, cans, &c.....	185 05
Paper and poison for plants.....	347 20
Numbers and labels for minerals.....	94 41
Examination, cleaning, assorting, and labeling shells.....	1,163 95
Books for proper labeling specimens.....	430 47
Tow for stuffing large animals (bears).....	24 90
Artificial eyes for birds, &c.....	35 95
Packing boxes.....	50 40
Alcohol.....	400 00
Mounting birds, beaver, &c.....	195 50
Freight on collections.....	1,200 00
Walnut cases for specimens.....	1,100 00
Heating room for collections.....	500 00
Assistants, one at $2,500, one at $600, one at $500, and one at $300.....	3,900 00
Laborers and watchmen, one at $840, one at $660, one at $600, one at $312, and one at $312.....	2,724 00
	$13,480 38

In addition to the foregoing, $125,000 have been expended since the fire in 1865 on that part of the building required for the accommodation of the museum, the interest on which at six per cent. would be $7,500 annually.

The bequest to found this institution was from a foreigner who never visited the United States. He bequeathed his fortune with unreserved confidence to our Government for the advancement of science, to which he had devoted his own life. The sacredness of the trust is enhanced from the fact that it was accepted after the death of him by whom it was confided. The only indications of his intentions which we possess are expressed in the terms of his will. It therefore became of the first importance that the import of these terms should be critically analyzed and the logical inference from them faithfully observed. The whole is contained in these few and explicit words:

"To found at Washington, under the name of the Smithsonian Institution, an establishment for the increase and diffusion of knowledge among men."

These terms have a strictly scientific import, and are susceptible of a series of definite propositions.

First. The bequest is for the benefit of mankind; not to be confined to one country, to one race, but to all men of all complexions.

Second. The objects of the institution are primarily to increase, and secondly, to diffuse knowledge among men, and these objects should not be confounded with each other.

The will makes no restriction of any kind of knowledge, hence, every branch of science capable of advancement is entitled to a share of attention.

Though the terms of the will are explicit and convey precise scientific ideas to those who are acquainted with their technical significance, yet to the public generally they might seem to admit of a greater latitude of construction than has been put upon them. It is, therefore, not surprising that at the commencement improper conceptions of the nature of the bequest should have been entertained or that Congress in the act of organization should direct the prosecution of objects incompatible with the strict interpretation of it or to impose burdens upon the institution tending materially to affect its usefulness.

The principal of such burdens was the direction to provide a building on an ample scale to make provision for the accommodation of the collections of Government, consisting of all the specimens of nature and art then in the city of Washington or that might thereafter become the property of the Government by exchange or otherwise.

Though the majority of the Board of Regents did not consider the expenditure of a large amount of the income on this subject in accordance with the will of Smithson, they could not refuse to obey the injunction of Congress and proceeded to erect an extended building and to take charge of the museum of the Government. The cost of this building, which at first was $325,000, has been increased by the reparation of damages caused by the fire to $450,000, the whole of which has been defrayed from the annual income. Notwithstanding this burden the institution has achieved a reputation as wide as the civilized world, has advanced almost every branch of knowledge, and presented books and specimens to hundreds of institutions and societies in this country and abroad.

It is not a mere statistical establishment, as many may suppose, supporting a corps of individuals whose only duty is the exhibition of the articles of the show museum; but a living, active organization that has by its publications, researches, explorations, distribution of specimens and exchanges, vindicated the intelligence and good faith of the Government in administering a fund intended for the good of the whole community of civilized men. It has at the same time collected a library, principally of the transactions and proceedings of learned societies, the most perfect one of the kind in the world, consisting of fifty thousand works; also a collection of engravings illustrative of the progress and early history of the art, both of which it has transferred to the Library of Congress. It is not alone the present value of the books which it has placed in the possession of the Government, but also that of the perpetual continuation of the several series contained therein.

The institution has continued to render important service to the Government from its first organization until the present time by examining and reporting on scientific questions pertaining to the operations of the different Departments, and in this way, particularly during the war, it is not too much to say that it has saved the United States many millions of dollars.

Let me say one word more before leaving this subject. As I have shown, the real purpose of the donation of Smithsonian which the Board of Regents have tried to promote as well as they could was to extend and circulate means of scientific information; and the management of the institution has always resisted the tendency to keep up and increase this museum at the expense of this fund.

Recently the institution has given over to the Library of Congress a collection of fifty thousand volumes, constituting probably the most perfect scientific library in the world. But we are still charged as an institution with the cost of this rapidly-increasing museum. Now, the Regents would be glad if Congress would take this museum off their hands and provide otherwise for the care of it. It is a charge imposed upon the institution by law, a charge which it never sought and is not desirous to retain. At the time when this museum was first placed in the custody of the institution it cost but $4,000 a year to keep it in the Patent Office. Now the care of that museum costs three times that amount. I hope therefore that the committee will vote $10,000 instead of $4,000 for this purpose.

Mr. SPALDING. Mr. Chairman, I am very sorry to find the Smithsonian Institution among the leeches that are all the while crying to the Treasury of the United States, "Give, give!" The Smithsonian is a wealthy institution. The Government of the United States is continually paying it gold interest on the large fund belonging to the institution; but the institution is not willing to bear this little additional expense, as it is called, from its own means, but wishes to obtain the money from the public Treasury. The men who pay the taxes must contribute this additional sum to this wealthy institution.

Sir, we have loaned to that institution the National Museum. We have paid the institution for a series of years $4,000 annually in cash for taking care of that museum. The institution has been content with that sum heretofore; but now it comes in and asks an appropriation of $10,000 for this purpose. Sir, we had better take away the museum from the care of that institution. I had almost said we had better throw it into the Potomac than be constantly paying these increased demands from the Smithsonian Institution. That is the light in which the committee have viewed the subject; and in that light they protest against this increase.

The amendment was not agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

For surveying the public lands in Dakota Territory, including the lands along the Red River of the North, at rates not exceeding ten dollars per mile for standard lines, seven dollars for township and six dollars for section lines, $15,000.

Mr. SPALDING. I move to amend by striking out in the paragraph just read the words "including the lands along the Red river of the North."

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

For surveying the public lands in Nebraska Territory, at rates not exceeding ten dollars per lineal mile for standard lines, six dollars for township and five dollars for section lines, $40,000.

Mr. SPALDING. I move to amend the paragraph just read by striking out after the word "Nebraska" the word "Territory."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. TAFTE. I move to amend the paragraph by striking out the word "six" and inserting "seven," and by striking out "five" and inserting "six;" so that the paragraph will read as follows:

For surveying the public lands in Nebraska, at rates not exceeding ten dollars per lineal mile for standard lines, seven dollars for township and six dollars for section lines, $40,000.

Mr. Chairman, I do not propose in this amendment that the aggregate amount appropriated for this surveying shall be increased. I simply propose that the rate of payments shall be increased so that the contracts can be let. I propose to allow the same rate that is allowed in Minnesota and in Dakota Territory. I am informed and believe that the surveyor general cannot let the contracts at the rates named in the paragraph.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

For surveying the public lands in Colorado, at rates not exceeding fifteen dollars per lineal mile for standard lines, twelve dollars for township and ten dollars for section lines, $30,000.

Mr. CHILCOTT. I move to amend the paragraph just read by striking out "$30,000" and inserting "$60,000."

The amendment was not agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

For surveying the public lands in Idaho, at rates not exceeding fifteen dollars per mile for standard lines, twelve dollars for township and ten for section lines, $15,000.

Mr. STOVER. I move to strike out "fifteen" and insert "twenty-five," so as to increase the appropriation to $25,000.

I see, Mr. Chairman, that the appropriation for surveying the public lands in Montana Territory is $25,000, and that the appropriation for surveying the public lands in Utah Territory is $25,000. I think that Idaho equals in importance either of those Territories for which these appropriations are made. I do not see why the same sum should not be allowed to Idaho, and I have therefore moved the amendment.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 27, noes 38, no quorum voting.

Mr. HOLBROOK demanded tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. STOVER, and Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts, were appointed. The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 63, noes 56.

So the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

For surveying the public lands in Nevada Territory, at rates not exceeding fifteen dollars per lineal mile for standard lines, twelve dollars for township and ten dollars for section lines, $40,000.

Mr. SPALDING. I move to strike out the word "Territory."

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

For surveying the public lands in Oregon, at rates not exceeding fifteen dollars per lineal mile for standard lines, twelve dollars for township and ten dollars for section lines, $40,000.

Mr. SPALDING. I move to add the following:

Provided, That for surveying the timber lands lying west of the coast range of mountains the same pay may be allowed for township and section lines as is allowed for standard lines.

I am told that the nature of the country demands that.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

For surveying the public lands in Utah Territory, at rates not exceeding fifteen dollars per mile for standard lines, twelve dollars for township and ten dollars for section lines, $25,000.

Mr. SPALDING. By some mistake that appropriation has been printed $25,000. It ought to be $10,000, and I move to reduce it to that sum.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

For surveying the public lands in the Territory of Wyoming, at rates not exceeding fifteen dollars per mile for standard lines, twelve dollars for township and ten dollars for section lines, $15,000.

Mr. DODGE. I move to increase that appropriation to $25,000. There is not an acre of land, not a standard line or a township line yet surveyed in the Territory of Wyoming. This would not survey a single acre and put it in the market. A large number of settlers wish to enter their lands, but this amount would not run the base lines and the township lines. The other amount would subdivide some and allow the lands to be entered on the east base of the Black Hills.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

For surveying that part of the eastern boundary of Colorado Territory which lies between the thirty-seventh and fortieth parallels of north latitude, estimated two hundred and ten miles, at rates not exceeding twelve dollars per mile, $2,520.

Mr. CHILCOTT. I move to strike out all after the word "miles," in line five hundred and eighty, down to the word "dollars," in line five hundred and eighty-one, and in lieu thereof to insert "at rates not exceeding thirty dollars per mile, $6,300."

Mr. Chairman, I presume the committee is aware that a boundary line cannot be made with the proper monuments for twelve dollars per mile. It cost the Government sixty dollars per mile to survey the line between New Mexico and Colorado, and I observe that the committee have reported twenty-five dollars per mile for the survey of the northern boundary of the State of Nevada, and it most certainly will cost as much to do the same work in Colorado.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. CLARKE, of Kansas. I move to amend by making it twenty-five dollars per mile. I undertake to say, and I think my statement will be taken by any gentleman acquainted with surveying in that locality, that it will be absolutely impossible to run a proper boundary line for twelve dollars per mile. I therefore hope the committee will make this increase so as to have the survey done in a proper manner.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

For surveying the northern boundary of Nevada, estimated three hundred and ten miles, at rates not exceeding twenty-five dollars per mile, $7,750.

Mr. SPALDING. I am instructed by the committee to move to insert the following:

To complete the survey of the western boundary of Nebraska, $3,200.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

For lighting the Capitol and President's House and public grounds around them and around the executive offices, $30,000.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Wisconsin. I move to add at the end of this paragraph the following:

And the act incorporating the Washington Gas-Light Company is hereby so amended as to prohibit said company after July 1, 1869, from receiving more than twenty-eight cents per hundred feet of gas furnished by it to the Government and thirty cents to other customers, subject to a discount of not less than ten per cent. on all bills for gas if paid at the office of said company within five days after the rendition thereof; and said company shall furnish gas of a quality equal to that consumed in the city of Philadelphia.

Mr. MYERS. I raise the point of order that this is independent legislation.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Wisconsin. I then move to strike out the whole paragraph. I regret that the gentleman should make the point of order on the amendment.

Mr. MAYNARD. I understand the amendment just proposed and objected to merely directs the method of spending this appropriation contained in the paragraph to which it is proposed to be added.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands the amendment proposes to amend the charter of the gas company.

Mr. MAYNARD. I did not understand it to have that effect.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Wisconsin. In 1860 this House made an amendment to an appropriation bill limiting the price of gas to $3 35 per thousand feet. In 1862 Congress still further reduced the price to three dollars per thousand for the public and $2 80 for the Government. Those amendments came in upon appropriation bills precisely, I suppose, as this does now. In 1864 the gas company came into Congress and said the price of coal had advanced so much, to wit, to $13 88 per ton, as was asserted, that it was necessary they should have an advance in the price of their gas. Accordingly, a law was passed in January, 1865, authorizing them to charge four dollars per thousand feet to the public and a trifle less to the Government. Now, sir, that reason no longer exists. Instead of coal costing them $13 88, as was then claimed, it can be had here now for less than five dollars a ton; so it will be perceived that there is the greatest reason possible for this reduction. And, sir, there is justice in the complaint of the people of this city that an exorbitant price is charged for gas. And I will say further, that the gas in this city is the meanest that I know of in any city of the United States. Therefore, in the amendment I desired to offer, I proposed to reduce the price of gas to a reasonable figure, fixing the standard of the quality. I certainly hope a matter so just to the people of Washington will receive the favorable consideration of this House. The Government itself is now paying over one hundred thousand dollars a year for gas.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. MYERS. I do not desire to discuss the merits of the proposition with my friend. I simply wish to state, although I did not think the point was debatable, that this is sprung here at a point where the parties interested are not able to meet it. It is not appropriate in a bill of this kind.

Mr. RANDALL. I make the point of order that this whole discussion is out of order.

Mr. MYERS. I think my colleague is right; but as the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. WASHBURN] was allowed to make a statement, I desire to give my reasons for raising the point of order. I am unprepared to combat what my friend from Wisconsin has said.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Wisconsin. I would ask the gentleman what is the price of gas in Philadelphia?

Mr. MYERS. The price is different in various places. In some places it is as high as four dollars per thousand feet, and here it is but $3 40, with the Government tax of twenty-five cents off. But we are not prepared to discuss the question now. The parties struck at are not prepared, and the proposition is not in order on this bill.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Wisconsin. I withdraw my amendment.

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Ohio. I would ask if the Chair has ruled on the point of order?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustained the point of order.

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Ohio. I move to strike out the whole clause. It is perfectly manifest from the remarks of the gentleman who has just taken his seat that the price of gas here is too high, and if the gentleman makes the point of order that we cannot legislate to do justice to the Government and protect the interests of the Government we can at least furnish a remedy by withholding all pay; for we are not bound to purchase gas or pay for it when we do not buy it. I hope the committee will strike out this provision until this gas company shall come to something like reasonable terms. The agents of the gas company are always ready to maintain its rights and its interests, and it is our duty to stand by the interests of the Government and see that the Government is not fleeced. I hope the committee will strike out the entire appropriation.

Mr. MYERS. I have only to say in reply that I believe the price of gas is lower here than it is in Philadelphia, and they have to pay freight upon the coal here. At all events these matters are worthy of discussion. It is proper that we should know the facts. I myself am not fully in possession of them, and for that reason, and for that alone, I insisted on the point of order.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Wisconsin. I move to reduce the amount of the appropriation $1,000; and I do it simply for the purpose of saying to the gentleman from Pennsylvania that gas can be manufactured cheaper here than in Philadelphia, and that the price in Philadelphia, New York, and Boston is only $2 50 per thousand feet. Cumberland coal can be laid down in Washington cheaper than it can in Philadelphia, and some of the best gas coal in the country comes from the Cumberland mines.

Mr. MYERS. I ask my friend whether Cumberland coal is gas coal?

Mr. WASHBURN, of Wisconsin. Yes, sir. I withdraw the amendment.

Mr. BENJAMIN. I move to add to the paragraph the following proviso:

Provided, That no greater sum than $2 80 per one thousand cubic feet shall be paid for the gas for which this appropriation is made.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Wisconsin. That is good as far as it goes, but it gives no relief to the people of Washington city.

Mr. BENJAMIN. I presume that amendment is in order. We certainly have a right to limit this appropriation, and if we cannot get at the root of the evil let us at least lop off as much as we can. There is no question that the Government is imposed upon by this gas company, and not only the Government, but the people of the city of Washington. There is no question about that, and if the gentleman makes the point of order and prevents our legislating so as to relieve the people, let us do what we can to protect the interests of the Government.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Wisconsin. If my friend will allow me I will move that the committee rise for the purpose of moving in the House to suspend the rules to enable me to offer the amendment which I proposed and which was ruled out of order.

Mr. BENJAMIN. It must be apparent to the gentleman that there is not a quorum in the House and a division would cause a breaking up of the committee. I hope we shall vote on this amendment.

Mr. KOONTZ. I rise to oppose the amendment offered by the gentleman from Missouri; and I do so for the purpose of stating that this whole question was before the Committee for the District of Columbia at the last session, and upon investigation we found that in forty of the principal cities of the United States the average cost of gas is $3 83 per one thousand feet, and I believe that gas is now being manufactured and furnished here as cheaply as it can be considering the cost of transportation. That is all I have to say.

Mr. BENJAMIN'S amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Ohio. I withdraw the motion to strike out the paragraph.

The Clerk read as follows:

For refurnishing the President's House, $25,000.

Mr. MAYNARD. I move to amend the clause just read by striking out "$25,000" and inserting "$40,000." I make this motion for the purpose of inquiring of the gentleman who has charge of this bill why the amount appropriated for this purpose is limited to $25,000? If I remember aright this sum was appropriated at the commencement of President Lincoln's administration, in 1861, for refitting and refurnishing the President's House. It was found, however, that that sum was not sufficient for the purpose, and another sum of an equal amount was appropriated, I believe. And also at the commencement of the present Administration a larger sum was found necessary for this purpose than is here proposed. I would inquire if a less sum is required for the incoming Administration than was required for the present and the last Administrations?

Mr. SPALDING. We have complied with the estimate. The usual estimate at the commencement of every quadrennial period is $25,000. At the commencement of the present Administration we were obliged, under peculiar circumstances, to appropriate for this purpose somewhere from sixty to eighty thousand dollars. But at the present time the house and the furniture are in a very fair condition; in a very good condition compared to what they were four years ago, and the Committee on Appropriations believe—they have no reason to believe to the contrary—that $25,000 will be ample for this purpose at the present time.

Mr. MAYNARD. I withdraw my amendment.

Mr. LOGAN. I move to amend by inserting the following after the clause last read:

For the purchase of a portrait of the late President Abraham Lincoln, to be placed in the Executive Mansion, $3,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary: Provided, That said portrait shall be selected by the incoming President of the United States.

I desire to say but one word in support of my amendment. I believe the late President, Abraham Lincoln, is the only one of all the Presidents of the United States whose portrait is not now in the White House. My amendment provides that the incoming President, General Grant, shall select such portrait of President Lincoln as he may deem proper, to be placed in the White House, provided it shall not cost over $3,000.

The amendment of Mr. LOGAN was adopted.

Mr. SPALDING. I am instructed by the Committee on Appropriations to offer the following, to come in immediately after the amendment just adopted:

For the repair and preservation of the mansion of George Washington, now the property of the Mount Vernon Ladies' Association, to be expended under the direction of the officer in charge of the public buildings and grounds, $7,000.

I suppose this amendment needs no explanation from me.

The question was taken upon the amendment of Mr. SPALDING; and on a division there were—ayes 35, noes 34; no quorum voting.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. SPALDING and Mr. COBB were appointed.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported that there were—ayes 56, noes 62. So the amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. PHELPS. I renew the amendment just offered by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. SPALDING,] except that I make the sum to be appropriated $6,000.

Mr. PAINE. I rise to a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state his point of order.

Mr. PAINE. My point of order is that the amendment of the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. PHELPS] involves new legislation and is not in order in an appropriation bill. There is no law authorizing any such appropriation as he proposes.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order. The Chair knows of no law that requires the maintenance of Mount Vernon by the Government of the United States. The Chair therefore rules the amendment out of order.

Mr. PHELPS. I appeal from the decision of the Chair.

The CHAIRMAN. An appeal having been taken, the question is, "Shall the decision of the Chair stand as the judgment of this committee?"

The question was taken; and the decision of the Chair was sustained.

The committee rose informally; and the Speaker resumed the chair.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. WILSON, of Pennsylvania, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bills of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

An act (S. No. 903) granting a pension to Horace Peck, of Charlton, Massachusetts;

An act (S. No. 904) granting a pension to Benjamin T. Raines, of Indiana;

An act (S. No. 906) granting a pension to Elizabeth Clarke;

An act (S. No. 910) granting a pension to the children of Martin N. Slocum, deceased;

An act (S. No. 941) granting a pension to Benjamin C. Stone;

An act (S. No. 942) granting a pension to Sarah E. Haines; and

An act (S. No. 949) granting a pension to Mrs. Lydia W. Ford.

MISCELLANEOUS APPROPRIATION BILL.

The Committee of the Whole resumed its session.

The Clerk read as follows:

For repairs and superintendence of the Washington aqueduct, $25,000.

Mr. SPALDING. I move to amend by inserting after the paragraph just read the heading "Miscellaneous."

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

For national cemeteries, $600,000.

Mr. CULLOM. I move to amend by inserting after the paragraph just read the following:

And the Secretary of War may, in his discretion, dispose of any condemned cannon or small-arms in aid of any monument erected or to be erected to the memory of any loyal officer or soldier who was slain or died in the service of the Government during the late rebellion.

I hope there will be no objection to this amendment.

Mr. ROSS. I raise the point of order that this amendment proposes new legislation.

Mr. CULLOM. It seems to me that my colleague ought not to object to this.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. Ross] insist on his point of order?

Mr. ROSS. I do.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is obliged to sustain the point of order.

The Clerk read as follows:

To enable the Secretary of the Interior to provide for the education and maintenance of such deaf and dumb of the District of Columbia as cannot command the means to secure an education, in some institution to be selected by him, $15,000.

Mr. BENJAMIN. I move to amend by striking out the paragraph just read. I do not know any reason why we should tax our constituents to educate the deaf and dumb of the District of Columbia. We at home pay taxes for the education of this unfortunate class among ourselves. We have in nearly every State built asylums at very great expense, and we provide for taxing the people to educate those who are unable to educate themselves. Having done that, why should we further tax our people to raise money to be spent here in the education of the deaf and dumb of the District of Columbia, when the people of this District are just as able to make provision for this purpose as our constituents are to make similar provision for those within their respective States? If this class of people situated in the District of Columbia are to be educated, let the citizens of the District and the property of the District bear the expense, as the property in the various States is taxed to bear the expense of such education there. We expend large sums of money for the benefit of the people in the District of Columbia. We pay out here from the Federal Treasury every year $10,000,000 to Government employes alone, which is expended mainly within this District. In addition to that we light the principal streets of the District; we maintain in large part the police force of the District, and we support various charitable institutions located here. We supply the court-houses of the District. We even provide the recorder's office here with the necessary furniture, and with the books in which are recorded the deeds conveying property from one individual to another. Now, sir, I object to this extravagant manner of expending the public money here, and for the benefit of the people of this District, who are almost exempt from taxation. We all know that in this city rents are higher and taxes are lower than in any city of the United States of equal population. And I cannot for my life see why we should tax our constituents for the benefit of the people of this District, as is proposed in this paragraph. I hope, therefore, the paragraph will be stricken out.

Mr. SPALDING. Mr. Chairman, in reference to the amount of this appropriation the members of the Committee on Appropriations were about equally divided. About half the committee thought the appropriation should be $75,000. I must confess that my friend from Missouri, [Mr. BENJAMIN,] in the remarks he has just made, "out-Herods Herod." To an intelligent audience like this committee I have nothing to say in reply to what he has advanced, and I desire the question to be taken.

The amendment of Mr. BENJAMIN was not agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

For the Government insane.

For the support, clothing, medical, and moral treatment of the insane of the Army and Navy, revenue-cutter, and volunteer service, and of the indigent insane of the District of Columbia in the Government Hospital for the Insane, including $500 for books, stationery, and incidental expenses, $90,500.

Mr. SPALDING. I move to amend by striking out the heading, "For the Government insane."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I move to amend the paragraph last read by inserting after the words "volunteer service," the words "who may have become insane since their entry into the service of the United States." I presume there will be no objection to this amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Columbia Hospital for Women and Lying-in Asylum.

For the support of the asylum, over and above the probable amount received for pay patients, $15,000.

Mr. WELKER. I make the point of order on that appropriation. There is no law authorizing an appropriation of money to that private institution. It is a private enterprise and a private corporation.

Mr. SPALDING. It has been estimated for by the Secretary of the Interior in our book of estimates.

Mr. MAYNARD. Is there not the same appropriation for the present year?

Mr. SPALDING. Yes, sir; it is the same amount which has been appropriated for three years.

Mr. WELKER. In reply to that I will say I know it to be a private institution in this city. I had a good deal to do in getting it incorporated. I object to that private institution being fastened upon the Government in this way.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order, assuming the gentleman from Ohio to be correct in his statement of the law.

The Clerk read as follows:

For the care, support, and medical treatment of sixty transient paupers, medical and surgical patients, in some proper medical or charitable institution in the city of Washington, under a contract to be formed with such institution, $12,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary: Provided, That said contract shall be made by the Surgeon General of the Army, who shall report to the December session of every Congress, stating with whom the said contract is made and the amount and nature thereof.

Mr. SPALDING. That is the end of the bill; and I move to add the following:

To increase the contingent fund of the House for the purpose of paying $2,500 each to John D. Young and John A. Wimpy, contestants, $5,000; and the Clerk of the House is hereby directed to pay the said amount to the individuals named.

Mr. BENJAMIN. I make the point that is not authorized by existing law.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair overrules the point of order.

Mr. KERR. I ask the gentleman from Ohio to allow me to move an amendment, to add the name of John H. Christie.

Mr. SPALDING. I cannot yield for that purpose.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, this appropriation to pay John D. Young was put in under the resolution passed by this House. Mr. Wimpy came here to present his right to a seat fairly and justly, but because the committee took into consideration whether they would allow any representation from Georgia at all he could not get his right to a seat fairly decided. He has never been rejected, but in the present condition of the public business he can never have the judgment of the House on his claim. Under the circumstances we have made an appropriation to pay him precisely as John D. Young, who had the judgment of the House in favor of his compensation. The contestant of Wimpy, Mr. Christie, was found by the committee and the House not to have any claim at all, and that knowing himself to be ineligible he came here to make this claim.

Mr. MULLINS. I move to strike out Mr. Young's name. I am at a loss to understand how his case has come in here, for I understand this House decided against his right by a large vote. I do not see any reason why he should be allowed this pay. I therefore move to strike it out.

Mr. RANDALL. He has been voted out of his seat.

Mr. MULLINS. I am told he is out of the House. It was right to refuse to let him take a seat here. Perhaps there are others who ought to be treated in the same way. I hope the House will not pass this and get itself into a muddle by paying the man whom they said had no right here. If we pay one we must pay all.

Mr. BECK. I desire to say, in reference to John D. Young, that he had the certificate of the Governor of Kentucky, and came here with a majority of about 1,500. He claimed his seat, but on the proof taken the majority of this House decided that he could not take the oath required by the act of 1862. The House has since determined by a very large majority that he was entitled to receive $2,500 as contestant. The resolution providing for paying him was in the usual form and went to the Committee on Accounts, who refused to audit it, although all the members of the committee declared it ought to be paid. It was one of the strongest cases ever presented to the House.

Mr. SPALDING. I hope debate will cease and the vote will be taken.

Mr. MULLINS. I withdraw my amendment.

Mr. HOLMAN. I move to insert the name of James C. Birch, of Missouri.

Mr. SPALDING. With the leave of the House I will withdraw the amendment.

Mr. CULLOM. We want to get this bill through.

Mr. HOLMAN. I desire to say one word on the amendment I have offered. The House is aware that Mr. Birch was here during a very considerable portion of the present Congress contesting his seat, and at that contest some very important questions of public concern were raised. The Committee of Elections have certainly reported twice in favor of paying him the usual expenses, $2,500, I think.

Mr. BENJAMIN. What did the House do?

Mr. HOLMAN. The House declined to sustain the views of the committee, who from the nature of their duty were better informed in regard to the case, which was judicial in its character, than other members of the House would be.

Mr. BENJAMIN. What did the House do with the recommendation of the committee?

Mr. HOLMAN. It did not concur in the views of the committee; but I insist, as a general proposition, that the Committee of Elections are better informed as to whether a case is fairly brought or not, and hence that their views ought to have some weight with the House. If a party comes here demanding a seat, but with no case at all, I think he should receive no consideration; he ought not to have his expenses paid. But if he comes here in good faith upon a reasonable and fair case, representing a great public interest, he ought not to be compelled to pay the expenses himself.

Now, sir, Mr. Birch was here in good faith contesting his seat. The views of the Committee of Elections differed upon the single question with reference to the mode of registration in that State. But for that he would have taken his seat instead of his competitor. Now, sir, after the action of the House yesterday in paying three different contestants for the same seat in this House it does seem to me remarkable that the claim of this person should be overlooked.

Mr. KERR. I move to amend the amendment by adding the name of J. H. Christie, of Georgia. I desire to say that Mr. Christie came here with a regular certificate of election from General Meade, commanding in that military district at the time.

Mr. McKEE. Will the gentleman yield a moment?

Mr. KERR. I cannot yield now. Mr. Christie was duly elected, but he was unable to take the oath of office required by law as a member of this House. It is also true that at the same election Mr. Wimpy was voted for and was unable to take his seat. But he has since had his disabilities removed, and he is now able to take the oath of office. He was not eligible at that time by his own confession on the records of this House. He was in the service of the confederate government for eighteen months. He was more of a rebel than ever Colonel Christie was. He did more to aid the cause of the rebellion. I do not state these facts for the purpose of showing that because he came here as a contestant of the seat of Colonel Christie he ought not to be paid, but I state them for the purpose of showing that Colonel Christie's claim is as good or better than the claim of Mr. Wimpy, and that therefore they ought to be put upon the same footing, and ought both to be paid or neither to be paid. I think, however, that upon the precedents established in this House recently and since I have been in Congress they ought both to be paid, and therefore I offer this amendment in good faith and hope it will be adopted.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. The Committee on Appropriations agreed to provide for the case of John D. Young, although he was disqualified, because the House by a solemn vote had voted that he should be paid, but by some informality it could not be passed by the Committee on Accounts. The case of Mr. Wimpy is one of peculiar hardship. It is this: Mr. Wimpy had been, as he says by the force of conscription, in the confederate service; but he repented of it and had his disabilities removed, and became a truly loyal man. Mr. Christie did not go into the army; he was one of the men who stayed behind and edited newspapers and abused everybody on the side of the Union, calling them rascals and all sorts of hard names, and sustaining the confederate government. He never has repented down to this day. His paper is as rebel now as it ever was. He never could have taken the oath honestly. If we took off his disabilities a thousand times over he could not take it. When Mr. Wimpy's case came up the House voted that it could not be considered because the rebel associates of Christie in the Legislature of Georgia had acted so badly that it was thought Georgia had lost her right to representation here. It was not Mr. Wimpy's fault. He came here with the law of Georgia on his side, with his disabilities removed, a truly loyal man, one of those whom I am always ready to deal with and to extend the hand to; who having once erred have repented and come back to true allegiance to the flag of the country. It was not his fault that his case could not be heard. It was for something done by those whom he despises for the meanness of their action; for if there ever was a mean thing done on earth it was for men to take the votes of negroes to get into the Georgia Legislature, and then to vote the negroes out. It was meaner than stealing sheep. [Laughter.]

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. KERR. I withdraw my amendment.

Mr. BROOKS. I renew it. I am sorry the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BUTLER] exhibits so much feeling upon this subject. I know very well the reason why he does it. He is very unforgiving. Mr. Christie is opposed to him in politics, has the same politics that I have, and as the editor of a paper has spoken unkindly of the gentleman. I should have thought the gentleman from Massachusetts had been so much abused that he would have got used to it and would not seek to avenge his own personal wrongs here on the floor of this House, but would look at this as a matter of equity, and only as a matter of equity. That which inspires so much eloquence and excites so much feeling on his part is a determination to punish a brother editor of mine who does not think as well of him as perhaps he ought to do in the gentleman's estimation. That is the secret of the feeling which he exhibits.

Now, what are the facts? Colonel Christie holds the certificate of General Meade, having been elected by six or seven hundred majority. He was an original Union man. He fought secession to the very last, till his State was carried into secession, and then he went with the government of Georgia, the government de facto. He is now as much a reconstructed rebel as any rebel who has been reconstructed; much more so than Wimpy is, for his hands were never dyed with the blood of Union men as were the hands of Wimpy. Do let us forget the past; let us forget the political associations of the past. Why not receive both parties, Wimpy and Christie, as repentant men, both now faithful to the Union, the one a Democrat, the other a Republican; both obedient to the laws of the country? Why fight these battles over and over again on this floor as the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BUTLER] proposes?

I repeat, Christie holds the certificate of election from General Meade, having received from six to seven hundred majority. The contestant was never elected by the people. Yet we on this side of the House are willing to vote to pay both Wimpy and Christie.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. SCHENCK. I do not myself feel disposed to go into the question whether one of these men is a Republican and the other a Democrat or not. I do not think that the fact that a man being a Republican or a Democrat ought to be any reason why he should take $2,500 out of the Treasury of the United States.

I thank the Committee on Appropriations for having brought this matter before the House in this way, for it has given us an opportunity of looking in the face an abuse which has prevailed here until it has become odious, to me at least, whatever other gentlemen may think about it.

Many years ago, I will not say exactly how many, but something like a quarter of a century, I was in Congress and served for some years on the Committee of Elections. At that time the rule was well settled, and such was the practice, that a contestant was never paid unless he established his claim to a seat, or unless he satisfied the Committee of Elections and the House that he had reasonable and good ground for a contest and had reason to expect that he would obtain the seat. But that practice seems to have been abandoned entirely. And for the last two or three years this House has gone to such an extent in paying such persons that sometimes I have been tempted to resign my seat as a member here and to resort to contesting the seats of others for a living, for nothing seems to be more profitable. Every man who chooses to contest the seat of a member of this House, be he loyal or disloyal, Republican or Democrat, whatever may be the nature of his contest, has only to stay about here a few months, and at the end of that time he receives an appropriation of from two thousand five hundred to five thousand dollars.

As I have already said, I thank the Committee on Appropriations for having introduced this matter into this bill, because it at least gives an opportunity to call the attention of the country to this subject. That has never before been possible, and why? Because usually the resolution for this purpose has been introduced some Monday morning, the friends of the party having been duly apprised of what was coming, the previous question has been called and sustained, and without any opportunity for remark or debate the resolution has been passed and the allowance paid. That, however, cannot be done when it is brought forward in this way in an appropriation bill. And I now take occasion to protest against this whole matter.

Here was this John D. Young, of Kentucky, who, if he was rightly refused a seat here, was refused it upon the ground that he never ought to have been a candidate at all for a seat in this House on account of his lacking the prerequisite qualification of loyalty. And yet, although the House so decided, it is asked to turn around and pay him for coming here and insisting upon taking a seat for which he ought never to have been a candidate. And so in regard to the Georgia case. You decide in regard to one of the claimants that he has no right to a seat here; then you decide that for the time being another man cannot hold it; and then you are asked to pay one of them for contesting a seat, although if he had come here claiming the seat and there had been no one contesting his claim he could not have been admitted, and would not have received any pay at all. But if he comes as a contestant he gets the pay, thus proving that it is better to be a contestant than to be regularly elected with nobody disputing the right or title to the seat.

Mr. MAYNARD. I would suggest to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SCHENCK] that Mr. Wimpy came here with a certificate of the Governor that he had been entitled to the seat.

The CHAIRMAN, (Mr. SCOFIELD.) The time of the gentleman from Ohio has expired.

Mr. DAWES. I ask the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. KERR] to withdraw his amendment that I may renew it.

Mr. KERR. Certainly; I will withdraw it with that understanding.

Mr. DAWES. I renew the amendment for the purpose of saying a few words on this subject. No doubt, Mr. Chairman, a great evil has grown up in reference to this matter of compensation to contestants; but it is not an easy matter to settle the difficulties of the question. The matter has been considered very much in the Committee of Elections for several years past; and I have had in my desk a bill, which I was prepared to offer whenever a suitable opportunity might occur, providing that in any contested election no money shall be paid pending the contest to either the sitting member or the contestant, but that when the case has been decided the pay shall be given in accordance with the result of the contest. I have had no opportunity to bring that bill forward. It is just as bad, Mr. Chairman, for a man holding a certificate to draw pay when he is not entitled to the seat as for a contestant to receive pay when he has failed to sustain the contest. We witnessed a short time since in this House a case where a man holding a certificate was voted out at the end of a Congress after drawing $10,000 as pay. There have been many cases of that kind. In one instance a man came here from Oregon, got his name put on the roll, sat in the House six months, and then was voted out by the House as not entitled to the seat. He retired, taking with him $7,000, though in the opinion of the Committee of Elections he had no more right to the seat as a Representative from Oregon than I had.

I know no better way of meeting this question than to pass a law providing that the compensation of both the sitting member and the contestant shall abide the result of the contest. Yet there is some difficulty attending such a provision, for if that be enacted as the law few men will be likely to come here at all to contest; for the carrying on of these contests is attended with great expense, and if it be proclaimed that by whatever fraud or device or legerdemain a certificate may be obtained the man holding it can compel anybody else to contest at his own expense the temptation to fraud and to the obtaining of certificates by fraud will be very greatly increased. But, sir, after a great deal of examination of this subject I, for one, feel that the abuse which has grown up is so great that there is probably no better remedy than that which would be provided by a bill of the character I have indicated.

But now at the end of a Congress, after we have had as many as fifteen cases of contested elections, I do think that it is wrong to treat one man in a different way from that in which we treat another. It has been the opinion of the Committee of Elections that so long as the law stands as it is, until some new law shall be enacted providing a different rule, all men coming here and prosecuting in good faith their claims to seats should be paid if any contestants are paid. I do not think it right to make "fish of one and fowl of another." Hence it is that, as the organ of the Committee of Elections, I have reported resolutions for the pay of contestants whenever the committee have believed that the contest has been conducted in good faith. But I hope that at the beginning of the next Congress those who may have this matter in charge will feel it their duty to urge the adoption of some such enactment as I have indicated to get rid of the abuse which is growing up. I understand that in the next Congress there will be thirty cases of contested elections.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. SPALDING. I move that the committee rise for the purpose of closing debate on the amendment, unless unanimous consent be given for that purpose.

The CHAIRMAN, (Mr. SCOFIELD.) Will the committee give unanimous consent that debate on the pending amendment be closed?

Mr. ELDRIDGE. Mr. Chairman, I think there is no quorum here, and—

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair hears no objection to the proposition of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. SPALDING,] and it is agreed to.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I was objecting.

The CHAIRMAN. It took the gentleman along while to pronounce his objection. [Laughter.] The question is upon the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. KERR,] as renewed by the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. DAVES.]

Mr. HOLMAN accepted Mr. KERR's amendment, as renewed by Mr. DAVES.

Mr. ROSS. I move to strike out "$2,500" and insert "$1,500" for each one.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 20, noes 76.

Mr. ROSS demanded tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. CLARKE, of Kansas, and Mr. ELDRIDGE were appointed.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 28, noes 83.

The Chairman voted in the negative.

So the amendment to the amendment was disagreed to.

Mr. HOLMAN. I withdraw my amendment on the understanding that it shall be voted on in the House.

Mr. SPALDING. That is the agreement. I now move that the committee rise and report the bill.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. DAVES reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had, according to order, had under consideration House bill No. 2007, making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1870, and for other purposes, and had directed him to report the same back to the House with sundry amendments.

Mr. HOLMAN. I offer the amendment which I withdrew just before the committee rose.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I move to strike out the following:

For laying the foundation and commencing the building for the post office and sub-Treasury in Boston, Massachusetts, $200,000.

For laying the foundation and commencing the building for the post office in New York city, $200,000.

Mr. SPALDING. I now demand the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

STRENGTHENING THE PUBLIC CREDIT.

Mr. SCHENCK. I move to suspend the rules to take from the Speaker's table the amendment of the Senate to the bill of the House to strengthen the public credit.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I object. And then, on motion of Mr. ROSS, (it being past eleven o'clock p. m.,) the House adjourned.

PETITION, ETC.

The following petition, &c., were presented under the rule, and referred to the appropriate committees:

By Mr. BLACKBURN: The memorial of Robert Emmett Rankin, jr., of Shreveport, Louisiana, praying for relief from legal and political disabilities.

By Mr. FOX: A memorial of the special committee of the common council of New York city, in relation to the payment of money due the corporation of said city.

By Mr. MORRELL: The petition of Harper, Gutman & Co. and 42 other firms and individuals, wagon-makers and blacksmiths, citizens of Alleghany City, Pennsylvania, praying for such increase of protective duties as will revive manufactures and restore prosperity to the country.

IN SENATE.

TUESDAY, March 2, 1869.

Prayer by Rev. W. MORLEY PUNSHON, of Toronto, Canada.

On motion of Mr. NYE, and by unanimous consent, the reading of the Journal of yesterday was dispensed with.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Mr. NYE. Mr. President, I desire to make a personal explanation. In speaking yesterday upon the question of the removal of the disabilities of Mr. Rogers, of Richmond, it will be remembered that I inquired if he held the position of auditor of the State, to which inquiry the answer was that he did. I fell into an error, therefore, by saying that feeling was manifested against him on account of certain movements on foot in regard to the railroads of Virginia, by presuming that he held the office of auditor. The auditor's name is Taylor instead of Rogers, and this man is his assistant, or second auditor. I have a letter from him stating that fact, in which he says that though he thinks he is entitled to have his disabilities removed, yet he cannot afford to have them removed by anything like a wrong being said or done to others. It is a letter fully stating his position. I ought to state, perhaps, that in this letter of Mr. Rogers he says he regards Governor Wells as his friend, and he never heard that he made any opposition to him. I have other letters from different individuals there reporting the same thing, and likewise stating that the suggestion that I made in relation to the effort made to sell these public works is entirely erroneous. I leave that for them to settle among themselves. I desire to make this explanation so that I shall not do injustice, as I certainly did not intend to do, to any person connected therewith. The error arose from assuming that Mr. Rogers occupied the position of auditor.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATION.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a message from the President of the United States, transmitting a copy of a convention between the United States and the Mexican republic, providing for the adjustment of the claims of citizens of either country against each other, signed on the 4th day of July last, and the ratifications of which were exchanged on the 1st instant; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, and ordered to be printed.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore presented a memorial of the General Assembly of the State of Missouri, praying for a grant of land for the construction of a railroad from the Atlantic and Pacific railroad to Batesville and Little Rock, called the St. James and Little Rock railroad; which was referred to the Committee on the Pacific Railroad.

He also presented the memorial of the executive committee of the United States Indian commission, in favor of the rejection of the Osage Indian treaty and of the protection of the rights and interests of the Indians; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

He also presented the petition of business men of New York, Boston, Philadelphia, and Chicago, praying that purchases or sales of loans and bonds on account of the United States shall be hereafter made by inviting public competition through advertisements for proposals, and that sales of gold be made at public auction; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. POMEROY presented a petition of citizens of Indiana, three petitions of citizens of Michigan, a petition of citizens of New York, and a petition of citizens of Wisconsin, praying that in any change or amendment of the Constitution that Congress may propose to extend or regulate suffrage there shall be no distinction between men and women; which were ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. CONKLING presented two petitions of citizens of New York, praying for such an amendment of the Constitution of the United States as will fully recognize the obligations of the Christian religion; which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented a memorial of citizens of Utica, New York, remonstrating against an amendment to the patent laws whereby foreign patents not patented in the United States shall be considered in deciding cases in which the validity of a patent is in question; which was referred to the Committee on Patents.

PROPOSED EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. SUMNER. I have occasion to make two reports in executive session. It will take only a moment or two, and I will now move—

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no further petitions, reports from committees are in order.

Mr. SUMNER. I now move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business. This is the best hour for that purpose.

Mr. POMEROY. That motion is not in order.

Mr. MORTON. I hope we shall not go into executive session.

Mr. SUMNER. There are not a sufficient number of Senators present for the proper transaction of business in executive session, but we may proceed with reports. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I think that is very unusual during the morning hour.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is not a debatable proposition. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Massachusetts.

The motion was not agreed to.

PAY OF SOUTHERN SENATORS.

Mr. MORTON. I move to take up for consideration the resolution that was unfinished during the morning hour the other day, in regard to the pay of Senators from the reconstructed States. It was passed over with a distinct understanding that as soon as the measure which superseded it should be disposed of it should be taken up. It is due to those Senators that it should be disposed of. I think we can take a vote without further debate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Indiana asks the unanimous consent of the Senate to take up the resolution indicated by him.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I think we ought not to take up that resolution and cut off the business of the morning hour at this stage of the session.

Mr. MORTON. I do not think it will take any time. It is due to those Senators that it should be disposed of.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there any objection to taking it up?

Mr. TRUMBULL. Yes, sir; I object.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Then it goes ever.

STURGEON BAY SHIP-CANAL.

Mr. HOWE. I ask the unanimous consent of the Senate to consider Senate bill No. 707, reported from the Committee on Public Lands, which will take perhaps three minutes, just long enough to read it.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. No. 707) granting lands to the State of Wisconsin to aid in the construction of a breakwater and harbor and ship-canal at the head of Sturgeon bay, in the county of Door, in said State, to connect the waters of Green bay and Lake Michigan, in said State. The bill proposes to grant to the State of Wisconsin to aid in the building of a breakwater and harbor and ship-canal at Sturgeon bay to connect the waters of Green bay with the waters of Lake Michigan, in addition to a former grant for that purpose, approved April 10, 1866, two hundred thousand acres of public lands within the State of Wisconsin, and from land to which the right of homestead or preemption has not attached; but one hundred and fifty thousand acres of the lands are to be selected from alternate odd-numbered sections, and fifty thousand acres from even-numbered sections of the lands of the United States. This grant of lands is to inure to the use and benefit of the Sturgeon Bay and Lake Michigan Ship-Canal and Harbor Company, in accordance with an act of the Legislature of the State of Wisconsin, conferring the lands granted to the State by the act herein referred to on that company. The bill also extends the time allowed for the completion of the work and the right of reversion to the United States under the act of Congress approved April 10, 1866, three additional years; but no lands designated by the United States as "mineral" before the passage of this act are to be included within this grant.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Public Lands with amendments. The first amendment was in line ten, to strike out after the word "from" the words "land to which the right of homestead or preemption has not attached" and to insert "and from surveyed lands and which are not mineral."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in line twelve, to strike out the words "one hundred and fifty thousand acres of;" and in line fourteen, after the word "sections" to strike out the words "and fifty thousand acres from even-numbered sections;" so that the proviso will read:

Provided, That said lands shall be selected from alternate odd-numbered sections of the lands of the United States.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in line twenty-five, to strike out the following proviso:

And provided further, That no lands designated by the United States as "mineral" before the passage of this act shall be included within this grant.

And to insert in lieu thereof the following:

And no lands shall vest in said State or company until said work is completed; nor shall patents issue for the same until the Secretary shall be satisfied that said work has been completed.

Mr. HARLAN. I will inquire of the honorable Senator who called this bill up what amount of land has been heretofore devoted by the Government to this work?

Mr. HOWE. Two hundred thousand acres have been appropriated to this canal and four hundred thousand to the canal across Keweenaw Point. This makes the grant just equal to the grants made to Michigan for the canal across Keweenaw Point.

Mr. HARLAN. I did not observe the reading of the bill very minutely, but if I do comprehend it the land in this bill can be taken from the public domain anywhere.

Mr. HOWE. In that State.

Mr. HARLAN. I will inquire if there is any limitation in that respect.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I think the language of the bill is "within the State of Wisconsin." I have forgotten the exact phraseology, but I think those words are inserted. If they are not they ought to be.

The SECRETARY. The language of the bill is, "public lands within the State of Wisconsin."

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, and was read the third time, and passed.

REPRESENTATIVE REFORM.

Mr. WADE, from the select Committee on Representative Reform, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 772) to amend the representation of the people in Congress, reported it without amendment.

Mr. BUCKALEW. I desire to make a written report from the select Committee on Representative Reform to accompany Senate bill No. 772, to amend the representation of the people in Congress. I desire an order to be entered to print the report.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That order will be made.

Mr. BUCKALEW. I also desire, for the purpose of reference, that a certain number of extra copies, say two thousand, be printed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That motion will go to the Committee on Printing under the rules.

Mr. BUCKALEW. I desire also to say a word in regard to this report. It contains a large amount of valuable information in a condensed form on the subject of representation and representative reform drawn from American and British sources. I desire it to be understood that this document shall go into the Appendix of the Globe, so that it will be within the reach of gentlemen in Congress hereafter. The members of the committee have informally had an understanding that it should be printed in the Appendix. I mention this as an act of good faith to the Senate because it is not usual to print reports of this sort in the Globe.

[The report will be published in the Appendix.]

DISTRICT GAS COMPANY.

Mr. HARLAN. The Committee on the District of Columbia have had under consideration two Senate resolutions in relation to the business of the gas company in this District, and have instructed me to make the following report:

The Committee on the District of Columbia, to whom were referred Senate resolutions in relation to the price of gas and the business of the gas company in the District of Columbia, have had the same under consideration, and have elicited the information contained in the appended communication from said company; which is hereto attached and made a part of this report:

OFFICE OF WASHINGTON GAS-LIGHT COMPANY,
No. 472 TENTH STREET WEST,
CITY OF WASHINGTON, February 26, 1869.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of two resolutions of the Senate of the United States concerning the management of the Washington Gas-Light Company, passed on the 4th and 16th days of February, 1869, respectively.

In reply to the same I beg leave to make the following statement:

The resolution of February 4 relates to the price of gas furnished by this company to its consumers.

The price has been at three different times fixed or limited by Congress, namely: June 25, 1860, July 11, 1862, and January 30, 1865. Under the law last named the company are now acting in the following manner: the law fixes the price at four dollars per one thousand feet, subject to a discount of ten per cent. to the United States and of five per cent. to citizens, being a net price of $3 60 to the United States and $3 80 to citizens; to both of which the United States tax of twenty-five cents per one thousand feet must be added, making the price of $3 85 to the United States and $4 05 to citizens.

The Gas-Light Company voluntarily, on the 1st day of July, 1866, reduced the price to $3 70 to citizens, and, on the 1st day of July, 1867, to $3 50 to citizens and the United States alike; and on the 1st day of July, 1868, to $3 40. Since the 1st of July, 1866, the company has assumed the United States internal revenue tax of twenty-five cents per one thousand cubic feet, amounting in the aggregate to over $31,000 per annum, and has not since that date charged the tax to consumers as authorized by the ninety-fourth section of the act of July 13, 1866.

After deducting this tax from $3 40, the price charged, there remains for the company $3 15 per one thousand feet; and whenever the internal revenue tax is removed or reduced a corresponding reduction will be made to the consumers unless an increased cost of labor or coal shall intervene to prevent it.

Accompanying this statement is a schedule of prices furnished by the Gas-Light Journal, of New York city, which I make as a part of this statement, as I believe it reliable. By this schedule it will be seen that the average price of the one hundred and thirty-six companies is $4 45 per one thousand feet; showing that the price in this city is $1 05 below the average.

Inasmuch as Congress cannot regulate by law the price of coal, labor, or any other material entering into the manufacture of illuminating gas, the Gas-Light Company has so conducted its business as to avoid the necessity of legislation on the subject by frequent voluntary reductions of price. I would further state that gas is now being furnished to citizens at sixty-five cents and to the United States at forty-five cents per one thousand feet less than the price fixed by law.

In answer to the first clause of the resolution of February 16, I have to say that the capital stock of the Gas-Light Company was increased to $1,000,000, by virtue of an act of Congress passed the 24th day of May, 1866; that certificates of stock have been issued for that amount and no more; that the actual cost of the land, buildings, gas apparatus, gas-holders, street mains, meters, &c., belonging to the company has been $1,041,487; that since the passage of the law alluded to a large gas-holder has been erected near the Capitol, eighteen miles of street mains have been laid, and six more contracted for to be put down the coming season; that twenty-five hundred feet of street main, extending beyond the city limits to the Howard University, and six thousand to the Deaf-Mute College have been laid; this has been done without the prospect of immediate profit, but with a view to benefit the public institutions located at those remote points.

By a contract between the corporation of the city and the Gas-Light Company, the latter obligate themselves to lay street mains when and where required.

With regard to the final clause of the resolution of February 16, 1869, I most respectfully submit that it is impossible to give the amount of gas consumed, as contemplated by the resolution; that no separate record has been kept during the period named in said resolution. I would, however, say that the discrepancy between the amount of gas manufactured and the amount sold and used by the company at their works and offices goes into the leakage account, which account embraces all waste, loss by condensation, gas used by employes and others without pay, as well as the actual leakage. The amount of this leakage account for the past three years is but eight and sixty-three hundredths per cent. of the gas made, being much less than at many other works known to me.

That gas and coke have been given away, many acts of liberality and charity done, I do not deny, but I have yet to hear of the first complaint from any stockholder of this company on that account. On the contrary the present board of directors were unanimously reelected at the annual meeting on the first Monday of the present month.

It may not be out of place in this report to state that the whole number of consumers on the books of the company now actually taking gas is over five thousand three hundred, and that the monthly bills for the past year exceeded sixty thousand, and yet the number of complaints made at the office of large gas bills during the year was but one hundred and seventy. In conclusion I will say that no act of Congress has been violated by the company, neither has it any necessity or disposition to evade any law whatsoever. Trusting that this statement will be acceptable, I have the honor to be,

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

B. H. BARTOL,

President of Gas-Light Company,

Washington, D. C.

Hon. JAMES HARLAN, Chairman of the Committee on the District of Columbia, United States Senate.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA, County of Washington, ss:

On this 26th day of February, in the year of our Lord 1869, before me the subscriber, a justice of the peace in and for the district and county aforesaid, personally appeared Barnabas H. Bartol, who being duly sworn according to law deposes and says that he is the president of the Washington City Gas-Light Company, and as such fully acquainted with the affairs of said company, and that the above annexed statement is in every particular true to the best of his knowledge and belief.

Sworn to and subscribed before me this 26th day of February, A. D. 1869.

B. H. BARTOL,
President of Gas-Light Company.

WASHINGTON, D. C., February 26, 1869.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed the following bill and joint resolutions:

A bill (S. No. 871) to authorize the transfer of lands granted to the Union Pacific Railway Company, eastern division, to the Denver Pacific Railway and Telegraph Company, and to expedite the completion of railroads to Denver, in the Territory of Colorado;

A joint resolution (S. R. No. 219) giving the assent of the United States to the construction of the Newport and Cincinnati bridge; and

A joint resolution (S. R. No. 231) providing for the reporting and publication of the debates in Congress.

The message also announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. No. 2020) relating to the operations of the pension laws, and for other purposes; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

WALLA-WALLA RAILROAD.

Mr. WILLIAMS. The Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 1041) granting the right of way to the Walla-Walla and Columbia River Railroad Company, and for other purposes, have instructed me to report it back without amendment; and as this is a little bill to which there can be no objection I ask to have it put upon its passage. It will only take a moment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator asks the unanimous consent of the Senate to consider the bill at this time. Does any Senator object?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It proposes to grant the right of way through the public lands to the Walla-Walla and Columbia River Railroad Company, a corporation existing under the laws of the Territory of Washington and duly incorporated, for the purpose of constructing a railroad from the town of Walla-Walla to some eligible point on the navigable waters of Columbia river in the Territory; the right of way granted is to the extent of one hundred feet in width on each side of the road where it may pass over the public lands; also all necessary ground, not to exceed five acres at each station, for station-buildings, workshops, depots, machine-shops, switches, side-tracks, turn-tables, and water-stations.

The second section authorizes the county commissioners of the county of Walla-Walla, in the Territory of Washington, to aid in the construction of the Walla-Walla and Columbia River railroad by subscribing to the capital stock of the company in the name and on behalf of the county of Walla-Walla, and by issuing bonds of the county payable at such time as the commissioners shall think proper, and bearing interest of not more than eight per cent. per annum, in payment for the stock so by them taken in the railroad company, or by issuing bonds bearing interest as a loan to the company to be used in the construction of the road, or to aid the company in the construction of the road by the credit of the county in any other manner the commissioners may think proper; but the subscription, loan, or other aid so given by the commissioners to the company is in no case to exceed the sum of $300,000; and the subscription, loan, or other aid is to be submitted to the people of the county and voted for by three fourths of the legal vote cast at an election held for that purpose; and if the vote be taken at a special election the notice is to be the same as provided by the laws of the Territory for general elections.

The third section authorizes the county commissioners of the county of Walla-Walla, in the Territory of Washington, to hold a special election, at such times as they may designate, after twenty days' public notice, which election shall be governed by the general laws of the Territory upon the subject of elections, at which election the aid to be given by the county to the Walla-Walla and Columbia River Railroad Company, either by subscriptions to stock or otherwise, shall be submitted to and be voted upon by the legal voters of the county in such manner as the commissioners may designate; but this grant is made upon the express condition that any effort by the company hereafter to obtain any land grant, subsidy, or pecuniary aid from the United States Government shall work a forfeiture of this grant.

Mr. GRIMES. I call the attention of the Senate to the last section of the bill. If I understand it aright it authorizes a county in one of the Territories of the United States by a vote to impose a large tax upon the property of the people of the county in order to build a railroad—a very questionable policy, even in a rich and old-settled country.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I will simply state that this is a road about thirty miles long in Walla-Walla county, running from the town of Walla-Walla up the Columbia river. This bill only grants the right of way, and it simply authorizes the people of the county, if they are so disposed, to contribute to the construction of the road. In that country there is no capital with which to build these roads or very little. The people of the county have petitioned to be allowed to do this. The bill has passed the House of Representatives and the Delegate is very anxious to have it passed in this form. Otherwise it will fail at this session. The bill does not put any obligation upon the Government, and there is an express provision in it that if any application is made to the Government for subsidies in land or money all rights under this bill shall be forfeited. I am sure there can be no harm in it. Nobody is injured by it, and the people are satisfied with it.

Mr. POMEROY. I voted in committee to give this company the right of way; but I did not understand that we were to legislate in regard to any subscription by a county. I desired them to have the right of way, and I thought that was all there was in the bill; but it is very doubtful whether we ought to allow the people of a county in a Territory to assess a tax upon themselves that is to be paid hereafter by those who may come after them. If they were a State and had a Legislature, and the Legislature should authorize it, it would be well enough. I do not object to that. But I did not agree in committee that Congress should authorize a county in a Territory to tax the people of that county for a railroad. I am willing that they should have the right of way and desire them to have it; and I thought that was all there was in the bill.

Mr. GRIMES. I move to strike out that section.

Mr. WILLIAMS. The second and third sections embrace that provision.

Mr. GRIMES. Then I move to strike out both these sections.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I wish to ask the Senator from Oregon whether this bill in all its details is in accordance with the provisions that have been adopted by the Committee on Public Lands?

Mr. WILLIAMS. This only grants the right of way one hundred feet wide for about thirty miles in one county. There is no subsidy of lands.

Mr. HENDRICKS. No grant of lands?

Mr. WILLIAMS. No grant of lands at all; and the bill expressly provides that if any application is made for a grant of lands or a subsidy all rights under this bill shall be forfeited. It simply enables the people of that county to build this road if they are so disposed. It is all to be left to the vote of the people.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. This question is on striking out the second and third sections of the bill.

Mr. GRIMES. I think this is too important a question for us to decide without having a yea and nay vote upon it. It is simply this: whether the Congress of the United States will authorize the sparse population in a county in one of the Territories to impose a tax for the purpose of building a railroad through that county. The State of Iowa, and especially the county in which the Senator from Oregon lived, is experiencing at this time the evil effects of such an authority conferred upon several counties of that State by the Legislative Assembly of the State, producing almost an insurrection; and although I would not attempt to impose any restraint upon the legislative authorities of the Territory I am unwilling, for one, to give my assent to any such authority being bestowed upon the people of a county.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Without expressing any opinion upon the merits of this bill, about which I am not prepared to express an opinion, I appeal to the Senator from Oregon not to press it, if it is to be discussed, and divide the Senate. It does seem to me that we ought to devote every moment of our time to the appropriation bills, and lay aside all measures about which there is likely to be controversy.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I do not propose to take up any time upon it. This bill has passed the House, and the Delegate from the Territory is greatly interested in it. It is a little railroad, thirty miles long, and there is more fuss made about it than there would be if we asked an appropriation of $1,000,000.

Mr. TRUMBULL. The Senator from Oregon will not understand me as opposing it; but others do, and there is likely to be a contest over it.

Mr. CONNESS. Let us vote upon it.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Why not lay it aside and go on with the appropriation bills?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on striking out the second and third sections of the bill.

The motion to strike out was not agreed to. The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

The bill (H. R. No. 2020) relating to the operations of the pension laws, and for other purposes, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

FUR-SEAL IN ALASKA.

Mr. CHANDLER, from the Committee on Commerce, reported a bill (S. No. 980) more efficiently to protect the fur-seal in Alaska; which was read, and passed to a second reading.

Mr. CHANDLER. I ask unanimous consent of the Senate to take up and pass Senate joint resolution No. 239, reported by the Committee on Commerce, declaring the Islands of St. Paul and St. George, in Alaska, Government reservations, for the sake of protecting the fur-bearing animals in case the bill which passed the Senate does not pass the House; but if it does pass the House this resolution will not interfere with it. I ask the unanimous consent of the Senate to proceed with that resolution.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I object.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection being made, the motion cannot be entertained at this time.

HENRY BARRICKLOW.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the Army appropriation bill.

Mr. SUMNER. I appeal to my friend, had we not better take another half hour until twelve o'clock on some of these other bills?

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I think we have got but a short time in which to pass the appropriation bills.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Maine to proceed to the consideration of the Army appropriation bill, the unfinished business of yesterday.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I ask the Senator from Maine to allow me to call up a private claim in regard to some land warrants, the assignment of which has to be corrected by an act. It is a House bill of a good deal of importance to the party and about which there is no question.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. If it occupies no time, I will not object.

Mr. HENDRICKS. If it occupies two minutes I will withdraw it. It is House bill No. 1063.

By unanimous consent the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. No. 1063) for the relief of Henry Barricklow. The preamble recites that on the 28th of March, 1859, by the sinking of the steamboat Nat. Holmes in the Ohio river, near the city of Aurora, Indiana, Henry Barricklow lost twenty-three land warrants, which are described by their numbers, each for one hundred and sixty acres; and duplicates of the warrants have been issued by the Commissioner of Pensions and delivered to him; the bill therefore authorizes Henry Barricklow to locate or sell and assign the duplicate land warrants in the same manner as if they had been issued in his name, and patents are to be issued by the Commissioner of the General Land Office on the location of the duplicate warrants, as in case of other land warrants.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

SECRET SALES OF GOLD.

Mr. MORGAN. I ask the unanimous consent of the Senate to take up Senate bill No. 821, upon which I think there will be no debate, to prohibit secret sales or purchases of gold or bonds on account of the United States, and for other purposes. It is a very important bill. You, sir, have presented a petition for it this morning from many of the business men of the country.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. As there is a bill pending it requires unanimous consent to consider the bill indicated by the Senator from New York. Does any Senator object? No objection being made, it will be read.

Mr. MORGAN. I think there will be no debate upon it. It is a bill to prohibit secret sales of gold; a bill which has been called for by the whole country.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I hope the Senator will not press that motion. I am appealed to on all sides to go on with the appropriation bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection the bill will be read.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I must object.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection being made, it goes over.

Mr. CONKLING. I appeal to the honorable Senator to let us see whether it cannot pass without debate. It is a very important bill. I do not think there will be any debate upon it.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. There are other Senators who appeal to me to go on with the appropriation bill.

Mr. CONKLING. My honorable friend yielded to a private bill a moment ago, and this bill in his estimation I am sure, as in the estimation of the rest of us, is more important than almost any other that is before us. I do not think it will lead to debate. Let us try it and see if we cannot pass it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Maine object?

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Yes, sir.

Mr. SHERMAN. In regard to the bill now proposed to be taken up I shall feel it my duty to move to strike out the second section. If that is done I shall have nothing to say upon it. I have no desire to debate it at any length.

Mr. MORGAN. It is a bill of a great deal of importance. Every Senator will find upon his desk a petition of the business men of nearly all the cities of the Union in favor of this measure.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Will the Senator yield to an amendment to strike out the second section?

Mr. MORGAN. I should prefer to pass it in that shape rather than not pass it at all.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I think it will lead to discussion. I am informed that it cannot pass without debate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection is made, and it goes over. The Army appropriation bill is before the Senate.

Mr. MORGAN. I desire to make an appeal to the Senator from Maine. I will consent to the striking out of the second section so that there may be no debate upon it, and we may pass the other two.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. We must proceed with the bill regularly before us or nothing will be done.

Mr. CAMERON. I hope the Senator from Maine will allow me to say one word in behalf of bringing up this bill. I think it is one of the most important bills that has been offered in the Senate during the present session.

Mr. WARNER. I ask the Senator from Maine to yield to me to allow me to take up a bill which will lead to no debate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Army appropriation bill is insisted upon, and must be proceeded with.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House had disagreed to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 1744) to strengthen the public credit and relating to contracts for the payment of coin, asked a conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. ROBERT C. SCHENCK of Ohio, Mr. WILLIAM B. ALLISON of Iowa, and Mr. WILLIAM E. NIBLACK of Indiana, managers at the same on its part.

The message also announced that the House had agreed to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 1804) to establish a bridge across the East river, between the cities of Brooklyn and New York, in the State of New York, a post road.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message further announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills and joint resolutions; and they were thereupon signed by the President pro tempore of the Senate:

A bill (S. No. 871) to authorize the transfer of lands granted to the Union Pacific Railway Company, eastern division, between Denver and the point of its connection with the Union Pacific railroad, to the Denver Pacific Railway and Telegraph Company, and to expedite the completion of railroads to Denver, in the Territory of Colorado;

A bill (H. R. No. 1804) to establish a bridge across the East river, between the cities of Brooklyn and New York, in the State of New York, a post road;

A joint resolution (S. R. No. 219) to drop from the rolls of the Army officers absent without leave; and

A joint resolution (S. R. No. 231) providing for the reporting and publication of the debates in Congress.

THE PUBLIC CREDIT.

The Senate proceeded to consider its amendments to the bill (H. R. No. 1744) to strengthen the public credit and relating to contracts for the payment of coin, disagreed to by the House.

Mr. SHERMAN. I move that the Senate insist on its amendments disagreed to by the House, and agree to the conference asked for by the House.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I do not think that proposition ought to be considered in such hot haste; and unless it be in order for the Senator to make that motion I object.

Mr. SHERMAN. I think it is in order. The Senate have proposed certain amendments to that bill to strengthen the public credit, to which the House have disagreed and asked a committee of conference; and it is always in order, as I understand the rules of the Senate, to move to agree to a conference asked for by the House.

Mr. HENDRICKS. That is a question for the Chair to decide. I believe, however, that the Chair so decided the other day.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair held that it was a privileged motion before.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Then my objection cannot serve any purpose.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Ohio.

The motion was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. How shall the committee of conference be appointed?

Mr. SHERMAN. By the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That will be considered to be the sense of the Senate if there be no objection, and the Chair will appoint Mr. SHERMAN, Mr. WILLIAMS, and Mr. MORTON as the committee on the part of the Senate.

ARMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 1803) making appropriations for the support of the Army for the year ending June 30, 1870, and for other purposes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. GRIMES] to the amendment offered by the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. SUMNER.]

Mr. CONKLING. What is the amendment to the amendment?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Let it be read. It has been debated for three days.

Mr. DRAKE. I understood that the honorable Senator from Massachusetts accepted that as an amendment to his amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Let it be read.

The Chief Clerk read it, as follows:

But interest shall be allowed to the States of Massachusetts and Maine on such sums only on which the said States of Massachusetts and Maine either paid interest or lost interest by the transfer of an interest-bearing fund.

Mr. SUMNER. There was another form for that amendment which I read to the Senator from Iowa, but which is now out of my hands and in the hands of another Senator, which I propose as a substitute.

Mr. CONNESS. You cannot do that. That will not be in order. Let us have a vote on the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. SUMNER. Will the Senator from Maine be good enough to hand me the manuscript of the amendment which I propose as a substitute?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It would not be in order now if the Senator had it. This is an amendment to an amendment.

Mr. SUMNER. I beg the President's pardon. The Senator from Iowa proposed to me last night to withdraw his proposition and to allow the substitute to be moved.

Mr. GRIMES. That statement is not exactly accurate. The Senator from Massachusetts proposed it to me and I agreed to it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Let the substitute for the amendment to the amendment be read.

Mr. SUMNER. I propose equivalent words, but which are clearer and refer to existing statutes.

The Secretary read the proposed amendment to the amendment, which was to insert after the words "six per cent. per annum" the words:

And according to the rules directed to be applied to the case of Maryland by the twelfth section of the act approved March 3, 1857, entitled, "An act making appropriations for certain civil expenses of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1858."

Mr. DRAKE. That does not cover, in my judgment, the very point that the amendment of the Senator from Iowa was designed to cover, to wit: that Massachusetts shall be paid no interest upon her disbursements except upon that which she paid interest upon or lost interest by the disposal of interest-bearing funds. That amendment now presented by the Senator from Massachusetts relates only to the rules of the computation of interest, not to the particular sum upon which the interest shall be allowed, and I call the attention of the Senate to that fact.

Mr. SUMNER. Now I call the attention of the Senator to the Maryland rule, as follows:

"Interest shall be calculated up to the time of any payment made. To this interest the payment shall be first applied, and if it exceed the interest due the balance shall be applied to diminish the principal. If the payment fall short of the interest the balance of the interest shall not be added to the principal so as to produce interest. Second, interest shall be allowed to the State of Maryland on such sums only on which the said State either paid interest or lost interest by the transfer of an interest-bearing fund."

Now, all that we ask is that the whole Maryland rule shall be applied to Massachusetts.

Mr. DRAKE. I ask for the reading of the amendment to the amendment again.

The Secretary again read the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. DRAKE. I contend that under that amendment as framed now, in view of the very provision that the Senator from Massachusetts has just read, without this limitation of the moneys paid out by Maryland upon which Maryland should be allowed interest, would not be considered as included there.

Mr. SUMNER. Very well; let it be "under the rules and limitations." I will insert those words.

Mr. DRAKE. Why cannot it be expressed there that no interest is to be paid to Massachusetts and Maine but upon moneys which Massachusetts paid interest upon or to obtain which she disposed of interest-bearing bonds?

Mr. SUMNER. Is it not so expressed?

Mr. DRAKE. It is not so expressed in my judgment.

Mr. SUMNER. With great respect to the Senator I am bound to say that it is.

Mr. DRAKE. With great respect to the honorable Senator from Massachusetts, I am bound to say that it is not; and I say further, in this connection, that this is only swinging the matter around back again to the original form in which the Senator from Massachusetts presented this claim, to wit, that Massachusetts, if the amendment had been passed as he originally presented it, was to be paid interest upon every dollar that she disbursed, without regard to the question of her having paid interest upon it at all; and that is one of the features about this case that I do not like; that the attempt was made to ingraft upon the Army appropriation bill here, in the last hours of the session, a provision which would have allowed Massachusetts interest upon every dollar of her disbursements without reference to whether she had paid interest upon them or not. I protest against this thing. It is not what was done in the case of Maryland. Now, sir, if left in the shape in which the Senator from Massachusetts wishes to place it, I am of the opinion, with all respect to the honorable Senator, that it leaves it just where it was in his original amendment, that she is to be allowed interest on every dollar of her expenditures without reference to whether she paid interest on those expenditures or not.

Mr. SUMNER. The language of my amendment is "the rules and limitations." Now, what are the rules and limitations? I have read them.

Mr. CHANDLER. The Senator from Massachusetts insists upon the Maryland rule as applicable to the case of Massachusetts. Now, sir, the very thing that the Senate, if I understand its wishes, desires to avoid is the Maryland rule. In the first place, the Senator from Massachusetts makes a claim which never existed. The State of Massachusetts never had any claim, in law or in equity, as I shall show before I get through. In the next place, all that Massachusetts claims was paid to the last farthing, although she never had any real claim. She never had a just claim, but her demand was paid to the uttermost farthing. This I will show before I get through. No interest was ever dreamed of when the claim was first made, and yet the States demanded interest afterward, and although they never had any claim for principal or interest the sum which they demanded was paid. Then, the State of Maryland came in at a later day and demanded and obtained compound interest on a claim which never existed. She had been paid and obtained interest that she never had a right to demand.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. With the permission of the Senator from Michigan, it is quite manifest that there are at least half a dozen set speeches more to be made on this bill. I move, therefore, that it be laid aside, and that we take up the bill (H. R. No. 1672) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1870. That is a bill containing over fifty pages. If we are to pass any of the appropriation bills it is quite manifest that this bill must be laid aside. I therefore make the motion.

Mr. POMEROY. I hope the Senator will let us finish this bill. I said last night it could not become a law, but I want to try to pass it.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Is the motion to lay it aside informally?

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I will make the motion in that form.

Mr. POMEROY. This same amendment can be moved on that bill.

Mr. TRUMBULL. If Senators do that they must take the responsibility.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Vermont asks that the pending bill be laid aside informally with a view to take up the bill mentioned by him.

Mr. POMEROY. I object to that.

Mr. CONKLING. Then a motion to lay the bill on the table is in order.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. Then I make a motion to postpone the bill for the purpose of taking up House bill No. 1672.

The motion was agreed to.

LEGISLATIVE, ETC., APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I now move to take up House bill No. 1672.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. No. 1672) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1870.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If no objection be made the amendments reported by the Committee on Appropriations will be acted upon as they are reached in the reading of the bill. No objection being made, that course will be pursued.

The first amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was in line fifty-eight, to strike out the words "for committees, five," and to insert the word "eight;" so that the clause will read:

For stationery, $8,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in line sixty-seven, to strike out the word "ten" and insert "twenty," so as to read:

For folding documents and materials, $20,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in line sixty-nine, to strike out the word "fifteen" and insert the word "thirty;" so that the clause will read:

For miscellaneous items, $30,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in line seventy, to strike out the words "and House of Representatives, $3,000: Provided, That each Senator, Member, and Delegate shall be entitled to receive only the value of ten dollars in packing-boxes each year," and to insert "$1,000;" so that the clause will read:

For packing-boxes for the Senate, $1,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was after line one hundred and forty-six, to insert:

For packing-boxes for members of the House of Representatives, $2,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in line two hundred and fifty-three, to strike out "three" and insert "five;" so that the clause will read:

For compensation of five watchmen in reservation No. 2, $5,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to insert after line two hundred and sixty-three, in the appropriations for the Court of Claims, the following:

For stationery, books, fuel, laborers' hire, and other contingent and miscellaneous expenses, $3,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was after line two hundred and sixty-eight, to strike out the following proviso on the appropriation for the payment of the judgments of the Court of Claims:

Provided, That no judgment of said court for any sum exceeding $5,000 shall be paid out of this appropriation unless the same shall be confirmed by Congress.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was after line two hundred and ninety-two, to strike out the following proviso:

Provided, That the pay of any messenger in either of the departments (legislative, executive, or judicial) of the Government employed during the whole year shall be $840 per annum, and no more; and the pay of any assistant messenger employed as aforesaid shall be $700 per annum, and no more; and the pay of all laborers and watchmen (whether night or day) employed as aforesaid shall be $700 per annum, and no more.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in line three hundred and thirty-three, in the appropriations for the construction branch of the Treasury Department, to insert after the word "dollars" the words "chief clerk, $2,000; photographer, $2,500."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in line three hundred and forty-one, to strike out "four" and insert "six;" in line three hundred and forty-two, to strike out "seven" and insert "ten;" and in the same line, to strike out "two" and insert "seven;" in line three hundred and forty-three, to strike out "four" and insert "eight;" and in line three hundred and forty-four, to strike out "six thousand four" and insert "twelve thousand eight;" in the same line, to strike out "five" and insert "ten;" in line three hundred and forty-five, to strike out "seven" and insert "fourteen;" and in line three hundred and forty-eight, to strike out the word "thirty" and to insert "forty-seven;" so that the clause will read:

For First Comptroller of the Treasury, $3,500; for chief clerk, $2,000; six clerks of class four, $10,700; eight clerks of class three, $12,800; ten clerks of class two, $14,000; two clerks of class one, $2,400; one messenger, $840; and two laborers, $1,200: in all, $47,540.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in line three hundred and eighty-three, to strike out the word "sixty" and insert the word "fifty;" so as to allow fifty-four clerks of class three in the office of the Second Auditor of the Treasury.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GRIMES. I should like to inquire of the chairman of the committee, as he has examined this subject and I have not, whether or not the clerks in all these bureaus of the Treasury Department are not largely cut down by the House of Representatives?

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Yes, sir; largely.

Mr. GRIMES. I see that the First Comptroller is restored to something like his original position.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. What he had last year.

Mr. GRIMES. But the Second Comptroller is not.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Yes, sir.

Mr. GRIMES. Why is that?

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I was obliged to adopt this rule: this bill came to the committee on Saturday night, and of course we could not get it printed so as to be examined by the committee until Monday. We were obliged to take the appropriations for these departments or bureaus as they came from the House, upon the presumption that they had examined the subject, except where we had communications from the departments or bureaus which authorized us to move amendments. In this case we had a communication from the First Comptroller of the Treasury, Mr. Taylor, giving us a detailed statement of his force and the great necessity of maintaining the force as it was last year; and so we amended it according to that statement.

Mr. GRIMES. The result, I am afraid, is going to be that those bureaus where there is the most business are going to be cut down to such a condition that the dispatch of the public business will be very much retarded. For example, I think the business in the Second Comptroller's office has diminished comparatively little by the side of what it has in the First Comptroller's office; and so in some of the bureaus of the Auditors' offices.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I think the Second Auditor's office is kept entire.

Mr. GRIMES. By the House?

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I think so.

Mr. GRIMES. There are some of the Auditors' offices that have to do with the closing up of the accounts of the Army and Navy that are cut down more than one half, I am told. The result would be that everybody who has any business with those offices will be delayed in its transaction.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I can give you precisely the reduction in the Second Comptroller's office: four clerks of class four, four of class three, and nine of class one, out of about one hundred and twenty clerks.

Mr. GRIMES. What is it in the Fourth Auditor's office?

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. The Fourth Auditor's office is reduced a great deal, but upon information that I have received this morning I intend to move to increase it.

The Secretary continued the reading of the bill down to the clause making appropriations for the Fourth Auditor's office.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I propose to amend that clause, and perhaps I might as well do it now as we go along. In line four hundred and seven I move to strike out "fourteen" and insert "eighteen," and also to strike out "$22,400" and insert "$28,800;" in line four hundred and nine to strike out "ten" and insert "eleven;" in line four hundred and ten to strike out "$12,000" and insert "$13,200;" in line four hundred and twelve to strike out the words "one laborer, $600," and to insert "five laborers, $3,000;" and in line four hundred and thirteen to strike out "sixty" and insert "seventy;" so that the clause will read:

For the Fourth Auditor, $3,000; chief clerk, $2,000; five clerks of class four, $9,000; eighteen clerks of class three, $28,800; twelve clerks of class two, $16,800; eleven clerks of class one, $13,200; one messenger, $340; one assistant messenger, $700; and five laborers, $3,000, employed in his office—$77,340.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in line four hundred and fifty-five, after the words "female clerks" to strike out the words "authorized by this section" and to insert the words "employed in the several Departments of the Government;" and in line four hundred and fifty-nine, after the words "clerks of such classes" to insert "and a sufficient sum to pay said increased compensation to female clerks is hereby appropriated;" so that the clause will read:

The compensation of the female clerks employed in the several Departments of the Government shall be the same as clerks of the first class, and where employed on work performed by the clerks of the higher classes they shall receive like compensation with the other clerks of such classes, and a sufficient sum to pay said increased compensation to female clerks is hereby appropriated.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. Mr. President—

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. If the Senator from Vermont will pardon me for one moment, I desire to perfect the section as agreed upon by the committee and omitted by a clerical error. After the word "class," in line four hundred and fifty-seven, I move to strike out the words "and where employed on work performed by clerks of the same classes they shall receive like compensation with the other clerks of such classes." I should like to have it read now as it will stand if amended.

The CHIEF CLERK. That portion of the section, if amended as proposed, will read:

The compensation of the female clerks employed in the several Departments of the Government shall be the same as clerks of the first class, and a sufficient sum to pay said increased compensation to female clerks is hereby appropriated.

The amendment, as modified, was agreed to.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I move to strike out after the word "dollars," in line four hundred and fifty-four, down to and including the word "appropriated," in line four hundred and sixty-one.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The words proposed to be stricken out will be reported.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

The compensation of the female clerks employed in the several Departments of the Government shall be the same as clerks of the first class, and a sufficient sum to pay said increased compensation to female clerks is hereby appropriated.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on striking out the words just read.

Mr. POMEROY. I hope those words will not be stricken out. I think the Committee on Appropriations have fixed this bill just as it should be in this respect. I cannot understand why the Senator wants to strike out that provision. I should like to hear some reason for it.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. When we first began to employ female clerks the salary was fixed at $600. The next year or so we raised it to $720; soon after we raised it to $900; and every member of Congress, whether in the House or in the Senate, will bear witness to the increased number of applications consequent upon the increase of the salary. I venture to predict that if this provision shall prevail it will end in the abandonment of the employment of female clerks in the Treasury or any other Department, for it is giving so much greater compensation than females can obtain at home that they will in large numbers seek employment here at Washington. Of those who are employed from my State I have no doubt I have five applicants for one that I am able to find a place for. There are numbers of females who are qualified to teach school in various States who receive no more than from one hundred and fifty to two hundred dollars a year, therefore it is a great object for them to come here. If we shall raise the salary up to the average of the salaries given to men there will be a throng of them here, and so great an anxiety to get the places that those who are here will have but a comparatively short term of service. I regret it as the entering measure for abolishing entirely any provision for the employment of female clerks.

Mr. POMEROY. I hope the Senator from Vermont will not insist upon the amendment that he has offered. Of course, if he does it will open a debate on this question which will be almost as endless as the debate upon the question which we have had under consideration for the last two or three days. The Senator from Vermont has undertaken to tell the Senate that labor performed by females ought to be discouraged because there are so many applicants that it will result in displacing them from the Departments entirely. Now, Mr. President, there can be no good reason in that. The Senator must know that where labor is performed the compensation should be according to the capacity and character of the labor; and if the same labor is performed by one person as by another, and the same amount of time in the day bestowed on it, why should not the compensation be the same? I know very well that there are female clerks in the Departments doing the work of $1,800 clerks, and yet they cannot get the compensation. They do it day by day and month by month. In some few instances men have the clerkship, and then sub-let it to females who perform it for about half the pay. Men draw the whole salary, and get the work done by females for one-half and pocket the balance.

Mr. WILSON. I ask the Senator if he knows any case of that kind?

Mr. POMEROY. Such cases are reported to me. I am not in the Departments and do not know positively about it; but such cases are reported to me. I might refer here, if I chose, to a source of information which the Senator from Massachusetts would not dispute himself. I do not choose in this debate to use any names or refer to any source of information that would give any unnecessary publicity to anything I might say; but I want the Senator from Vermont to show the Senate, if he can, any good reason why, if the same amount of labor during the day is performed by a female clerk that is performed by a man she should not have the same compensation; and the fact that several years ago when this experiment was first tried we found that we could employ females at $600 a year is no reason why it should be continued. It is the labor performed that should be compensated, without regard to the fact whether it is performed by a male or a female.

The Senator objects because there are so many applicants; he can get this labor so cheap that from his own State he has five applicants where he can get employment for but one, I am sorry that is so; but what does it argue? It shows that the avenues of employment and labor are not open to this class in his State, or that he has more of this class than of the other.

By the last census you will see that in the New England States there is a disproportion. There are in Massachusetts perhaps twenty-five or thirty thousand more females than males. All this goes to show that it is a class of labor that we should secure and encourage, rather than discourage and discountenance. There is no reason why this labor, which is so industriously and patiently performed, should not be creditably paid for. No female can in Washington get board and clothing any cheaper than a male clerk. No avenues are open to them to lessen their expenses. They have, I may say, increased expenses; but I will admit, for the sake of this argument, that they have equal expenses here in Washington with male clerks, and why should they not be compensated as well? The objection to it is only a relic of that former barbarism which considered them as having no rights which men were bound to respect. We have been in the habit of paying them a mere pittance, and they have eked out an existence with great carefulness, because they have been restricted to a compensation perfectly disgraceful. Their patient labor, performed by day and by night, has not been compensated either by the Government or in the States as it ought to be.

The Senator says they are well qualified for school-teachers. Why are they not paid as reasonably and as liberally for teaching school as men are? Simply because of the fact which I think exists that they are so numerous, so many are unemployed, and competition is greater, and hence female school-teachers can be hired for less wages than males. But it is no good ground. It may be a misfortune to a class of persons to be more numerous, especially in certain States, and to be competitors for labor where there is more competition, but why should we work that misfortune when they come to perform labor for the Government into a discrimination against them? There is no good reason for it. I protest against being a party here in the Senate or anywhere else to discrimination against labor performed by female clerks. They have as many expenses; they are as industrious; they should be encouraged; labor should be as well paid when performed by them as by any other class.

I do not care to go into this whole question and discuss it on an appropriation bill. The fact is I deprecate anything that leads to protracted discussion on the appropriation bills. If it is the intention of the Senate to pass those bills, as I suppose it is, I hope the Senator from Vermont will withdraw his amendment. This is the first time in the history of this Senate when the avenues have been opened equally in all the Departments to male clerks and female clerks, and I do not want to be discouraged and have the project defeated when it is first presented.

Mr. HARLAN. If I understand the nature of this amendment, I think it ought to be adopted to effect the purpose intended by the honorable Senator from Kansas. If the amendment should not be adopted the law will then stand: "The compensation of female clerks employed in the several Departments of the Government shall be the same as clerks of the first class." Under such a law no female could be employed to labor for less pay than $1,200 a year and only on work for which more than $1,200 a year is paid. This would operate, in females, for there is a vast amount of work, in my opinion, deleteriously to the interests of styled clerical performed in the different Departments that is done by persons who can be employed for less than $1,200 a year, if the heads of Departments are disposed to economize; but if you compel them if they employ females to pay $1,200 they will in all human probability, having reference to the interests of the Government, employ boys and children to do that which ladies now do, such as counting notes, counting fractional currency, and services of that kind.

In my opinion this amendment ought to be adopted; and then, if the Senate desire to put ladies on the same footing with gentlemen there ought to be added to the bill a section running in about this way, "that nothing in this act or in any existing law shall prohibit the head or any Department from employing females at the same rate of salary with males for clerical service."

Mr. POMEROY. The Senator from Iowa would be entirely right if this clause did not confine the provision to clerks. It has no reference to anything else. "It is for the compensation of female clerks;" it does not touch the other form of labor performed.

Mr. HARLAN. Probably the Senator overlooks the fact that there are a great many persons employed out of the contingent fund on what is called the temporary list of clerks at a less compensation than $1,200 a year.

Mr. POMEROY. They may be employed in labor.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I am sorry that this proposition before the Senate should be embarrassed in its details by any suggestion such as is made by the Senator from Iowa. It seems to me so eminently just and proper that females employed in the public service should have the same pay, the same compensation for doing the same work, that males receive that I do not see upon what ground the Senator from Vermont makes his motion to strike it out. Why females who are now introduced into the various Departments of the Government to perform clerical services, to write up the records and write letters and copy papers, should be paid less for furnishing the copy than males I cannot conceive. It seems to me eminently proper that this provision recommended by the Committee on Appropriations, and which has already passed the House, should be retained in the bill.

Now, sir, I am not in the situation of the Senator from Vermont, who seems to be troubled with having a great many applications from ladies for places in the Departments, or have a great many persons in the Departments whom he may have recommended. I am not aware that there is a single female in any Department of this Government who owes her place to any recommendation of mine. It is possible there may be one. If so it is a case that occurred some half dozen years ago, and I do not know whether that person is in the Department now or not. So that, as far as I am concerned, I can speak indifferently in reference to this matter in regard to any of the employes at the present time.

I think the time has come when, if we are to have ladies in the Departments performing clerical duties there, we should pay them for those duties the same that we pay gentlemen. Upon what principle is it? Why does the Senator from Vermont object to it and ask to strike it out? Why, he says, you can get females to work for less. Is that the principle upon which payment is to be made for services rendered to the Government? Doubtless you could find persons who would agree to occupy the seats upon the bench of the Supreme Court of the United States for salaries less than are paid to the gentlemen who sit there. The Senator from Missouri reminds me that we could find plenty of persons willing to occupy these seats for less than $5,000 a year. That is no criterion by which to test the amount of salary that should be paid to an individual. It should be a reasonable compensation.

But the question here is not as to what the compensation should be, but if you pay a male clerk $1,200 to copy records, and they are furnished to you just as well by a female clerk, is she to have but $900 and the man $1,200? There is no principle in such a discrimination, and I hope this amendment will not prevail. I am sorry that the chairman of the committee has struck out several words in the section as it passed, and I shall move to reconsider the vote by which they were stricken out in case this motion fails.

Mr. POMEROY. I was going to move that. I am glad the Senator proposes it.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. That cannot be done until we get into the Senate.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I was not aware that these words were stricken out.

Mr. GRIMES. What words are they?

Mr. TRUMBULL. From line four hundred and fifty-seven to line four hundred and fifty-nine these words have been stricken out:

And where employed on work performed by the clerks of the higher classes they shall receive like compensation with the other clerks of such classes.

That clause has been stricken out on the motion of the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. GRIMES. When?

Mr. TRUMBULL. Here, as I understood, a few minutes ago.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. That was agreed to by the committee, as I stated, and was omitted by a clerical mistake in the printing of the amended bill.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I am very sorry it has been stricken out. It ought not to have been stricken out.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. The Senator can move it again in the Senate.

Mr. CONNESS. The Senator from Connecticut [Mr. FERRY] is preparing an amendment, which will be ready in a moment, that meets the views of the Senator from Illinois, and I want him to hear it.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I will give way.

Mr. FERRY. The amendment which I propose is to insert in line four hundred and fifty-six, after the word "as" the word "male;" and in line four hundred and fifty-seven to strike out the words "first class" and insert "same grade;" in lines four hundred and fifty-seven, four hundred and fifty-eight, and four hundred and fifty-nine to strike out from the word "and" to the word "classes;" so that the clause will read, if thus amended,

The compensation of the female clerks employed in the several Departments of the Government shall be the same as male clerks of the same grade.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Let me suggest to my friend that that will make it very uncertain. The grades are established by law. You will find on looking at the statutes that there are so many clerks of the first class, so many of the second, so many of the third, and so many of the fourth. Now, if you put in the words "same grade" you cannot tell where they belong, unless you say that there shall be so many female clerks of the first class, so many of the second, so many of the third, and so many of the fourth. The grades depend upon the numbers as established by law. They are not graded by the kind of labor they perform.

Mr. FERRY. But my object is to let the head of the Department or the bureau employ their male or female clerks according to the exigencies of his Department, in any grade or class, and pay to either, irrespective of sex, the sum which the law appropriates for the payment of services thus rendered. If the word "grade" is the wrong one I am willing to insert "class." I made inquiry of a Senator who was formerly at the head of a Department, and he thought "grade" was the proper word to employ.

Mr. FESSENDEN. That is a proper word to employ, but Senators will observe that the law says how many clerks there shall be of each grade in a Department. It says there shall be so many clerks of the first class, so many of the second class, so many of the third class, and so many of the fourth class. Now, if you say that female clerks may be employed instead of male clerks among that number, in that specific number thus fixed, you can do it; but you must alter the whole frame of your bill throughout, because the bill says "so many clerks of the first class, so many of the second class, so many of the third class, so many of the fourth class, and in addition thereto so many female clerks." They are "in addition thereto." That would not be consistent with the proposition the Senator makes, because if you take a portion of these and put them in the place of male clerks in these several grades you do not at the same time furnish the number requisite in addition to those provided for by the statute.

Mr. CONNESS. I understand that in the matter of appointment that point is entirely taken care of and fixed. When a clerk shall be appointed of either sex under this provision he or she will be appointed a first, second, third, or fourth class clerk. The law provides how many first class, how many second, how many third, how many fourth class clerks there shall be. The female, if appointed in either of those classes, makes up one of that number. The class can only have so many; it may be composed of one sex or of the other exclusively, or of both.

Mr. GRIMES. I do not believe this bill can be improved much as it is printed.

Mr. POMEROY. It is precisely right as printed.

Mr. GRIMES. It is right with the exception of inserting after the word "on," in the four hundred and fifty-seventh line, the words "the same;" and then after the word "work" inserting "and," and inserting "performing the same duty as;" so as to read:

The compensation of the female clerks employed in the several Departments of the Government shall be the same as clerks of the first class, and where employed on the same work and performing the same duty as clerks of the higher classes they shall receive like compensation with other clerks of such classes.

Mr. CONNESS. They are both alike in their effect.

Mr. GRIMES. I move to reconsider the vote by which those words from line four hundred and fifty-seven to line four hundred and fifty-nine were stricken out of the bill.

Mr. NYE. Will the honorable Senator from Iowa allow me to suggest to him an amendment in his phraseology, and that is, "on the same or similar work." It cannot be the same work.

Mr. FERRY. I offer my amendment to perfect the clause which was proposed to be stricken out.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That is in order.

Mr. FERRY. And I should like to vote on that amendment before any other amendment is proposed.

Mr. GRIMES. The words have been stricken out; we must reconsider that vote.

Mr. WELCH. Mr. President, I wish to enter my protest against a distinction being made between male and female clerks as to the value of labor. I have this morning returned from a visit to the Treasury office, and I have been informed there by those who have charge of the various departments that the female clerks are fully equal in the value of their labor to the male clerks, that they have all the accuracy and assiduity in labor that is necessary to success in their departments.

Now, sir, I believe in the payment of labor by male or female up to its full value, and I think the making of any distinction of sex in the payment of labor is the sheerest prejudice, unfounded in any genuine philosophy. I believe the time is coming, fast coming, when all the avenues of honorable distinction will be open to capacity without distinction of sex or color. I believe the time is coming when all men and all women will have free access to the higher walks of learning and literature and art and the higher professions, and it is an ignoble prejudice for men of the high standing that Senators have attained to here to make any distinction in the payment of labor simply because the laborer is a female. I would have all treated alike, and I am sorry that the word "male" or "female" has to be introduced into any bill whatever. I hope that the amendment of the Senator from Connecticut will prevail.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Connecticut.

Mr. FESSENDEN. It will be seen, I think, when the organization of the Departments is understood, that this amendment would be out of place. If you look at this section you will see that it authorizes so many clerks of the several classes, and in addition sixty female clerks. Now, if you take a female for one of the clerkships mentioned above you must take that from the number of sixty female clerks, and therefore you must make a provision in order to meet that contingency, because there can be only sixty female clerks in the office of the Treasurer according to this bill. If, therefore, you will fill up the upper grades you diminish the force of the Department just so much, because you cannot increase that number. The framework of the section is that there shall be so many male clerks of the several classes and so many female clerks.

Again, let me repeat to the Senate that nothing is arrived at by saying they shall receive the compensation of clerks who perform the same service or similar service. In the Departments similar service is performed by clerks of all the grades, first, second, third, and fourth class clerks. There are clerks of the first and second classes who perform similar service to clerks of the fourth class. How is the Secretary to grade them? He cannot tell anything about it. The classes of clerkships are formed by promotion. Men who have been there a certain time go up when a vacancy exists. They fill these places necessarily in that way according to the rules of the Department as a general thing. I suppose there are exceptions to it; and the work they do and the kind of labor they perform is such as is called for by the occasion. There is no specific labor for clerks of the first class, second class, third class, and fourth class. If therefore you make the amendment which is proposed in relation to that matter the Secretary has no rule to go by whatever. He might put them in any class he pleased. The service designates nothing. Therefore, as I said before, if you want to accomplish that purpose you must provide in the bill that there may be so many female clerks of the several classes, first, second, third, and fourth. That is the only way you can arrive at it.

Mr. HARLAN. I agree in part with what has been said by the honorable Senator from Maine, but I think he errs in overlooking this fact: while the bill does provide, for example, for fifteen clerks of class four, I know of no law compelling the head of the Department to appoint males to that class. He may appoint females to class four if he sees proper, the compensation of which is fixed by law, provided the head of the Department chooses to appoint a female clerk of that grade. But the Senator will remember that the accounting officers of the Treasury authorized the head of a Department to employ clerks of a less grade to fill out the number of those indicated of the higher grades. For example, every one of those fifteen may be filled with clerks of the first class, or of the third class, or of the second class. What the Senator from Connecticut seeks to secure is, that if the head of a Department should appoint a female to any one of these grades, of class one, two, three, or four, she shall receive the same pay as a male clerk would receive if appointed to that grade, and that being his object it seems to me his amendment is right.

I do not perceive that the additional clause, providing for the employment of sixty females, changes the argument in the least, for that does not say they shall be of either of these grades. The language is: "sixty female clerks, $72,000."

I suppose that that leaves it discretionary with the head of the Department whether he will employ clerks of the one or of the other grade, and he is not compelled to employ any one of them unless in his opinion the exigencies of the public service may require it; but if he should employ female clerks for any one of the classes named in the bill, the honorable Senator desires that the female shall receive the same pay as if a male clerk had been appointed to a position in that class.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Connecticut.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I ask to have it reported.

The CHIEF CLERK. The amendment is to insert after the word "as" and before "clerks," in line four hundred and fifty-six, the word "male," and to strike out the word "first" in line four hundred and fifty-seven before "class" and insert "same;" so that if amended the clause will read:

The compensation of the female clerks employed in the several Departments of the Government shall be the same as male clerks of the same class.

Mr. FERRY. Then strike out down to the word "and" in the four hundred and fifty-ninth line.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That has been already stricken out.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I desire to inquire of the Senator from Connecticut how extensive he understands that proposition to be? I suppose there are six or seven hundred females employed in the different Departments of the Government. Does he understand that this proposition will place all those females employed in any way upon the compensation of first-class clerks, or does he attach any importance to the word "clerks?"

Mr. FERRY. The object of this amendment is simply to provide that when females are employed in the several Departments as clerks, in whatever class they are employed, they shall receive the same compensation as males in the same class. If hitherto the female clerks employed in the several Departments of the Government have not been classified, I suppose that, under the operation of this bill, if passed as amended, they will be classified, and will simply receive the measure of justice of getting the same compensation with male clerks of the same class. That is my object.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. The Senator does not quite understand me. I understand that the law attaches a particular meaning to the word "clerk." "Clerk," as employed as relating to the public service in any of the Departments means an accountant, means a person employed in keeping accounts or records, implying the necessary skill to perform that service. So under the civil service bill they are classified as first, second, third, and fourth class, according to their skill in that business. Now, the Senator knows that there are five or six hundred females, more or less, who are employed in the public service, but not as clerks in any sense. They are employed in various ways; some of them as messengers, but the great bulk of them are simply employed in the registry and Treasury Department, simply counting money—nothing else. Does the Senator understand that his proposition covers that class? That is what I wish to know.

Mr. FERRY. If the females now employed are clerks the amendment would reach them and provide for their compensation according to the class to which they belong. If those now employed or hereafter to be employed are not clerks, then the amendment would not affect them and would leave them precisely as they are.

Mr. CONNESS. And in addition I will say, with the permission of the Senator from Maine, that if the Secretary should see fit to take all these female employes who are not now classed as clerks, but employed in occupations other than clerical, and transpose or appoint them into any class of clerks, they would under this provision get the compensation to which the class to which they were appointed was entitled.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Then, as I get the meaning more explicitly from the Senator from California, it is that the female employes as distinguished from clerks, those who are not employed in clerical duty, are not affected.

Mr. CONNESS. Not at all. It does not apply to them. It cannot in any way. If men have been employed to do the work they do, and called clerks, then of course it would change the case; but they are not.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Connecticut.

Mr. HOWE. "Fair play is a jewel." I do not see why the law is not already sufficient to-day to give female clerks the same pay that male clerks have.

Mr. CONNESS. They do not do it.

Mr. HOWE. The Senator from California says they do not do it. I do not know that they do not. So far as I understand the matter, every clerkship in every one of these Departments is wide open to the competition of both classes.

Mr. TRUMBULL. The law has fixed a different pay.

Mr. HOWE. The law has not fixed a different payment, but the law has done another thing; it has declared how many clerkships of these different classes there shall be, and thrown those open to the competition of both classes alike, as I conceive; but in addition to that it has created a certain number of employments which it holds to the exclusive use of the female sex and excludes from these employments all males. So far as the law is concerned, you cannot charge that with partiality toward the male sex, for it opens every opportunity to a female that it does to a male and opens hundreds of opportunities to females from which males are excluded. If females do not get as high pay in the Departments as males—and that is the fact, I suppose—it is because they are not appointed to these places, and not because any law excludes them. So if the object of this amendment be to open the path to preferment to these ladies it is unnecessary. There is no call for it. The path is open already. The simple proposition is, the practical effect of it will be just this, I take it, and no more: to raise the pay of all females now in the Departments from $900 to $1,200 a year. There will not be any more female clerks employed than there are now; there will not be any more clerks employed in both classes, because the number is limited by law.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Will the Senator from Wisconsin allow me to read him a statute which will show him that he is entirely mistaken in this respect, as I think? I have before me the statute passed March 14, 1864, which goes on to provide that in the various offices clerks may be employed; in the office of the Commissioner of Customs one clerk of class three, three of class two, and four of class one, providing for various clerks all through. Then comes this provision:

"And the heads of the several Departments are hereby authorized to employ females instead of any of the clerks hereinbefore designated, at an annual compensation not exceeding $600 per year."

That has been changed to $900, but the female clerks were instead of those clerks provided for in classes one, two, three, and four; it gave them the work without the pay. That was the law.

Mr. FESSENDEN. It has been changed entirely since.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Changed by increasing the salary.

Mr. HOWE. I think the Senator from Illinois, if he will trace our legislation through on this subject, will find that the law does not stand to-day as he reads it there; but I will not have any dispute with the Senator from Illinois as to how the law is. I will make him a fair proposition: that if the law does exclude females from any of these appointments I will agree to the amendment of it so that they shall be as eligible as men.

Mr. TRUMBULL. That is not the proposition.

Mr. HOWE. I know it is not. I say I will agree to that amendment. I will open the avenue to all.

Mr. CONNESS and Mr. FERRY. That is what this does.

Mr. HOWE. No, sir. I will open the avenue to all these employments as wide to females as to males; but the purpose and the end, I think, of the pending amendment is, as I said before, simply to raise the pay of the females who are now in the Government service from $900 to $1,200 a year. If the motive upon which it is urged is to prove our devotion to the sex, I have to say simply that I know of a better way of proving my devotion to them than to vote for this bill; and consequently if I wanted to prove my devotion to them by the offer of money, I would go a larger figure; $300 a year is not enough. It does not measure my devotion to that sex.

If the object of this amendment is not this, but to benefit the Government and get a better class of service, a better kind of labor into the Departments, that is a motive which has not been yet avowed, and will not be avowed because no one will pretend that you will get any better female labor at $1,200 than you do at $900 a year.

Now, if it is urged (and that is the argument which has been so far made) that they do just as much labor as males and therefore ought to have just the same pay, I will not make any issue with any gentleman who asserts that they do the same amount of labor; but conceding it to be so I say the consequence does not follow. You may get at Mackinaw lake trout for two cents a pound, on which you can make just as good a meal as you can on the most delicate fish that are found anywhere in the world, and yet you know that at Mackinaw there are many kinds of fish that bring an enormous price. Mr. President, the simple truth is that female labor, as society is constituted, does not command so high a price as male labor. The Senator from Kansas says he regrets that. I am sorry for it, too. I will agree to an act of Congress reconstructing human society, and let the Senator from Kansas draw the act, though perhaps I should want to move some amendments. That is the way society stands to-day. The number of ladies who will be employed, whether you make the salary $1,200 or $2,500, is limited. Do you say you are doing justice by these ladies? You are doing injustice to all the rest of the sex as well as to the Government when you are taxing all the rest of the sex to confer a special benefit on the few who are thus employed. I do not think that is doing a favor to the sex at large. With the exception of the few who get the salary, the rest have to contribute to pay it, and I think they would rather pay $900 than pay $1,200 a year.

But, Mr. President, it is not so much the fault of the law after all, that female labor commands less than male labor. It is not the fault of the law that employments are not open to females. There are but very few employments under this Government, so far as I know, from which females are excluded by law. The professions are open to them; every department of industry is open to them that I know anything about, and I think that almost all the offices are open to them so far as the law goes. There is no law excluding them. I do not know why they do not get into them. I suppose if the ballot was put into their hands they would get these offices; at least a great many ladies think they would, and I am not sure that they would not. I should hate to compete with them. Indeed, without the ballot I should hate to run against one of them for any office I know of. But the law is not to blame. They have the full privilege of going into any of these employments, but they do not go. Here and there one does engage in some of these pursuits. Some succeed, but others, as is the case with our own sex, do not succeed. I am unwilling to give a vote here or to say a word that will throw any impediment in the way of either any man or any woman who does not have a fair chance in the world's strife; but I do not think we are called upon or permitted to vote money out of the Treasury needlessly in order to indulge a mere sentiment of ours. There are better ways in which we can advance the interests of the female sex at large than this proposed now, simply voting an additional $800 to the inconsiderable number of them who are employed in these Departments, and therefore I shall vote against this amendment.

Mr. TRUMBULL. It is usually easy when persons do not wish to do a thing to find difficulties in the way of accomplishing it. Now, various amendments are thrown in the way of accomplishing what seems to have been the desire on the part of the House and of some members of the Senate, and that is placing males and females on an equality so far as they perform the same service. The Senator from Wisconsin has trouble about it because he thinks the law is one way. Now, it is very easy to ascertain in any of these Departments whether a female is performing the same kind of service as a male clerk. The person at the head of a division knows if two clerks are put to copying papers, one of whom is a man and the other a woman, whether they are performing the same kind of service, and if they are performing the same kind of service and one does the same as the other, it is easy to pay them the same compensation. Now, what is the law? I wish to satisfy the Senator from Wisconsin that he is entirely mistaken as to what the statutes now are. I read when I was up before from the statute of March 14, 1864, which provides for a great number of clerks in the various offices of the Government, in the Comptroller's offices, all the various Auditor's offices, the Treasurer's office, the Register's office, the Commissioner of Customs's office, the office of the Secretary of the Navy, of the Adjutant General, &c., and after providing for these various clerks, amounting to hundreds, some of whom are in the first, some the second, some the third, and some the fourth class, the statute then declares:

"And the heads of the said several Departments are hereby authorized to employ females instead of any of the clerks hereinbefore designated, at an annual compensation not exceeding $600 per year, whenever in their opinion the same can be done consistently with the interests of the public service."

By that statute of 1864 the female clerks were to be paid $600 when employed instead of male clerks, not one of whom was to receive less than $1,200, and many of whom were to receive $1,800. That was the law of 1864. The pay of the female clerks has been raised since that, but has that statute been changed? I read now from a statute passed in 1866, raising the pay of the female clerks; and what does it say?

"That the female clerks and counters employed in the several Departments and bureaus whose appointments are made by the several heads of Departments under the provisions of law, and whose legal compensation has heretofore amounted to $720 each per annum—

Twenty per cent. was added to $600, making it $720—

"and the female clerks employed at the Post Office Department shall, from and after the 30th day of June, 1866, receive in lieu of all other compensation an annual salary of $900 each per annum; and the amount necessary to pay the increased salaries herein provided for is appropriated," &c.

It appears that when you put all these statutes together the law stands as it has been stated in the Senate. I think if we adopt the amendment proposed by the Senator from Connecticut the heads of the Departments will find no difficulty in paying females the same compensation for labor that males receive for performing the same labor, and I hope the Senate will adopt it.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I do not feel disposed to interfere with this matter any further than to state what in my judgment is necessary. The Senate will notice that in this section and several of the sections females are described under the head of "copyists." Take the Third Auditor's office; they give him ten copyists. In the Second Comptroller's office they are called "copyists." Now, there are clerks, so to speak—those who do the proper business of a clerk in the office—and there are "copyists," females described as "copyists," and there are "counters;" and the law which the Senator from Illinois has just read speaks of "clerks" and "counters." If you have this provision simply saying that the female clerks employed in the several Departments shall be paid so and so, it is doubtful whether, taking the statutes together, copyists merely and counters would not be excluded.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Are there not male copyists and counters?

Mr. FESSENDEN. There are no male counters, but there are male copyists; there are clerks who do this labor. You will notice that in the Third Auditor's office there are so many copyists; females are not mentioned; so in the Fourth Auditor's room, so in the Second Comptroller's room, there are so many copyists authorized in addition to the clerks, and these are females; and then in General Spinner's office, where you give sixty female clerks, they are about all counters. In the Register's office they are all counters. Now, it depends upon what you mean. If you can confine this increased compensation to those who do the clerical duty; so to speak, it will apply to very few persons in the Departments. It would take all, probably, in the War Department; there are but about thirty; it would take a very small number in the Treasury Department. If you mean to cover the whole—and I see no reason why they should not all be put on the same ground, for they work equally hard, and the business of counters, if they do their duty well and are capable, requires a good deal of care and a great deal of skill also—I do not see why you should not put in after "clerks" the words "copyists and counters," so as to leave no doubt as to the true construction of the law. If, on the contrary, you mean simply to confine it to those who do clerical duty, then it stands well enough as it is now and would apply to a very few persons.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I move to amend, if it is in order, the amendment offered by the Senator from Connecticut, by inserting after the word "Government" the words "and performing clerical duty;" so that it will read:

The compensation of the female clerks employed in the several Departments of the Government, and performing clerical duty, &c.

Mr. FERRY. I do not think those words ought to be inserted. If there be the distinction which has been suggested by the Senator from Maine, [Mr. FESSENDEN]—I am not sufficiently familiar with the Departments to judge myself whether that distinction actually exists or not—I then certainly would make no objection to the insertion of the words "copyists and counters" after "clerks," and put the three in. My sole object is to give those employed in the Departments of the Government, of either sex, the same compensation.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Who do the same work.

Mr. FERRY. Certainly.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. But unless these words which I propose to put in are construed to be words of exclusion, and the Senator accepts them, I can see very well that it will apply to persons who are employed not as clerks who are there, and they will have the same pay with male clerks while they are in no sense clerks. My object, therefore, is to express a distinction between those who are properly clerks and those who are doing other duty.

Mr. CONNESS. My answer to the suggestion of the Senator who has just spoken is this: if there be in a Department a man called or denominated a clerk or otherwise, or not denominated, who performs a given work which may be performed as well by a female, and the head of that Department sees fit to appoint a female to do that work, then this amendment gives the female the compensation for it that the male receives. Why not?

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I am willing to do that.

Mr. CONNESS. That is what the amendment provides. If there be employed there persons performing labor which has never been performed by any male clerk they are not affected by this amendment at all. No additional words are necessary to provide that they shall not be affected or included.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. What is the objection to it?

Mr. CONNESS. The objection that exists to all surplusage, to saying that no is no and yes is yes, when we already know the proposition.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Everybody's vision may not be quite so clear as the honorable Senator's. I can see that the words of this amendment are inclusive, and they will include, and it will be insisted that they fairly include a class of persons who are not technically clerks, and therefore I submit to my honorable friend that as a doubt can fairly be raised it is safer to make it explicit by words of exclusion, and therefore I hope it will be acceptable to say "and performing clerical duties." If it is in order I make that motion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will not be in order until the amendment of the Senator from Connecticut is disposed of. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Connecticut.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Now I move to insert after the word "government," in line four hundred and fifty-six, the words "and performing clerical duties."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. POMEROY. I suppose there cannot be any mistake about that. This means that this increased compensation shall be confined to those who do clerical labor. It does not affect those who are counting. That is what the Senator means. It does not affect those who count notes, and it does not affect those employed in any Department except in performing clerical labor.

Mr. FESSENDEN. It may cover about a dozen or a couple of dozen in the whole Treasury Department. That is the way it stands now.

Mr. TRUMBULL. It ought to include the counters and copyists undoubtedly. I thought the Senator from Connecticut was going to insert those words, "copyists and counters." Is there any objection to inserting them? If not, I move that they be inserted.

Mr. FERRY. The Senator from Illinois will permit me to state to him that I endeavored to frame an amendment after the manner which he has just suggested, and I found it confused the sentence. His object will be accomplished by adding after the word "class," in the amendment already adopted, the words "and female counters and copyists shall receive the same compensation as male counters and copyists."

Mr. POMEROY. There are no male counters.

Mr. FERRY. There may be at some future time. It will do no harm. That will cover the whole ground.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I will accept that.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment to the amendment will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed, after the word "class," in line four hundred and fifty-seven, to insert "female counters and copyists shall receive the same compensation as male counters and copyists."

Mr. HENDRICKS. I wish to inquire of the chairman of the committee what will be the increased expenditure in the Departments if the compensation of the female employés be made the same as male employés, at $1,200 a year?

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I suppose it will be an increase of about $400 on the average of the entire body of female clerks, about six hundred probably.

Mr. HENDRICKS. That would be $240,000.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. This is clearly a departure from the principle on which the honorable Senator from Connecticut and the honorable Senator from Illinois started. That was to place the female clerks on a par with the male clerks. That I agree to, that any female employed on the same work as a male and doing the same service is entitled to the same compensation. I think that is a clear proposition. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Connecticut was based on that idea clearly, and, as amended, I think makes it explicit that they are to have the same compensation; but now a new principle, I submit, is introduced. It is now extended to a class of persons who are in no sense clerks.

Mr. TRUMBULL. The copyists are clerks.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. There may be some copyists, it is true, but there are more counters. Counters of what? What does that word "counter" mean? There are counters of money and there are counters of coupons. To the counters of money there is some responsibility attached. There are some losses arising from accidents and the like.

Mr. TRUMBULL. The word "counters" is a statutory word, already introduced into the law.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I know; but I mean to say, as a matter of fact, that it has a broad range in the practical affairs of the Departments. It applies as well to counting the coupons, which is a mere mechanical affair, as to the counting of money, about which there is responsibility; and I do not understand that there are any males employed upon that particular business. The Senator will see that between the nominal business of counting coupons and the duty of clerks to which this amendment of the Senator from Connecticut applies there is a very broad distinction. And now, sir, if this proposition carries, then you will have established a principle by which you pay female employés not of a skillful character a very different rate of compensation from what you pay men.

Mr. FERRY. Will the Senator allow me a moment to have the amendment reported as it now reads?

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Certainly.

The CHIEF CLERK. After the word "class" it is proposed to insert—

And female counters and copyists shall receive the same compensation as male counters and copyists doing the same class of service.

Mr. TRUMBULL. That is the same principle.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Suppose there should happen to be a male copyist there, and suppose there should happen to be a first-class clerk detailed to count money, that would authorize, I suppose, under this amendment the same compensation for all the female counters.

Mr. FERRY. Evidently not.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. If this is passed the result of it will be throughout all these Departments that while you have a very large number of male messengers and male employés at from six to eight hundred dollars a year, and some as high as $900, the counters will be put at $1,200, and the male employés, it strikes me, will get but eight or nine hundred dollars.

Mr. CONNESS. The Senator evidently misapprehends the amendment entirely. As to the suggestion he makes as to what would be the case if a male were appointed a counter, I think I can answer that. There are no counters but females. I think if a male were appointed a counter and set into the room the females in that case would drive him out. I do not think they would allow him. I think they would simply defend their employment against the intrusion. There is no danger of its coming to that in the Departments.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Let me ask the honorable Senator, then, how it affects the price of labor at all.

Mr. CONNESS. It does not affect the price of this class, and that is well understood.

Mr. FESSENDEN. In my opinion you ought to fix the whole matter differently as to what the female should receive. The mistake that my friend from Connecticut makes, if he will permit me to say so, is in the expression of the same classes performing similar service. You cannot tell anything about that, and the statutes can never be construed in that way. You must designate the persons by the duties they perform in the Department or else there is utter confusion in the construction of the law. I have expressed no opinion about this matter of raising the pay of the females employed in the Departments; but if you do raise the pay of one class you ought to raise the pay of all the classes performing similar labor. I do not mean messengers; I do not mean all the persons employed in the Printing Bureau; but to draw the distinction that is drawn by the amendment proposed by my colleague and confine it to those performing clerical duty will confine the increase of compensation to a very few persons. If the Senator from Connecticut would simply leave out the words "grade" and "class" and "service," so that the females employed there, whether as clerks upon clerical duty or as counters or as copyists, as described in the several statutes, which recognize all three, shall receive the pay of clerks of the first class, and then provide further, if he pleases, that if appointed to a higher grade as clerk they shall receive the pay of that grade, he will cover all that he desires to accomplish and the thing will be definite. I was about to say that I object entirely to making a distinction. Of course there is a distinction, and a very wide one, between the capacity of individuals; but there is no distinction in the classes. Many of those called copyists, who are females, are as good copyists as there are in the Departments. Many of those who are employed merely as counters do work that requires great skill and care. The work itself is exceedingly laborious—trying to the eyes and trying to the health even of those who perform the duty of counting the coupons, which requires great accuracy and care; and they exercise it, and do very much better, I think, than men would do in the same position, and they are entitled to just as much pay as those who are employed on what might be called technically clerical duties. No distinction, in my judgment, ought to be made between them; if you raise the pay of one class you ought to raise the pay of the other.

But there is a still better idea if you could only carry it out, and that is the proposition that was made last year from some quarter to grade the counters themselves. If you raise them all up to $1,200 there is no necessity for that. I think it is better to grade them, although that perhaps would make a good deal of difficulty in the Department itself on account of the rivalry that would exist among the different persons; but I object altogether to confining this $1,200 pay to those who are employed on what is strictly clerical duty, when I know that many of the others not performing clerical duty, so called, deserve quite as much from their capacity and from the nature of the labor which they perform as the others do.

Mr. POMEROY. If the Senator will prepare an amendment covering precisely the ground he has taken I think the Senate will adopt it without opposition. I think we had better pass on with the bill and let an amendment be prepared by the Senator from Maine covering the ground he has indicated.

Mr. FERRY. We are now in committee. The principle of the amendment is obvious to all of us. What we intend to accomplish is to equalize compensation irrespective of sex. Let the amendment be adopted in committee, and when we come in the Senate the corrections in phraseology suggested by the Senator from Maine can be made if necessary.

Mr. POMEROY. If the Senator from Maine will prepare an amendment such as he has suggested I have no objection. Let us go on with the bill and take no further vote on this question now. ["Question!" "Question!"]

Mr. HENDRICKS. I am not going to vote for this amendment, because I supposed there was not to be an effort at increased expenditures in the Departments at this time. I supposed it was understood that some degree of economy would be attempted. Now, there is an attempt at an increased expenditure, and, as I think, without any necessity, of a great many thousand dollars. I recollect very well a few years ago it was said that if females were employed in the Departments they would be glad to receive $600 a year, and that it would be a service to them and an economical measure for the Government. That was the argument on which this system was adopted. Then it was proposed to increase the compensation, and I supposed that that was satisfactory. Now the same compensation is to be given to the female employés as to the male employés. Then the whole reason for the introduction of the system, so far as economy is concerned, has disappeared. I do not think it is called for by the history of this measure. Senators know very well that it was urged in the Senate four or five years ago as a measure of economy for the Government, as a measure of accommodation and benefit to the persons who might be appointed, that $600 a year was a very handsome compensation for female labor. That was urged here, and it was a good compensation. Now, the compensation has gone up to $900 a year, and that is not sufficient, and under professions of economy it is proposed now to add a great many thousand dollars to the expenditures in this direction. I shall not vote for it.

Mr. SHERMAN. I have but a word to say. The number of male clerks is limited by law, clearly defined for each Department. The number of female employés is without limit, and it was so left on the ground that it was impossible to limit it, and that they were called upon to perform new duties in the Treasury Department not required before the war. Female clerks were set to counting money growing out of the inauguration of the system of paper money. That class of clerks were not employed before the war, and there is no limit to the number employed.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Yes, there is.

Mr. SHERMAN. Hardly.

Mr. FESSENDEN. The law fixes in the several bureaus the number that may be employed. Then we have been in the habit and ought always to do it, although I see the House of Representatives has not done it this year, of giving the Secretary a sum of money for the payment of extra clerk hire. Out of that fund others have been from time to time appointed when they were needed.

Mr. SHERMAN. I shall postpone my remarks on this matter until the Senator from Maine draws up his amendment.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I do not propose to draw any. I understand the Senator from Illinois is drawing one.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Connecticut.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. Now, I suppose the question comes up on my motion to strike out.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question recurs on the motion of the Senator from Vermont, to strike out the words which have been read, as amended.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I suggest to the Senator from Vermont, inasmuch as there is time to amend it at a later stage, that he postpone his motion to strike out until the bill comes into the Senate.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I propose to have two chances at it. [Laughter.]

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Very well.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I cannot afford to remain under the charge of the Senator from Kansas and the Senator from Illinois, that I am hostile to the employment of female clerks. I am in favor of it, and it is because I believe this is a measure which will tend to do away with their employment that I made the motion. In relation to the employment of these clerks there is a greater difference in capacity than there is in the males. They ought, according to the suggestion of the Senator from Maine, [Mr. FESSENDEN,] to be graded. Some of them perform duties of four times the value of others. We have many very young girls there, say fourteen or fifteen years of age, and yet it is proposed here that we shall pay the same price for their services that we do for the most accomplished female clerks in the Departments.

I supposed that there was a little common sense in the United States Senate; but whenever the question of female clerks comes up, poetry and transcendentalism and sentiment all take predominance in the judgment of Senators. Even the sedate, calm, and astute chairman of the Judiciary Committee is taken right off his feet at the mention of female clerks. [Laughter.] He says he is not annoyed by the pressure that is brought to bear for fresh appointments. If we shall pass this bill I presume he will say that such pressure does not annoy him; but that he will have it I have no sort of doubt. [Laughter.]

Mr. President, does the Senator from Kansas, in carrying out his principles, pay his seamstress $1,200 a year, or does he employ her at the average rate of wages? Does he pay his female domestics $1,200 a year, and if not, why not? Simply because the supply exceeds the demand, and he can get the services of competent persons for less price. If this measure proposed to increase the number that we might employ there would be some sense in it, but it only proposes to give what we do employ, a very limited number, a gratuity of $300 a year, and applies, say, to a thousand clerks employed in the Treasury Department, making an expenditure of $300,000 simply for the purpose of allowing the Senator from Kansas and the Senator from Illinois to pay a very handsome compliment to these ladies now there employed; and by paying this compliment we make all the ladies that are equal in ability to perform the duties at home discontented; we create an aristocracy here for the benefit of female employes of the Treasury Department. When I see sober and substantial Senators like the Senator from Illinois and the Senator from Kansas going for this measure I expect that it will pass, but I prefer to have the vote of the Senate on the subject.

Mr. CRAGIN. Mr. President, I feel like saying a word on this question. I am utterly opposed to this measure. I am opposed to increasing salaries at this time. It will be my effort, so far as I have the power, to reduce the expenses of this Government—to reduce the expenses connected with this Senate. As I understand it there have been no applications, there has been no effort of any magnitude to bring about this increase of salary. It is only a few years ago that these clerks were paid $600 a year. Their salaries were raised to $900, and now an effort is being made to single out a few of them and to give them $1,200 and more. To my mind this is extremely bad policy. It is bad policy for those who are to be benefited by this legislation, for if it is understood that the salaries of these places are raised to $1,200 those who now occupy the places will be very liable to be crowded out.

We all know that there is a distinction between the compensation paid to females and males in all the departments of life. We know that the female school-teacher receives less compensation than the male school-teacher. I am not saying that this is right; but it is an existing fact and will be an existing fact; and if we attempt here to place this class upon the same footing and to increase these salaries we shall have entered, in my judgment, upon a course of legislation which will lead to a very large increase of the expenditures, and will increase our troubles individually beyond measure. I hope, sir, that the Senate will defeat this proposition and let the matter stand as it does at present.

Mr. CONKLING. Is the motion to strike out the recommendation of the committee?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on striking out the clause as amended.

Mr. CONKLING. I shall vote to strike it out. I shall do it upon two considerations which I will try briefly to state. Ordinarily the theory of value is that any matter, be it service or something else, is worth what it will bring—that it is regulated by the law of supply and demand. Take that and apply it to this case, and the employes of whom we are speaking receive recompense so large that the honorable Senator from Illinois will admit—although he does not know that any person now holds a place upon a recommendation—that great pursuit takes place the country over to obtain these places. Letters come, I should not be mistaken in saying to all of us, day by day of the most urgent character, inquiring whether for this, that, and the other person deemed to be especially meritorious an opportunity cannot be found to become one of these female clerks.

Mr. FERRY. I would like to ask the Senator from New York, with his permission, if more applications come for the places of female clerks than male clerks?

Mr. CONKLING. I am not sure that they do; I have no comparison of that sort in mind. I will admit the fact to be either way for the sake of the argument, my point being this, that it is untrue in the respect I stated that the compensation is inadequate. Be it a female clerk, be it the cashier of a bank, be it an attorney or counsellor at law, that sum is adequate as a business proposition which commands thorough and first-rate service. Has it turned out to be true that only women incompetent seek these places, and that other women fit to discharge their duties are deterred from applying on account of the inadequacy of the compensation which they receive? No, sir; that is not true. Therefore it is not true as a business proposition that more money need be appropriated in order to command these services.

But, secondly, we are told—I have read in petitions I have seen in the newspapers—that more compensation should be given for the reason that although hundreds claim and only tens can receive places, although they are desirable and are sought, nevertheless the compensation was such that a family could not be maintained upon the salary fixed for a clerk. Very well, sir; if that be an element in the calculation, which perhaps it would be difficult to establish by business logic, then I remind Senators that it at once establishes a distinction between male and female clerks. Why? Because as a rule men past a certain age are called upon to maintain families, they become the heads of families. This is true occasionally in the case of a woman maintaining herself by clerical labor, but it is the exception to the rule, and legislation proceeds not for the sake of the exception, but for the sake of the rule to which the exceptions exist.

Therefore, Mr. President, I conclude by saying that while I should be glad if the persons in whose behalf this legislation is proposed were more fortunate still in their estates, I cannot vote that the funds which we administer as trustees here shall be paid in greater sums than are necessary to obtain, and abundantly and certainly obtain, the service required. It seems to me that it is not right; and therefore, whatever may be the sentiment involved in the proposition, I cannot vote for it.

Mr. POMEROY. I do not like to prolong this discussion, but I wish to reply in a single word to the question pending, which is striking out of the bill all that relates to employing at any extra compensation female clerks. I will not reply to the remarks of the honorable Senator from Vermont that related personally to myself, for I do not care anything about them; but I failed entirely to see what argument the Senator could assign for not making this compensation entirely equal when rendered by a male or a female clerk. It is clerical labor that we are talking about.

Ordinarily when we ask that avenues may be opened to females we are told it is out of their sphere; we are told that it is unladylike. When they are struggling for bread day by day we are told it will unsex them if they labor in this Department or in that. But here we have labor that is merely clerical, that is not out of their sphere, that will not unsex them, that can be performed as delicately and as faithfully by females as by males. Here I will say, in a word, that there is not such pressure brought to bear on any Senator to secure employment for females as for males. I have five men asking for influence to secure their employment where there is one female. I serve a notice now upon every able bodied man that he will seek my influence in vain; and if I could turn out all able-bodied men who are doing simply clerical labor I would do it. I would begin in every Department of this Government and turn them out, because every avenue is open to them; the public lands are open upon which they can make settlement, and the earth abideth as a resting place and as a means of support for a man when many avenues are not open and are not accessible to women. There are all sorts of employment adapted and suitable besides clerical that men can engage in; and I consider that it is the duty of legislators when they are providing for the payment of this class of service to open it to those who can perform it, even if it was to the exclusion of a class of persons that have other avenues open to them.

Mr. President, there is no reason why we should restrict this payment to $600 a year when it is not adequate to support. All females have to live; they have mouths to feed; they must wear clothing; there is no house in Washington open to them any cheaper than to males. They have responsibilities, let me tell the Senator from New York; they have upon them responsibilities equal to what are placed upon men. I know females that have to support father and brother both by mere clerical labor and eating the bread of carefulness themselves, spending nothing for themselves, and are obliged to support parents and brothers, and here we propose to strike down those who perform that labor to a pittance of six or eight hundred dollars a year.

Mr. CONKLING. The honorable Senator will allow me, I do not dispute that, and I do not wish to be held to overlook the fact. My proposition, however, may be thus generally stated in a word: that as men bear a larger proportion of the burdens of society than women—I refer to expenses—so you can never obliterate the fact that the larger proportion of compensation for labor falls in the same direction. That is the rule.

Mr. POMEROY. The only difficulty between the Senator and myself is this: I do not believe that the burdens of society fall heavier on men than women. I say that the burdens of society fall heavier on those who have no avenues open to them, against whom employment is closed, and my sympathies are with those who have few opportunities and great responsibilities, and I protest against striking out this provision in the bill. I know that if we continue the discussion of this question we endanger even the passage of the bill. It is for no motive, only to secure in it what the committee themselves desired when they reported the bill.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I appeal to Senators to allow us to have a vote. I was appealed to to lay aside the bill some time ago.

Mr. POMEROY. I shall call for the yeas and nays on the question of striking out.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Vermont, to strike out the clause as amended.

Mr. CORBETT. I ask for the reading of the clause as amended.

The CHIEF CLERK. The words proposed to be stricken out are:

The compensation of the female clerks employed in the several Departments of the Government and performing clerical duties shall be the same as male clerks of the same class; and female counters and copyists shall receive the same compensation as male counters and copyists doing the same class of service; and a sufficient sum to pay such increased compensation to female clerks is hereby appropriated.

Mr. POMEROY. I hope that will not be stricken out.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 15, nays 33; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Conkling, Corbett, Cragin, Dixon, Harlan, Henderson, Howe, McCreery, Morgan, Morrill of Maine, Morrill of Vermont, Sawyer, Sherman, Sprague, and Williams—15.

NAYS—Messrs. Abbott, Anthony, Buckalew, Cole, Conness, Davis, Drake, Ferry, Fowler, Harris, Howard, Kellogg, Morton, Osborn, Patterson of Tennessee, Pomeroy, Pool, Ramsey, Rice, Robertson, Ross, Spencer, Sumner, Tipton, Trumbull, Van Winkle, Vickers, Wade, Warner, Welch, Whyte, Willey, and Wilson—33.

ABSENT—Messrs. Bayard, Cameron, Cattell, Chandler, Doolittle, Edmunds, Fessenden, Frelinghuysen, Grimes, Hendricks, McDonald, Norton, Nye, Patterson of New Hampshire, Saulsbury, Stewart, Thayer, and Yates—18.

So the motion to strike out did not prevail.

The next amendment was in line four hundred and sixty-one after the word "appropriated" to insert the following proviso:

Provided, That the annual salary of the Treasurer of the United States shall be $8,000, and an amount sufficient to pay said increased compensation for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1869, and for the year ending June 30, 1870, is hereby appropriated.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I will state in one word why this is recommended. The salary of the Assistant Treasurer at New York is $8,000, while the salary of the Treasurer who has all the duties of the Assistant Treasurer at New York in one sense, that is in the sense that he supervises all he does and has a good deal of duty besides, is $6,500. The committee did not see why that distinction should be made.

Mr. GRIMES. How much does the Commissioner of Internal Revenue get?

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. $6,000? Certainly there should not be that discrepancy or difference between the Treasurer and the Assistant Treasurer. It seems to me it is obvious enough the one should come down or the other go up, and this officer has been, I believe, a very laborious and acceptable officer.

Mr. RAMSEY. Who is the Assistant Treasurer?

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I do not know.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Mr. Van Dyck.

Mr. TRUMBULL. He is in the city of New York. I suppose on the same principle the Commissioner of Customs here who has a salary of $8,000 a year I think, must be paid as much as the collector of customs in the city of New York, who probably gets $50,000 a year.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I suppose that case would be analogous.

Mr. TRUMBULL. The Treasurer of the United States is a gentleman for whom I have the highest respect and who I know is a very laborious man and who performs a great deal of service; but why his salary should be that of a Cabinet officer, $8,000 a year, while the heads of all the other bureaus receive only three or four thousand dollars I cannot conceive. It seems to me there is no propriety in putting up his salary to $8,000 unless you raise the salaries of the Auditors, the Commissioner of the Land Office, and various other officers here who have great labors to perform, are constantly occupied, and diligent, worthy, honorable, honest, and efficient men. It seems to me there is no propriety in it.

Mr. WILSON. General Spinner was appointed eight years ago into this very responsible office. During these eight years I believe he has worked more hours and done more drudgery than any man employed in the service of the United States, civil or military. The responsibilities of his office are very great, and the labor in it is very much larger than the responsibility or the labor in New York. I think as a tribute to a public servant who has rendered eminent service to the country we ought to put him at least on an equality with the Assistant Treasurer in New York.

Mr. FESSENDEN. The difference between this case and the case spoken of by one Senator who inquired as to the Internal Revenue Commissioner is this: the Treasurer receives and is responsible for the money, and he gives a very heavy bond; the Commissioner of Internal Revenue has no such responsibility on him; and it has always been considered that men should be paid according in some degree to their responsibility. The Assistant Treasurer at New York receives $8,000. It is little enough. It is hardly what men connected with banks there receive, who do not perform anything like his duties.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Does he not have charge of a great deal more money than the Treasurer here?

Mr. FESSENDEN. Not at all. All the money comes to the Treasury here and goes back. The money all passes through the Treasury here.

Mr. TRUMBULL. The money collected in New York is deposited in New York, is it not?

Mr. FESSENDEN. A great deal of it is deposited in New York.

Mr. TRUMBULL. It never comes here except for disbursement.

Mr. FESSENDEN. That is the gold received from customs; but the paper money all passes through the hands of the Treasurer here.

Mr. TRUMBULL. The Senator does not mean to say that the money collected from internal revenue comes into the Treasury here in Washington? I know it is finally accounted for here.

Mr. FESSENDEN. It finally comes back here and goes out here. The Treasurer of the United States handles a great deal more money than the cashiers of the Bank of England and Bank of France combined. The responsibility is altogether upon him if the money is lost. He has to keep a very much larger force than is kept at the sub-Treasury in New York and his responsibilities are consequently very much greater. They are both very great. Now, sir, with regard to that matter, it was always my opinion that the pay of the sub-Treasurer at New York ought to be raised and that the pay of the Treasurer here ought to be raised. But Congress has never decided to raise the pay of the Assistant Treasurer at New York. I know at one time that office was vacant; it was vacant or was about to become vacant when I went into the Treasury Department. I had great difficulty in getting the right kind of men to take the office. Why? Because I could find no such man unless he was a man of very large fortune, who would not take the labor, or else a man who could receive more pay in other positions. I finally persuaded a gentleman to take the office who gave up a larger pay, which he could ill afford to do, feeling it his duty at that time to serve his country in the position in which I put him. When I resigned he resigned and left the office.

Now, with regard to the Treasury here, I do not know a man in the Government who ought to receive a higher pay; I mean in any of what may be called not the very highest positions in the Government. It costs him as much to live as it costs anybody. He has never been able on his salary to keep his family here together. I have constantly endeavored to raise his pay. I got it up finally to $6,500; I wanted to get it up to $8,000 at that time on account of his responsible labor and his great capacity; and you must have in that place a man of great capacity and of tried integrity always. He has been very fortunate; no money has been lost; and it is a wonder that so much money has passed through his hands and no losses have occurred.

I believe that the salaries of several leading officers of the Government ought to be raised, and this is one of them; and I see no propriety in keeping him below the Assistant Treasurer in New York. I do not know that it costs more to live there than it does here. I know it costs very much to live here, so that nobody can live on any pay he gets without extreme economy and difficulty.

Mr. ANTHONY. It is within my knowledge within two years that men have been here from New York with a proposition to the present Treasurer to accept a position there at a salary of $10,000 a year, a very honorable position and a very responsible one, at the head of an insurance office in that city. I have no doubt that there are a great many men who would take this office at a less price. I suppose you could find in any of the Departments messengers who would accept this office without any increase of their present compensation; but such men as General Spinner are very rare to be found and very rare in the public service. I think he is worth a great deal more to the Government above any ordinary first-class man than his salary every month he stays there.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Mr. President, we are fixing a salary, I would remind my friend from Rhode Island, for the Treasurer of the United States and not for any individual; and if the salary is fixed at this sum it will be paid to whoever may occupy that place. No one entertains a higher opinion of the present Treasurer of the United States than I do. I know the great labors he has performed, the great integrity and the care with which he has presided over that branch of the Government to which he has been assigned. He is a valuable man, but the salary that is paid him is out of proportion to the salaries we are paying officers here in the city of Washington. I agree with the Senator from Maine that the salaries are not what they ought to be. I think they ought to be higher, but it seems to me that this salary is already out of proportion to the others.

The salaries paid the heads of Departments—the Secretary of State, the Secretary of the Treasury, &c.—are but $8,000 a year; and the salaries that are paid to the heads of bureaus, who also are men that perform a great deal of labor—very important and very responsible offices are filled by them—and yet none of them are more than $4,000, and some of them not more than $3,000. Now, why should you raise the salary of the Treasurer, saying nothing about the present incumbent, to $8,000, and pay your Auditors, your Commissioner of Customs, your Commissioners of Pensions, your Commissioner of Patents, and your Commissioner of the General Land Office, and these various other officers not half that sum? Is there any propriety in that?

But the Senator from Rhode Island says he knows the fact that the Treasurer of the United States could make more money by going to the city of New York, or has been offered more. Is that the test? How many men could make more money out of the offices they hold than is paid them assalry? Does the Senator from Rhode Island suppose that the Attorney General of the United States could not make more money practicing his profession? Does he not suppose that large corporations in this country would be glad to retain him at a salary double or treble that which he receives as Attorney General for his services? Is that any reason why we should put his salary up to the amount that he could make by his profession if he were practicing it? It is possible that even some members of the Senate might make more money; and the Senator from Rhode Island, I am sure, could make a great deal more pursuing his profession than he can make as a member of this body. That does not seem to me to be a reason. The objection I have to this is that it is out of proportion to the other salaries paid here in Washington. I think the salary of the Treasurer of the United States should not be the same as that paid to the heads of Departments while the salaries of other officers inferior to the heads of Departments, subordinate officers, are kept at the present sums.

Mr. NYE. I should like to ask the honorable Senator from Illinois a question: if there is any office where the pecuniary responsibility is as great as that of the Treasurer of the United States?

Mr. TRUMBULL. I suppose there are many where it is quite as great. I do not see how his responsibility is greater than that of many other officers in the country. It is not by any means true that all the money of the Government passes through the Treasury of the United States. The accounts are returned there.

Mr. NYE. I supposed that was true.

Mr. TRUMBULL. It is by no means true, let me inform the Senator from Nevada. I can tell him, if he is not already advised of it, that of the hundreds of millions of dollars collected from customs in the city of New York never a dollar sees the vault in the Treasury Department here, though it is all accounted for here; and now of the hundreds of millions of gold lying idle in the Treasury of the United States—and it has been lying idle there for the last three or four years, wrongfully I think—he will find very little here in this Treasury building; but if the Senator will go to New York, and go into the sub-Treasury there, he will find the vaults full of gold; he will find very little of it here. And the money that is collected from internal revenue which is collected in Nevada and in Montana, the identical dollars that are collected, are not sent here to the Treasury of the United States, but are deposited with some sub-Treasurer, either in Chicago or in Montana, or in some bank authorized to receive deposits; the account is returned here and a draft is drawn in favor of some creditor of the Government. The money never sees the Treasury of the United States in fact; it is accounted for there. I suppose that ten times as much money passes through the hands and is received into the office of the sub-Treasurer in New York as is received here during the same period of time.

Mr. NYE. The honorable Senator has quite startled me with his statement that there is hardly any responsibility on the Treasurer of the United States.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I did not say that.

Mr. NYE. Well, that it was apparently small; that the responsibility of the sub-Treasurer at New York, for instance, is infinitely greater. I have understood—a person near me who knows will correct me if that is not the fact—that a large portion of the money paid in New York is transferred to the Treasury of the United States at Washington. Whether the coin is sent or not I am not able to say, but the average I believe is about eighty or one hundred million dollars. Certain it is that the Treasurer of the United States is responsible for all this immense amount of banking capital in the Department.

Mr. TRUMBULL. How is he responsible?

Mr. NYE. He is held responsible the moment those bonds are deposited in the Department, and they have amounted to a great many hundreds of millions. I have often wondered how any gentleman in the United States of sufficient capacity to discharge the duties of that office would take it with its countless responsibilities on the salary that the Treasurer receives. It is, I believe, but about two thousand dollars more than some of the chief clerks or heads of bureaus who have no pecuniary responsibility at all receive. It is well known that the present incumbent of the office is a most excellent officer. My friend says he may be changed. I hope the Government will never get a person less qualified for the place. He regards it as so responsible that he sleeps at the very door of the Treasury Department, at the very door of the safe of that Department, every night in his life. I desire to say, for one, that I think the Treasury of this nation will be better managed if we pay a respectable salary, a salary at least equal to that of the cashier of a bank of many of the cities of this nation, than it will be to put the salary at that point that it must of necessity command inferior talent to discharge such responsible duties.

Mr. GRIMES. I am entitled to none of the credit for courage which the Senator from Maine [Mr. FESSENDEN] bestowed upon the Committee on Appropriations for reporting this amendment. I was not aware—it is my own fault to be sure, because I did not happen to be present at the committee meeting yesterday morning—until I read it in the bill that such a proposition was before the Senate emanating from that committee. Had I been present at the meeting of the committee I should have voted against it, as I shall now do in the Senate.

Mr. President, it is not true in the history of this country that the salaries of officers have been graduated according to the pecuniary liabilities they might incur, or according to the amount of the bond they have been required to give. When I became a member of this body the Treasurer of the United States received $3,000 a year. Then hundreds of millions passed through his hands and he did not receive a dollar more than any other bureau officer of the Government; but upon the pretense—I will not say the pretense; but upon the argument—that General Spinner incurred extraordinary responsibilities because of his bond we have been urged from time to time, indeed I might say every session, to increase his salary until at last we have got it up much larger than that of any other bureau officer of the Government. It is now, I believe, $6,000.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Six thousand five hundred dollars.

Mr. GRIMES. Six thousand five hundred dollars, while the next below him is only $5,000.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I think the Commissioner of Internal Revenue gets $6,000.

Mr. GRIMES. Now, what does this pecuniary responsibility amount to? General Spinner himself does not receive a dollar of the public money. All the financial affairs of the country are carried on through his subordinates either in the Treasury Department or at the sub-Treasuries in the United States. If a defalcation occurs through the maladministration or misconduct of any of those subordinates it is traced to that subordinate; and do we hold General Spinner responsible? Not at all. We never have done so; it never has been attempted to do anything of the kind. If such a thing occurred he would come here to Congress and prefer a claim to relief, and say, "the Government has been defrauded through some misconduct of some subordinate officer of the sub-Treasury at New York," or Philadelphia, or elsewhere, wherever it may have occurred, and we would pass a bill relieving him. We do not, therefore, hold General Spinner responsible upon his bond. All this argument in favor of increasing his salary because of the magnitude of the security that is required of him is utterly fallacious.

Now, Mr. President, it costs the sub-Treasurer in New York a great deal more than it costs an officer here to live in this city, and I undertake to say that more real, actual money passes through the sub-Treasurer's hands at New York than there is here at Washington.

Mr. NYE. That is impossible.

Mr. GRIMES. No, it is not impossible. Money is received at the various places of deposit and it is credited to the Government of the United States. If you call that money which consists in drawing a draft in favor of some officeholder or some contractor in Chicago or Detroit or elsewhere, and which is sent off for a liability of the Government, then it is true that General Spinner handles more money than anybody else.

Mr. NYE. Is there not a large banking department there that he has charge of?

Mr. GRIMES. No, sir; he has nothing to do with the banking department except a certain amount of the bonds there.

Mr. NYE. If the honorable Senator will excuse me, he has nothing to do with the banking department save to see that it is properly and carefully managed, and he is held responsible for his subaltern officers.

Mr. GRIMES. The Comptroller of the Currency is in no manner responsible to the Treasurer of the United States. He is not a subordinate of his. The Treasurer keeps in his vaults the original bonds that belong to the banks throughout the United States. That is all there is of it, and all the responsibility he has connected with the banks.

Mr. FESSENDEN. The Senator is mistaken about that. Every dollar of bank paper that is issued comes from this office in the first place and goes through the Treasury Department. Every dollar of paper that is issued by the Government comes from the Treasurer's Department, and large sums are continually being returned there; some because it is worn and to be destroyed, and some to be paid out again, and some to be renewed. It all comes back to the Treasury and is in the hands of the Treasurer, and he is responsible for it while it is in his hands.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I will ask my colleague whether it is not true, in addition to that, that all the revenues of the country are credited to him?

Mr. FESSENDEN. Of course they are credited to the Treasury of the United States. But then, as the Senator from Iowa says, if there is a defalcation in any of the banks which are banks of deposit, out of the city, I do not suppose the Treasurer would be held responsible for that because he transfers it by drafts.

Mr. GRIMES. Or anywhere else.

Mr. FESSENDEN. He would be here. He is responsible in this city for every dollar that is lost or stolen.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. FERRY in the chair.) The question is on the amendment reported by the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. GRIMES called for the yeas and nays; and they were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 19, nays 26; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anthony, Cattell, Cole, Corbett, Drake, Ferry, Fessenden, McDonald, Morrill of Maine, Morton, Norton, Nye, Osborn, Pomeroy, Rice, Sumner, Van Winkle, Welch, and Wilson—19.

NAYS—Messrs. Abbott, Buckalew, Cameron, Chandler, Conkling, Cragin, Davis, Dixon, Fowler, Grimes, Harlan, Harris, Henderson, Howard, McCree, Morgan, Pool, Robertson, Ross, Sherman, Sprague, Stewart, Trumbull, Warner, Whyte, and Williams—26.

ABSENT—Messrs. Bayard, Conness, Doolittle, Edmunds, Frelinghuysen, Hendricks, Howe, Kellogg, Morrill of Vermont, Patterson of New Hampshire, Patterson of Tennessee, Ramsey, Saulsbury, Sawyer, Spencer, Thayer, Tipton, Vickers, Wade, Willey, and Yates—21.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I move that the Senate at half past four o'clock take a recess until half past seven o'clock this evening.

Mr. SPRAGUE. Say seven o'clock.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. It is suggested to take a recess from four and a half o'clock to seven o'clock. I modify my motion in that way.

The motion was agreed to.

The Secretary continued the reading of the bill.

The next amendment was in line five hundred and thirteen to strike out "four" and insert "five," so as to make the salary of the Solicitor in the Internal Revenue Bureau $5,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SHERMAN. With the consent of the Senator from Maine, I will offer an amendment, to add at the end of that line the clause making appropriations for the Internal Revenue Bureau the following words.

And the Commissioner of Internal Revenue shall not be required to give bond.

Under the old law the Commissioner of Internal Revenue received money, but under the law as it now stands he receives not one dollar, and therefore he stands like any other mere executive officer.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was in line five hundred and thirty-six to strike out "$6,000,000" and insert "$3,000,000;" so that the clause will read:

For salaries and expenses of collectors, assessors, assistant assessors, revenue agents, inspectors, and superintendents of exports and drawbacks, together with the expense of carrying into effect the various provisions of the several acts providing internal revenue, excepting items otherwise estimated for, $8,000,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was after line six hundred and thirty-eight, to insert:

To enable the Secretary of the Interior to fulfill a contract made by him under the provisions of a joint resolution authorizing a contract with Vinnie Ream for a statue of the late Abraham Lincoln, $5,000.

Mr. SUMNER. I should like to inquire of the chairman how much has been paid for that statue?

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Not anything.

Mr. SUMNER. There has certainly been one payment. I wish to know whether there has not been even more than that?

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. The committee are not aware that anything has been paid. We have no information that anything has been paid. I will state to the Senator how I understand the facts to be. By a joint resolution of Congress, passed in 1866, the Secretary of the Interior was directed to contract with this lady for a statue of President Lincoln for the sum of $10,000, $5,000 of which was to be paid when the model in clay was perfected, and the balance when the statue was finished in marble. Now, we have a communication from the Secretary of the Interior communicating to us a copy of the contract under that resolution, and also stating in his communication that the first part of the contract has been completed to his satisfaction, and asking for this appropriation, so that the committee found, as a matter of law and contract, that she was entitled to have the first installment of $5,000.

Mr. SUMNER. How much more is to be paid?

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Five thousand dollars when the statue is in marble.

Mr. SUMNER. Making $10,000.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Making $10,000, under the law of Congress and under the contract with her by the Secretary of the Interior. The committee had no doubt that it was an obligation of law and contract.

Mr. SUMNER. I inquire of the chairman if there is no way of obtaining a release from that contract by paying this $5,000 now, so that we need not be obliged to pay an additional $5,000 for a statue which in all probability we shall not be willing to place in the Capitol?

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I have no information on that subject. I will answer the Senator very frankly. The best I think I can do would be to refer the Senator to the artist upon that subject.

Mr. HOWARD. I beg to inquire of the honorable chairman of the committee whether the United States is bound to pay this $5,000 at this time? Is there not some condition in the contract by which the model may be examined before we proceed to its final completion and pay for it?

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. It is to be done to the acceptance of the Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. HOWARD. What is to be done, the model or the statue itself?

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. The model. When the model in clay has been finished to the acceptance of the Secretary of the Interior, then the Secretary of the Interior is entitled to pay her the first installment.

Mr. HOWARD. If the Senator from Maine will allow me I will read the joint resolution under which this lady was employed:

"Resolved, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to contract with Miss Vinnie Ream for a life-size model and statue of the late President Abraham Lincoln, to be executed by her at a price not exceeding $10,000, one half payable on the completion of the model in plaster, and the remaining half on the completion of the statue in marble to his acceptance."

I suppose the discretion of the Secretary extends both to the model and to the completed statue whenever it shall be completed. I should suppose that to be the fair and liberal construction to be given to that joint resolution. I wish to say in this connection that I have briefly and cursorily examined the model which the lady had prepared of the contemplated statue of Mr. Lincoln, and although I profess not to be a judge in such matters, and by no means a connoisseur, I, for one, am very much dissatisfied with the model which she has already prepared. I do not think it brings out the features or the person of President Lincoln. I think the whole thing is at present a failure, just as I predicted when the original proposition was before the Senate. I think the country will be dissatisfied with this statue if it is completed upon the model which has been exhibited here in the Capitol. And unless we are bound absolutely to appropriate this $5,000 at this time in part payment of the statue I think we had better let the matter stand open until the Secretary of the Interior shall have time to examine thoroughly the statue when it shall be completed.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. But the information is that the Secretary of the Interior has examined it, and he makes us a formal communication to that effect, that he has examined the statue, is satisfied with it, and asks that an appropriation be made. He sends the contract to the committee, refers us to the law and the contract, declares his satisfaction with the model upon examination, and requests that this appropriation be made in conformity with the contract.

Mr. HOWARD. I dislike to occupy the time of the Senate on this small matter unnecessarily; but I should like very much to hear the communication of the Secretary of the Interior on this subject read, or so much of it as relates to the point in consideration, if it is convenient to produce it.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. If the Senator desires to have it read I will send for it; and in the mean time this amendment can be passed over.

Mr. HOWARD. Very well.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will receive a message from the House of Representatives.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the bill (H. R. No. 1570) making appropriations for the consular and diplomatic expenses of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1870, and for other purposes.

The message further announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. No. 2007) making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1870, and for other purposes; and a bill (H. R. No. 2021) for the relief of Norman Wiard, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

The message also announced that the House had agreed to the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 596) granting a pension to Mary A. Davis, widow of William P. Davis, a private in the eighteenth regiment of Indiana volunteers in the war of 1861, with an amendment, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

The message further announced that the House insisted upon its amendment to the bill of the Senate (S. No. 900) granting a pension to William B. Looney, of Alabama, agreed to the conference asked by the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. SIDNEY PERHAM of Maine, Mr. H. VAN AERNAM of New York, and Mr. A. G. BURR of Illinois, managers at the same on its part.

The message also announced that the House had disagreed to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 1738) making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian department, and for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes for the year ending June 30, 1870, asked a conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. BENJAMIN F. BUTLER of Massachusetts, Mr. G. W. SCOFIELD of Pennsylvania, and Mr. WILLIAM WINDOM of Minnesota, managers on its part.

The message further announced that the House had also disagreed to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 1746) for the removal of certain disabilities from the persons therein named, asked a conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. J. B. BECK of Kentucky, Mr. J. F. FARNSWORTH of Illinois, and Mr. B. W. NORRIS of Alabama, managers at the same on its part.

The message also announced that the House had agreed to the concurrent resolution of the Senate requesting the President of the United States to transmit to the Executives of the several States copies of the amendment to the Constitution of the United States proposed by Congress to the Legislatures of the several States by resolution of February 26, 1869.

The message also announced that the House had disagreed to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 1967) to compensate the officers and crew of the United States steamer Kearsarge for the destruction of the rebel piratical vessel Alabama, asked a conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. F. A. PIKE of Maine, Mr. G. TWITCHELL of Massachusetts, and Mr. CHARLES HAIGHT of New Jersey, managers at the same on its part.

The message also announced that the House of Representatives had disagreed to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 1881) regulating the reports of national banking associations, asked a conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. S. J. RANDALL of Pennsylvania, Mr. T. M. POMEROY of New York, and Mr. JOHN LYNCH of Maine managers at the same on its part.

The message further announced that the House insisted upon its amendments to the bill (S. No. 440) supplementary to an act entitled "An act to provide a national currency secured by a pledge of United States bonds, and to provide for the circulation and redemption thereof," approved June 3, 1864, agreed to the conference asked by the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. J. COBURN of Indiana, Mr. N. B. JUDD of Illinois, and Mr. SAMUEL HOOPER of Massachusetts, managers at the same on its part.

The message also announced that the House had disagreed to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 375) to repeal an act approved March 2, 1867, entitled "An act to regulate the disposition of fines, penalties, and forfeitures received under the laws relating to the customs, and for other purposes," and to amend certain acts for the prevention and punishment of frauds on the revenue, and for the prevention of smuggling, asked a conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. THOMAS D. ELIOT of Massachusetts, Mr. CHARLES O'NEILL of Pennsylvania, and Mr. J. M. HUMPHREY of New York, managers at the same on its part.

The message further announced that the House had concurred in the amendments of the Senate to the following bills and joint resolutions:

A bill (H. R. No. 112) relating to captures made by Admiral Farragut's fleet in the Mississippi river in May, 1862;

A bill (H. R. No. 425) for the relief of Mary A. Filler;

A bill (H. R. No. 1279) in relation to additional bounties, and for other purposes;

A bill (H. R. No. 1327) to amend an act entitled "An act to exempt certain manufactures from internal tax, and for other purposes," approved May 31, 1868;

A bill (H. R. No. 1867) for the relief of the Illinois Iron and Bolt Company;

A bill (H. R. No. 1879) for the relief of certain companies of scouts and guides organized in Alabama;

A bill (H. No. 1344) to confirm certain private land claims in the Territory of New Mexico;

A bill (H. R. No. 1487) to declare and fix the status of the corps of judge advocates of the Army;

A bill (H. R. No. 1928) granting a pension to Lemuel Barthallow;

A bill (H. R. No. 1930) granting a pension to Madge K. Guthrie and Robert B. Guthrie;

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 438) relative to certain purchases by the Interior Department; and

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 211) for the relief of Henry S. Gibbons, late postmaster at St. Johns, Michigan.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills; and they were thereupon signed by the President pro tempore:

A bill (H. R. No. 1041) granting the right of way to the Walla-Walla and Columbia River Railroad Company, and for other purposes; and

A bill (H. R. No. 1068) for the relief of Henry Barrieklow.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

On motion of Mr. MORRILL, of Maine, the bill (H. R. No. 2007) making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1870, and for other purposes, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

The bill (H. R. No. 2021) for the relief of Norman Wiard was read twice by its title, and ordered to lie on the table.

INDIAN APPROPRIATION BILL.

The Senate proceeded to consider its amendments to the bill (H. R. No. 1738) making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian department, and for fulfilling treaty stipulations, disagreed to by the House; and

On motion of Mr. MORRILL, of Maine, it was

Resolved, That the Senate insist upon its amendments to the said bill, disagreed to by the House of Representatives, and agree to the conference asked by the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

Ordered, That the conferees on the part of the Senate be appointed by the President pro tempore of the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore appointed Mr. HARLAN, Mr. THAYER, and Mr. CORBETT.

REMOVAL OF DISABILITIES.

The Senate proceeded to consider its amendment to the bill (H. R. No. 1746) for the removal of certain disabilities from the persons therein named, disagreed to by the House; and

On motion of Mr. STEWART, it was

Resolved, That the Senate insist upon its amendment to the said bill, disagreed to by the House of Representatives, and agree to the conference asked by the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

Ordered, That the conferees on the part of the Senate be appointed by the President pro tempore of the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore appointed Mr. STEWART, Mr. TRUMBULL, and Mr. HENDRICKS.

REPORTS OF NATIONAL BANKS.

The Senate proceeded to consider its amendments to the bill (H. R. No. 1881) regulating the reports of national banking associations, disagreed to by the House; and

On motion of Mr. SHERMAN, it was

Resolved, That the Senate insist upon its amendments to the said bill, disagreed to by the House of Representatives, and agree to the conference asked by the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

Ordered, That the conferees on the part of the Senate be appointed by the President pro tempore of the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore appointed Mr. CATTELL, Mr. WILLIAMS, and Mr. CONNESS.

STEAMER KEARSARGE.

The Senate proceeded to consider its amendments, disagreed to by the House of Representatives, to the bill (H. R. No. 1967) to compensate the officers and crew of the United States steamer Kearsarge for the destruction of the rebel piratical vessel Alabama; and

On motion of Mr. GRIMES, it was

Resolved, That the Senate insist upon its amendments to the said bill, disagreed to by the House of Representatives, and agree to the conference asked by the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

Ordered, That the conferees on the part of the Senate be appointed by the President pro tempore of the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore appointed Mr. GRIMES, Mr. COYKLING, and Mr. DRAKE.

CONSULAR AND DIPLOMATIC BILL.

Mr. SUMNER. With the consent of the Senator from Maine, I desire to make a report from the conference committee on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill known as the consular and diplomatic bill. I ask that the report be read and acted upon at once.

The Secretary read the report, as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments to the bill (H. R. No. 1570) making appropriations for the consular and diplomatic expenses of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1870, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference, have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from their amendments numbered 27, 30 and 31.

That the House of Representatives recede from their disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 1, 6, 7, 13, 14, 22, 32, and 33, and agree to the same.

That the House recede from their disagreement to the second amendment of the Senate, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: at the end of said amendment add the following words: "and to continue while acting as minister to Uruguay."

That the House of Representatives recede from their disagreement to the twenty-eighth amendment of the Senate, and agree to the same with the following amendment: strike out all of said amendment, being the fourth section of the bill, and insert in lieu the following:

Sec. 4. And be it further enacted, That the President is authorized, on the recommendation of the Secretary of the Treasury, to cause examinations to be made into the accounts of the consular officers of the United States, and into all matters connected with the business of their said officers, and to that end he may appoint such agent or agents as may be necessary for that purpose; and any agent when so appointed shall, for the purpose of making said examinations, have authority to administer oaths and take testimony, and shall have access to all the books and papers of all consular officers. And any agent appointed in this behalf shall be paid for his services a just and reasonable compensation, not exceeding five dollars per day for the time necessarily employed, in addition to his actual necessary expenses, the same to be paid out of the sum appropriated for expenses of collecting the revenue; but no greater sum than $5,000 shall be expended as compensation of such agent or agents in any one year. And the President shall communicate to Congress, at the commencement of every December session, the names of the agents so appointed and the amount paid to each, together with the reports of such agents.

And the Senate agree to the same.

CHARLES SUMNER,
F. T. FRELINGHUYSEN,
W. PINKNEY WHYTE,
Managers on the part of the Senate.
GODLOVE S. ORTELL,
SAMUEL B. AXTELL,
Managers on the part of the House.

The report was concurred in.

PROPOSED AMENDMENTS.

Mr. POMEROY submitted two amendments intended to be proposed to the bill (H. R. No. 1911) making appropriations to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the service of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1869, and for other purposes; which were referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. SPRAGUE, Mr. FESSENDEN, Mr. RAMSEY, and Mr. ROBERTSON submitted amendments intended to be proposed to the bill (H. R. No. 2007) making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1870, and for other purposes; which were referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. RAMSEY submitted an amendment intended to be proposed to the bill (H. R. No. 1808) making appropriations for the service of the Post Office Department during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1870; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

LEGISLATIVE, ETC., APPROPRIATION BILL.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 1672) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1870, the pending question being on the amendment of the Committee on Appropriations, to insert after line six hundred and thirty-eight, the following clause:

To enable the Secretary of the Interior to fulfill a contract made by him under the provisions of a joint resolution authorizing a contract with Vinnie Ream for a statue of the late Abraham Lincoln, $5,000.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I send to the Chair a communication from the Secretary of the Interior on that subject, which I desire to have read, and I trust the Senator from Michigan [Mr. HOWARD] will give his attention to it.

The Secretary read as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
WASHINGTON, D. C., January 30, 1867.

SIR: I have the honor to inclose herewith a copy of a letter bearing date the 27th instant, which I have received from Miss Vinnie Ream, informing me of the completion of the model in plaster of the late President Lincoln, which she had contracted to execute, and requesting payment of the sum of $5,000 due to her on such completion.

The "joint resolution authorizing a contract with Vinnie Ream for a statue of Abraham Lincoln," approved July 28, 1866, (U. S. Statutes, vol. 14, p. 370,) authorized and directed the Secretary of the Interior to contract with that lady for a life-size model and statue of the late President; and pursuant to its terms a contract was on the 30th day of August, 1866, executed, whereby the Secretary, on behalf of the United States, promised to pay Miss Ream the sum of $5,000 on her completion of such life-size model in plaster, and the further sum of $5,000 on her completion to his acceptance of the statue in marble and the delivery thereof to the officer to be designated to receive it. A copy of the contract is herewith transmitted. I have inspected the completed model. It bears a faithful resemblance to the original and is highly creditable to the skill of the artist.

I recommend that Congress make an appropriation of $5,000 to enable the Secretary of the Interior to pay the installment now due to Miss Ream under her contract.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,
O. H. BROWNING,
Secretary.

Hon. B. F. WADE,
President pro tempore of the Senate.

Mr. HOWARD. I will not criticise the construction which the Secretary of the Interior seems to give to the joint resolution of July 28, 1866. He seems to think, however, that on the completion of the model, however imperfect it may happen to be, he is bound to pay the $5,000, whether the model is acceptable to him or not. I certainly do not concur in that construction of the joint resolution. I think the joint resolution requires, even before the payment of the first $5,000, that he should be satisfied with the model itself.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Will my honorable friend allow me to suggest to him that the Secretary says in so many words that it is acceptable to him? He compliments it.

Mr. HOWARD. I was speaking of his statement of the contract, not of his opinion respecting the acceptability of the model. I should like the Secretary to read that portion of the contract itself which relates to the model and the acceptance of it by the Secretary of the Interior, if it is at hand.

The Secretary read from the contract as follows:

"That the said Vinnie Ream, for and in consideration of the sum of $10,000, to be paid to her as hereinafter mentioned, hereby binds herself to execute and deliver to the Commissioner of Public Buildings or other public officer to be designated by the Secretary of the Interior, and in snid city, a life-size model and a statue of the late President Lincoln; said statue to be in marble and to the acceptance of said Secretary; and the said Harlan, Secretary as aforesaid, in the name and on behalf of said United States, hereby promises to pay to said Vinnie Ream the sum of $5,000 on the completion as aforesaid of such model in plaster, and the further sum of $5,000 on the completion, to the acceptance of the then Secretary of Interior, of such life-size statue in marble, and the delivery of the same as hereinbefore mentioned."

Mr. HOWARD. I have nothing further to say about this matter, except that it appears from the contract itself and from the letter of the Secretary that we are absolutely bound at present to pay the $5,000 whatever may be the quality of this model. I wish that it was otherwise; but as I cannot help it I do not see but that I shall be compelled to vote for the appropriation, inasmuch as it is paying a debt for which we have entered into a contract. I beg to repeat, however, that in my opinion—and I place very little value upon it myself, I can assure Senators—we and the country will be dissatisfied with this statue if it is completed according to the present model, which I have inspected myself.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I will say but a word on this subject. It seems that this contract, was entered into in pursuance of law. The Senator from Michigan is a little mistaken, I think, in his idea about it. The Secretary of the Interior was directed to make a contract, and the model has been completed to his satisfaction. He says so. The Senator from Michigan thinks the model is such a one as the country will not be satisfied with. I have not much of an eye for statuary, and my opinion would be worth very little on a subject of that kind. I can only say that in my judgment the model resembles Mr. Lincoln very much; and I can say further that some of my Illinois friends who have examined the model and who were intimately acquainted with Mr. Lincoln, those who profess to have knowledge of such matters, express themselves as very much pleased with it and regard it as a very great success. That certainly is the concurring opinion of nearly all persons who knew Mr. Lincoln most intimately. It is regarded by them as a remarkable resemblance.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I see the honorable Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. SUMNER] rises. I wish to appeal to him to allow us to have a vote on this proposition. I suppose nothing but a Massachusetts claim could prompt me to provoke discussion.

Mr. SUMNER. Senators about me say we must pay for this statue. I suppose we must; but I wish to suggest again to my friend, the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, the expediency of inquiring whether we cannot in some way get a release from that second $5,000, because it is all to no purpose; the statue never will be placed in this Capitol.

Mr. NYE. Will the honorable Senator allow me to ask whether he has ever seen it?

Mr. SUMNER. I have not, but I have heard of it.

Mr. NYE. Why did you not go and see it? It is right here in the Capitol. I insist that when the thing is here on exhibition the honorable Senator has no right to criticise it unless he has seen it.

Mr. SUMNER. I criticise it on what I have heard and read about it. From the beginning, in advance, I criticised it.

Mr. NYE. That is true.

Mr. SUMNER. The Senator says that is true. I know it is true, and I am sure the Senate will regret the appropriation. The French have a saying that it is bad to throw money out of a window. That vote by Congress was like throwing money out of a window. I wish we could get it back.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Secretary continued the reading of the bill down to the clause making appropriations for the surveyor general of Nevada and his office.

Mr. NYE. I call the attention of the chairman to the appropriation for the salary of the surveyor general of Nevada. I think the law fixes his salary at $3,000, and it is placed in the bill at $2,500. I do not understand why it is cut down.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I think that should be $3,000. I believe that is the law.

I move, in lines six hundred and eighty-nine and six hundred and ninety, to strike out "$2,500" and to insert "$3,000;" so as to make the appropriation for his salary $3,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Secretary resumed the reading of the bill.

The next amendment reported by the Committee on Appropriations was after line seven hundred and five to insert:

For surveyor general of Florida, $2,000, and for clerks in his office, $3,500; $5,500.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Secretary continued the reading of the bill down to the appropriations for the United States Patent Office.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. In line seven hundred and twenty-two I move to strike out the words "one disbursing clerk, $2,000."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. The last amendment renders it necessary to reduce the amount of the appropriation for the Patent Office by $2,000. In line seven hundred and twenty-six I move to strike out the word "two;" so that the appropriation will be $140,900.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was after line seven hundred and sixty-three to insert the following proviso:

Provided, That with the exception of the Commissioner of Patents and the examiners-in-chief, all the officers, clerks, and employés of the Patent Office shall be subject to the appointing and removing power of the Secretary of the Interior in like manner and to the same extent as clerks of the Pension Office are so subject under existing laws.

Mr. WILLEY. That amendment proposes a somewhat radical change in the administration of that Department, and I should be glad to have the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations inform us upon what it is based.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. It comes from the Department itself. The Senator will see that the only change effected by the amendment is to put the appointment of the subordinate officers, in other words the clerks, under the power of the Secretary the same as they are in the other bureaus. That is the whole extent of it.

Mr. WILLEY. Do I understand the Senator to say that this proposition comes from the Patent Office?

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. No; not from the Patent Office, but from the Interior Department. It was suggested that it was an entirely anomalous condition of things in that Department of the Government, and it does seem to be. Why this office should be entirely distinct in this respect I do not know.

Mr. WILLEY. No doubt the different arrangement that has been made is due to the fact that the employés of this Department were required to be of a particular kind of mechanical skill and scientific skill having reference to particular duties to be performed by them, and it was supposed that the Commissioner of Patents, who himself is selected for his general knowledge of such subjects, would be better qualified to make judicious selections than would be the Secretary of the Interior himself. I suppose that is the reason why a different arrangement has heretofore prevailed in the power of appointing the employés of the Patent Office. It is a matter to which my attention has not been specially directed; but this seems to be the introduction of a new policy and a new arrangement in that Department. The Department seems to have worked well hitherto, and unless there be special reasons suggesting this change I submit that we had better let well enough alone.

Mr. FERRY. I think that this amendment of the committee, if it is practicable at all, if the Secretary undertakes to appoint all the officers, clerks, and employés of the Patent Office, will be productive of very great mischief. It is true, as is said by the Senator from West Virginia, that the appointing power in this office has been vested in the Commissioner of Patents because of the peculiar quality of skill and scientific knowledge required in the appointees; and a very serious responsibility—

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. If the honorable Senator will yield to me I will say that as this amendment is likely to give rise to debate and is deemed by the Committee on Patents objectionable I will ask the Senate to non-concur in it rather than have time spent upon it.

Mr. HARLAN. I hope not. I think the amendment is right.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Very well; I yield to the Senator's opinion in that respect.

Mr. FERRY. Then I will proceed. I was saying that a great responsibility rests upon the Commissioner of Patents in exercising his function of selecting these subordinates, and the duties of that office can only be discharged by having the responsibility placed, in my judgment, upon the Commissioner. If the assistant examiners are to be thrust upon him by the Secretary of the Interior, who has his attention distracted among all the various bureaus of his Department, and upon whom especially will be urged political appointments to these subordinate places in the Department, I think the result will be exceedingly injurious to the public service. Where the Secretary of the Interior places in the Pension Bureau or in the Land Office a clerk whose sole duty it is to perform certain merely clerical functions, if that clerk is incapable no great mischief is done; but if he is to place in the Patent Office persons who should possess scientific knowledge and mechanical skill and legal knowledge, knowledge of the laws of patents, and to make those appointments on the ground of political qualifications mainly, as we all know appointments are made in the great portion of the bureaus, then I think the public service will suffer. I do not believe there is any evil existing in the present administration of appointments in the Patent Office calling for any such change as this. I can see how the change may be productive of mischief; and I therefore hope the amendment will not be concurred in by the Senate.

Mr. HARLAN. I have but a word or two to submit on that amendment. Now, there is a kind of divided jurisdiction. I suppose every Senator will admit, when he comes to reflect upon it, that the Constitution fixes it. It provides that the President shall appoint, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, but that Congress may provide that the heads of Departments and the courts may appoint subordinate officers without the concurrence of the Senate. I suppose it would be an unconstitutional provision to confer on the head of a bureau merely the power to make these appointments. The scandal which has been engendered in connection with the business of the Patent Office, in my opinion, has all grown out of this divided jurisdiction. The law as it now stands, I believe, provides that the Commissioner of Patents may appoint these persons, with the approval of the Secretary. The result is, that the Secretary takes no responsibility whatever, but merely confirms the appointments that are sent to him by the Commissioner. I am sure that if any member of this body had a month's experience in either of those offices—that of Secretary of the Interior or of Commissioner of Patents—he would not object for one moment to this amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment reported by the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I now move to insert at the end of the amendment just adopted the following words:

And the disbursements for the Patent Office shall be made by the disbursing clerk for the Interior Department.

As we have just abolished the office of disbursing clerk of the Patent Office, this provision is to require all the disbursements to be made by the general disbursing officer.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in line seven hundred and seventy-six, in the clause for defraying the expenses of suits in which the United States are concerned, to strike out the following words:

Including legal assistance to the Attorney General, and other special and extraordinary expenditures in cases of the Supreme Court of the United States in which the United States are concerned.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to insert after line seven hundred and eighty-two the following proviso:

Provided, That the second section of the act of August 2, 1861, entitled "An act concerning the Attorney General and the attorneys and marshals of the several districts," be, and the same is hereby, repealed.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in line eight hundred and twenty-eight, in the appropriations for the War Department, before the word "clerks" to strike out "four" and insert "five;" and in line eight hundred and twenty-nine to strike out "$25,080" and insert "$26,480;" so that the clause will read:

Office of chief engineer:

For four clerks of class four, four clerks of class three, five clerks of class two, three clerks of class one, two messengers, and one laborer, $26,480.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Secretary continued the reading of the bill down to the appropriations for the Navy Department.

Mr. GRIMES. I move, in line nine hundred and one, on page 37, to strike out the words "Assistant Secretary of the Navy, $3,500;" and after the words "chief clerk" to insert "of the Navy Department;" so that the clause will read:

For compensation of the chief clerk of the Navy Department, $2,200.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GRIMES. I now move in line nine hundred and four to strike out "four" and insert "two," and in the same line to strike out "five" and insert "three;" so that it will read:

Two clerks of the fourth class, three clerks of the third class.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SHERMAN. I do not understand that the cutting down of the appropriation alone will prevent the clerks from being employed, as they will bring it in as a deficiency hereafter. The number of clerks is fixed by law.

Mr. GRIMES. I have got a provision which I propose to offer which will cover that.

The Secretary continued the reading of the bill.

Mr. GRIMES. In line nine hundred and twenty-eight I move to strike out "two" and insert "one;" and in the same line to strike out "three" and insert "two;" so as to allow one clerk of the third class and two clerks of the first class in the Bureau of Equipment and Recruiting.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GRIMES. In line nine hundred and fifty-three, in the appropriations for the Bureau of Provisions and Clothing, I move to strike out "three" and insert "two;" and also to strike out the word "class" and insert "two;" so that it will read "two clerks of the third class, two clerks of the second class."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GRIMES. I now move to add after the word "dollars," in line nine hundred and sixty-three, the following:

And the office of Assistant Secretary of the Navy is hereby abolished, and no clerks or other employees shall be appointed or employed in the Navy Department except such as are provided for in this act.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I ask the Senator to explain that amendment.

Mr. GRIMES. I am asked by the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations to explain the amendment. My purpose has been in offering the amendments that have been adopted, and in offering the one which is now under consideration, to restore the Navy Department to something toward the condition it was in at the beginning of the war. The Senate has already adopted some amendments in regard to the clerks, which reduce the number that are now authorized but do not reduce them to the number allowed in 1861. I do not know that it is necessary to explain the amendments that have already been adopted. They had at that time thirty-six clerks. After the war had progressed about a year and a half we concluded that it was necessary to have an Assistant Secretary of the Navy. The purpose, I will say, was to secure the services of one who was an expert in the naval profession, a gentleman who was familiar with the personnel of the Navy and with its detail, and with the construction of ships, engines, &c.; and during the time that the war lasted he remained in that position. Now, I am unable to see any necessity or propriety in having another civilian appointed to hold the office and receive a salary of $3,500. The proper way in which to conduct the Navy Department, if we are going to have a civilian at the head of it, is for the Secretary to detail a naval officer to act for the time being as Assistant Secretary of the Navy. Therefore I propose to strike out the Assistant Secretary, who knows nothing about his business, is a civilian, and allow it to stand as it stood up to 1862.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. It becomes necessary on account of the amendments that have been adopted on the motion of the Senator from Iowa to make other amendments. In line nine hundred and eight I move to strike out "thirty" and insert "twenty," and in line nine hundred and nine to strike out "four" and insert "three;" so as to make the appropriation $20,340 instead of $33,440.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. On page 38, line nine hundred and thirty, I move to strike out "eleven" and to insert "eight," and also to strike out the word "two" and insert "four;" so as to make the appropriation $8,400 instead of $11,240.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. On page 39, line nine hundred and fifty-six, I move to strike out "twenty-one" and insert "fourteen;" and also to strike out "eight" and insert "six;" so as to make the appropriation $14,640. These amendments are to make the sums conform to the amendments already adopted.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FESSENDEN. With the permission of my colleague, I should like to offer an amendment to a previous part of the bill, as I shall not be here during the first part of the evening session.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. If the Senate do not now object, I have no objection.

Mr. FESSENDEN. The amendment is on page 9, after line two hundred and eight, to insert:

For paving the main walk through the grounds of the Botanic Garden with some uniform and durable material, $11,000, under the direction of the architect of the Capitol extension.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was in line ten hundred and fourteen, under the head of "Post Office Department," after the words "female clerks," to strike out the words "at $1,200 each;" so as to read: "fifty female clerks, $60,000."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in line ten hundred and twenty-seven, at the end of the appropriations for the Post Office Department, to strike out the following clause:

For temporary clerks, $20,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was under the head of "Department of Agriculture," in line ten hundred and thirty-eight, to insert "translator, $1,600."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in line ten hundred and forty-two, to strike out "two" and insert

"three," and to strike out "$3,600" and insert "$5,400;" so as to read: "three clerks of class four, $5,400."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in line ten hundred and fifty-nine, to strike out "$66,720," as the total amount of the appropriations for the Department of Agriculture, and to insert "$70,120."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FERRY. I offer an amendment to come in at the end of line ten hundred and sixty-three.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. If it is just as agreeable to the Senator I should like to get through with the amendments of the committee first.

Mr. FERRY. I have no objection; but we have been pursuing the other course, and we have just reached this point.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was in the contingencies for the Agricultural Department, to insert after line ten hundred and seventy-one:

For cases for museum, repairs of furniture, fences, and water, $2,500.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to insert after line ten hundred and seventy-five:

For improvement of the grounds, $15,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was under the head of "Branch Mint at Denver," to insert:

For Superintendent, $2,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to insert after line eleven hundred and thirty-one the following proviso:

Provided, That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized, whenever in his judgment and in the judgment of the Director of the Mint it is for the interest of the United States to do so, to receive on deposit at the Mint of the United States, and the several branches thereof, refined gold and silver bullion suitable for coinage, and in payment thereof to deliver to the parties making such deposits unparted bars at such rates and upon such terms and regulations as shall be prescribed by the Director of the Mint, subject to the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I ask that that amendment may be passed over until the chairman of the Committee on Finance shall be in his place. This subject was considered and acted upon in the Committee on Finance, and reported adversely.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will come up again in the Senate.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I have no objection to its being passed over for the moment.

Mr. STEWART. I am very much in favor of this amendment, and desire to explain it. I think the Senator from Vermont, when he hears the explanation, will agree to it.

Mr. COLE. Let it be passed over until the bill comes into the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be passed over.

The next amendment was under the head of "independent Treasury," in line eleven hundred and fifty-nine, to strike out "$15,000" and insert "$25,200;" so as to make the clause read:

For salaries of the clerks and messengers in the office of Assistant Treasurer at Boston, $25,200.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in line eleven hundred and sixty-two, to strike out "$75,000" and to insert "$135,734;" so that the clause will read:

For salaries of clerks, messengers, and watchmen in the office of the Assistant Treasurer at New York, $135,734.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in line eleven hundred and sixty-six, to strike out "fifteen" and insert "twenty-four;" so as to read:

For salaries of clerks, messengers, and watchmen in the office of the Assistant Treasurer at Philadelphia, $24,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in line eleven hundred and sixty-nine, to strike out "$6,000" and insert "$10,550;" so that the clause will read:

For salaries of clerks, messengers, and watchmen in the office of the Assistant Treasurer at St. Louis, $10,550.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in line eleven hundred and seventy-two, to strike out "$6,000" and insert "$9,600;" so that the clause will read:

For salaries of clerks, porter, and watchmen, in the office of the Assistant Treasurer at New Orleans, $9,600.

Mr. KELLOGG. I desire to move an amendment by way of substitute for that amendment of the committee. I propose to make it an appropriation of $10,600.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I ask the Senator not to press that motion now, but to offer it after the committee's amendments shall have been disposed of.

Mr. KELLOGG. Very well.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in line eleven hundred and seventy-five, to strike out "$5,000" and insert "$6,900;" so as to make the clause read:

For compensation to stamp clerk, cashier, and clerk in the office of the Assistant Treasurer at San Francisco, $6,900.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to strike out lines eleven hundred and eighty and eleven hundred and eighty-one, as follows:

For salary of the clerk to the acting Assistant Treasurer at Denver, $1,800.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in line eleven hundred and ninety, to strike out "$3,000" and insert "$7,000;" so as to read:

For salaries of clerks and messengers in the office of the depository at Baltimore, $7,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in line eleven hundred and ninety-two, to strike out "$8,000" and insert "$14,850;" so as to make the clause read:

For salaries of clerks in the office of the depository at Cincinnati, $14,850.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was after line eleven hundred and ninety-seven, to insert:

For salaries of additional clerk and additional compensation of officers and clerk under act of August 6, 1846, for the better organization of the Treasury, at such rates as the Secretary of the Treasury may deem just and reasonable, $60,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WHYTE. I desire to offer an amendment by way of an additional section.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. The amendments of the Committee on Appropriations are all acted upon, except the amendment on the forty-sixth page, which was laid over on account of the absence of the chairman of the Committee on Finance. I will not call that up now. I will now hear the amendment of the Senator from Maryland.

The Secretary read the amendment, which was to add as an additional section the following:

And be it further enacted, That the clerks, messengers, watchmen, and laborers, or other persons, male or female, now employed at Washington, District of Columbia, at a salary fixed by law, or by regulations of a Department, in the State, War, Navy, Interior, Agricultural, and Post Office Departments, including the Attorney General's office and city post office, and the bureaus or branches of the several Departments herein named, who are paid at a rate not exceeding $1,800 per annum, shall be allowed an additional compensation of ten per cent, on the amount of salary or pay received or that shall be received by them respectively, during the past and present fiscal year; and that the necessary amount to pay the same is hereby appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

Mr. FERRY. Upon that amendment I shall have to ask for a division by yeas and nays; and I hope the question will not be taken until after the recess.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Let me suggest to whoever offers that amendment—I did not observe who offered it—that we let this bill get into the Senate, and when the Senate is full it can be offered there.

Mr. WHYTE. I offered the amendment just at this moment, knowing that we should take a recess in two or three minutes.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Why not offer it in the Senate? Let us get the bill reported to the Senate. We shall not do any business if we keep these bills in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. WHYTE. I have no objection to withdrawing it temporarily.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Let the bill be reported to the Senate, and then it can be offered.

Mr. FERRY. I wish to offer an amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The time for taking a recess is so near that we can do no further business.

Mr. TRUMBULL. With a view of getting this bill reported to the Senate, I move to extend the time for taking a recess ten minutes.

Mr. RAMSEY. Five minutes are enough.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I suppose there will be no objection to that.

Mr. WILLEY. There are a great many amendments yet to be offered to the bill.

Mr. NYE. I hope the Senator from Illinois will not press his motion, as I understand that when the bill gets into the Senate no individual outside of a committee can offer an amendment.

Mr. TRUMBULL. You can amend in the Senate just the same as in committee.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be as open to amendment when it gets into the Senate as it is now.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I move to extend the time for taking a recess ten minutes.

Mr. BUCKALEW. I object.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection is made. The hour of half past four o'clock having arrived, the Senate will, according to its order, take a recess until seven o'clock.

EVENING SESSION.

The Senate reassembled at seven o'clock p. m.

KANSAS PACIFIC RAILWAY.

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. President, there is a joint resolution from the House of Representatives, No. 468, to change the name of the Union Pacific Railway Company, eastern division, to the Kansas Pacific Railway Company. I move that the committee, to whom it was referred, be discharged from its further consideration, and that the Senate proceed to its consideration. I see no objection to it at all.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be taken up if there be no objection.

By unanimous consent, the Committee on the Pacific Railroad was discharged from the further consideration of the joint resolution (H. R. No. 468) authorizing the Union Pacific Railway Company, eastern division, to change its name to the Kansas Pacific Railway Company; and the Senate as in Committee of the Whole proceeded to consider it.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

REMOVAL OF DISABILITIES.

Mr. STEWART. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill No. 1880 to remove disabilities, which has been read. I simply want a vote. I will say to the Senate that there are some disputed names, and it is better to let a vote be taken and let the bill go to a conference committee as the other bill has gone. It is almost impossible to examine these names in the separate Houses. The House committee have papers that we have not. The other bill is before a conference committee. Let the vote be taken on this, and I will advise the House to have a conference on this as on the other bill.

Mr. DRAKE. I object to taking up the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Then the bill cannot be considered, another matter being now pending.

POST ROUTE BILL.

Mr. RAMSEY. Then I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill No. 2006, being the post route bill. There is no new legislation in it, and probably the Senate will pass it without reading by unanimous consent.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. No. 2006) to establish certain post routes.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I ask the chairman of the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads whether this bill contains anything more than simply the ordinary routes?

Mr. RAMSEY. Nothing else in the world. There is no new legislation in it.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. Then I move that the reading of it be dispensed with.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The reading may be dispensed with if there be no objection. No objection is made, and the reading is dispensed with.

Mr. RAMSEY. There are amendments reported by the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendments reported by the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended; and the amendments were concurred in. The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time. The bill was read the third time, and passed.

SPRINGFIELD LINCOLN MONUMENT.

Mr. WILSON. I move to take up the bill of the House to authorize the Secretary of War to place at the disposal of the National Lincoln Monument Association of Springfield, Illinois, damaged and captured cannon. It is House bill No. 2009.

There being no objection the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. No. 2009) to authorize the Secretary of War to place at the disposal of the National Lincoln Monument Association, at Springfield, Illinois, damaged and captured ordnance. It is a direction to the Secretary of War to place at the disposal of the National Lincoln Monument Association, at Springfield, Illinois, such damaged and captured and other bronze and brass guns and ordnance as may be required, out of which to cast the principal figures to be incorporated into the structure, the material to be delivered to the association at Springfield, Illinois.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I shall not object to this bill; but I give notice now that I will object to any more of these bills. We have passed them for everybody that has asked for them, and are stripping the Government of all the raw material it possesses if it should ever have occasion for the manufacture of any more cannon.

Mr. GRIMES. I move to strike out in the sixth line the words "and other." It now reads "such damaged and captured and other bronze and brass guns," which would include not only damaged and captured guns but all other guns.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Read the rest of it.

Mr. GRIMES. "Such damaged and captured and other bronze and brass guns and ordnance as may be required."

Mr. WILSON. That means damaged guns.

Mr. GRIMES. No; it says "such damaged and captured and other bronze and brass guns." It includes every gun belonging to the Army. I move to strike out the words "and other."

Mr. TRUMBULL. That amendment may defeat the bill. The design here is not to take anything that is serviceable to the Government.

Mr. GRIMES. I suppose it is not the design, but we should have our legislation accurate.

Mr. TRUMBULL. It cannot receive that construction, I apprehend.

Mr. GRIMES. It cannot receive any other, grammatically or legally.

Mr. TRUMBULL. "Such damaged and captured" is the language.

Mr. GRIMES. "And other."

Mr. TRUMBULL. "And other guns."

Mr. GRIMES. What does "other guns" mean?

Mr. TRUMBULL. There may be captured guns and there may be damaged cannon; there may be worthless guns.

Mr. GRIMES. There may be good ones. It would give them command of our armories and arsenals.

Mr. TRUMBULL. It would never have that construction in the world.

Mr. GRIMES. I have no doubt the Senator means—

Mr. TRUMBULL. I have had nothing to do with getting up the resolution. The only difficulty about the amendment is that it will cause the bill to go back to the House of Representatives.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Iowa.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed, and the bill to be read a third time. The bill was read the third time, and passed.

TELEGRAPH TO FOREIGN COUNTRIES.

Mr. SUMNER. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the Senate bill No. 863, relating to telegraphic communication. That contains a provision which it is very important should be acted upon at this session.

There being no objection, the bill (S. No. 863) relating to telegraphic communication between the United States and foreign countries was read the second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole. It provides that whenever communication shall hereafter be established between the United States and any foreign country by means of telegraphic or magnetic lines or cables laid in any part thereof, in and over the waters, reefs, islands, shores, and lands within the jurisdiction of the United States, the same shall be subject to the following conditions, stipulations, and reservations:

First. The Government of the United States shall be entitled to exercise and enjoy the same or similar privileges with regard to the control and use of such line or cable and the lines or cables connected therewith that may by law, agreement, or otherwise be exercised and enjoyed by any foreign Government whatever.

Second. The United States Government shall at all times be entitled to the use of any such line or cable, and the lines or cables connected therewith, by a telegraphic operator of its own selection, to transmit any messages to and from its military, naval, diplomatic, and consular agents; and such messages shall be entitled to take precedence of all other messages.

Third. The rates to be paid for the transmission of any such message or messages, when not otherwise fixed by agreement, shall be established by the Postmaster General of the United States.

Fourth. The lines of any such lines or cables shall be kept open to the public for the transmission for daily publication of market and commercial reports and intelligence, and all messages, dispatches, and communications shall be forwarded in the order in which they are received, except as hereinbefore provided.

Fifth. It shall be at all times within the power of Congress to determine the rates to be charged for the transmission of messages and communications over any such line or cable and to fix and establish such rules and regulations in relation thereto as it may judge necessary.

Sixth. Before extending and establishing any such line or cable in or over any waters, reefs, islands, shores, and lands within the jurisdiction of the United States a written acceptance of the terms and conditions imposed by the act shall be filed in the office of the Secretary of State by the company, corporation, or party proposing to establish telegraphic communication. Subject to the foregoing conditions, stipulations, and reservations the consent of Congress is given to the laying and maintaining of telegraphic or magnetic lines or cables between the United States and foreign countries, in and over the waters, reefs, islands, shores, and lands within the jurisdiction of the United States; subject, however, to any and all rights of property and State jurisdiction in and over the same; but the privileges thus conferred are not to be enjoyed by any company or persons whose line or cable, by its connections or otherwise, terminates in or extends to any foreign country in and by which similar privileges are not conferred upon companies incorporated by the authority of the United States or of any State of this Union.

Mr. SUMNER. I move to amend the joint resolution by inserting in the second line of the second section, immediately after the word "reservations," the words:

And subject to the terms of such grants as have heretofore been made by Congress for laying and maintaining telegraph cables between the United States and foreign countries.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I suggest to the Senator from Massachusetts that it should also be subject to laws which may hereafter be enacted.

Mr. SUMNER. Let this amendment be adopted.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. And then there should be a further amendment that the act shall be open to amendment or repeal by Congress hereafter.

Mr. SUMNER. I have no objection, but there is a clause here that expressly says that:

It shall be at all times within the power of Congress to determine the rates to be charged for the transmission of messages and communications over any such line or cable, and to fix and establish such rules and regulations in relation thereto as it may judge necessary.

I think the Senator will find that the powers of Congress are sufficiently reserved.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I think not.

Mr. SUMNER. I should like to have the amendment I have moved acted on. It is simply to protect the grant already made for the Florida cable. That is all. There can be no objection to it.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I suggest to the Senator to insert after the word "heretofore" the words "or shall hereafter."

Mr. SUMNER. The Senator will see whether that is needed in view of the clause already here:

It shall be at all times within the power of Congress to determine the rates to be charged for the transmission of messages and communications over any such line or cable, and to fix and establish such rules and regulations in relation thereto as it may judge necessary.

It was so regarded in the committee, and I should like to have action on the amendment I have moved.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, was read the third time, and passed.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN.

On motion of Mr. MORRILL, of Maine, it was Ordered, That Nathan Webster have leave to withdraw his petition and papers from the files of the Senate.

ALASKA FUR SEAL.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I call for the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill.

Mr. CHANDLER. I ask the Senator from Maine to give way while I pass the little bill setting aside the fur-bearing islands in Alaska.

Mr. SUMNER. That ought to be passed.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. If the Senator can have unanimous consent, and it will take no time, I shall not object.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution (S. R. No. 239) more efficiently to protect the fur seal in Alaska. It declares the islands of St. Paul and St. George, in Alaska, to be a special reservation for Government purposes; and until otherwise provided by law it is to be unlawful for any person not an officer of the United States to land or remain on either of those islands except by authority of the Secretary of the Treasury; and any such person found on either island contrary to the provisions of the act is to be summarily removed; but nothing contained in the act is to be construed to authorize the removal of the bona fide inhabitants of the islands permanently resident therein at the date of the treaty of cession, nor in any way to relate to or affect them or their property or any rights belonging to them under the treaty. It is to be the duty of the Secretary of War to carry the act immediately into effect.

Mr. HOWARD. This is rather an unusual kind of legislation. I would inquire of my colleague what there is peculiar about these islands to justify such a measure.

Mr. CHANDLER. If the Alaska bill, so called, for the protection of the fur animals becomes a law this will not become necessary; but this does not interfere with that in the slightest degree. It is to prevent killing and driving off the fur seals.

Mr. HOWARD. Does it prevent officers of the Government who are allowed to occupy the islands from driving off the seals or seizing them and selling them?

Mr. GRIMES. According to the bill anybody that is an officer, who holds a post office, or is a justice of the peace in this District, or a marshal of a State or Territory can go sealing there, and nobody else.

Mr. HOWARD. I ask that it be read again.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. If it gives rise to debate I must insist on the regular order.

Mr. GRIMES. It includes military officers, naval officers, Treasury officers.

Mr. HOWARD. Let it be read again. It is short.

The Secretary read the joint resolution.

Mr. CHANDLER. I move to strike out the words "not an officer of the United States." That covers the ground.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GRIMES. Now it will give a monopoly to anybody who happens to have been on the islands at the time of the purchase.

Mr. CHANDLER. It leaves the matter under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury. There is no one there except the Esquimaux.

Mr. GRIMES. The Secretary of the Treasury cannot drive off those who were there at the time of the purchase.

Mr. FERRY. There were no white men there.

Mr. GRIMES. How do we know that?

Mr. PATTERSON, of New Hampshire. I offered this resolution a few evenings since. It was put into my hands by an officer of the Treasury, and was drawn under the supervision of the Secretary of the Treasury. The object of the resolution is to keep interlopers from the islands of St. Paul and St. George. Parties go there, and the United States Government has no authority to keep them from the islands or to put them off after they go there, so that they may take seal on different parts of the islands and the Government cannot help it. The only object of the resolution is to keep these interlopers off, to guard the seals, so that it may not be necessary to create a large military force there to protect the islands.

Mr. FERRY. I suppose the object of the resolution is to keep them off until a law can be passed to regulate these seal fisheries.

Mr. PATTERSON, of New Hampshire, and Mr. CHANDLER. That is it.

Mr. FERRY. That is all there is of it.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I move to amend this resolution by striking out all after the word "remove," in the tenth line, to the word "treaty," in the fifteenth line, inclusive.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The words proposed to be stricken out will be read.

The SECRETARY. The words proposed to be stricken out are:

But nothing contained in this act shall be construed to authorize the removal of the bona fide inhabitants of said islands permanently resident thereon at the date of the treaty of cession; nor in any way to relate to or affect them or their property or any rights belonging to them under said treaty.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Let it be read as it would stand after the amendment.

The SECRETARY. If thus amended the resolution would then read:

That the islands of St. Paul and St. George, in Alaska, be, and they are hereby, declared a special reservation for Government purposes; and that until otherwise provided by law it shall be unlawful for any person to land or remain on either of said islands except by authority of the Secretary of the Treasury, and any such person found on either of said islands contrary to the provisions of this act shall be summarily removed; and it shall be the duty of the Secretary of War to carry this act immediately into effect.

Mr. CHANDLER. I hope that will be adopted. I have no objection to it.

The amendment was agreed to.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

Mr. HOWARD. I move to strike out the word "such" before "person," in line eight. The amendment was agreed to.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, was read the third time, and passed.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed the following bills and joint resolution of the Senate without amendment:

A bill (S. No. 584) relating to the time for finding indictments in the courts of the United States in the late rebel States;

A bill (S. No. 612) relating to the proof of wills in the District of Columbia;

A bill (S. No. 665) respecting the organization of militia in the States of North Carolina, South Carolina, Florida, Alabama, Louisiana, and Arkansas;

A bill (S. No. 711) relating to the Metropolitan Railroad Company;

A bill (S. No. 712) to define the fees of recorder of deeds and provide for the appointment of warden of the jail in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes;

A bill (S. No. 722) to amend an act entitled "An act to provide a national currency secured by a pledge of United States bonds, and to provide for the circulation and redemption thereof," by extending certain penalties to accessories; and

A joint resolution (S. No. 200) reappointing Louis Agassiz a regent of the Smithsonian Institution.

The message also announced that the House had passed the following bill and joint resolution of the Senate, with amendments, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

A bill (S. No. 167) granting lands to the State of Oregon to aid in the construction of a military wagon road from the navigable waters of Coos bay to Roseburg in said State; and

A joint resolution (S. R. No. 178) tendering sympathy to the people of Spain and Cuba.

RAILROADS IN MINNESOTA AND IOWA.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Mr. President, some days ago Senate joint resolution No. 191 was considered in part, but the Senator from Iowa [Mr. HARLAN] wanted to look into it further. It came from the Committee on Public Lands. I believe now there is no objection to it, and I ask that it be passed.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I think we had better go on with the regular order.

Mr. HENDRICKS. This will take but a minute.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Here is a half hour gone.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I guess the Senator will not object.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection the bill will be taken up.

There being no objection the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the joint resolution (S. R. No. 191) explanatory of an act of Congress approved March 3, 1865, entitled "An act extending the time for the completion of certain land-grant railroads in the States of Minnesota and Iowa, and for other purposes."

The Committee on Public Lands moved to amend the resolution by striking out from the eleventh line the words "purchased by any one of said railroads and adopted and made a part of the line thereof," and inserting "by any arrangement adopted by any of said railroads and made part of the line thereof."

The amendment was agreed to.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I should like to have the Senator from Indiana explain this resolution.

Mr. HENDRICKS. In the act of 1865 there was some very vague language used, and this is explanatory of that language. This is adopting the construction that the Commissioner of the General Land Office put upon the law, which construction, however, the Secretary of the Interior dissented from.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. What is the merit of the matter?

Mr. HENDRICKS. The question was whether the grant was for the benefit of the road, so far as it was finished at that time, or whether it was confined to the work thereafter to be done. The Commissioner held that it included that which had already been done under the grant as well as that which was to be done in the future.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I dislike to object to the passage of this bill, but—

Mr. HENDRICKS. If there be any question about it I cannot ask for the consideration of the resolution, under my understanding with the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. There is a very vague explanation of it. Nobody knows anything about its extent.

Mr. HENDRICKS. The Senator from Iowa examined it.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. And he does not approve of it.

Mr. HENDRICKS. If he does not I was misinformed. The Senator from Minnesota told me he was satisfied.

Mr. RAMSEY. The Senator from Iowa has withdrawn the objection he made to the measure when it was up before, I will inform the Senator from Vermont.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. He has told me that he cannot vote for the bill.

Mr. RAMSEY. He made objection, but withdrew it. Probably he has not paid particular attention to it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Are objections persisted in to the bill?

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. Yes, sir.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I hope we shall go on with the appropriation bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That is regularly before the Senate.

LEGISLATIVE, ETC., APPROPRIATION BILL.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 1672) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the year ending the 30th of June, 1870.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. An amendment of the Committee on Appropriations has been passed over, which will be reported.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 46 it is proposed to insert after line eleven hundred and thirty-one the following:

Provided, That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized, whenever in his judgment and in the judgment of the Director of the Mint it is for the interest of the United States to do so, to receive on deposit at the Mint of the United States and the several branches thereof refined gold and silver bullion suitable for coinage, and in payment thereof to deliver to the parties making such deposits unparted bars at such rates and upon such terms and regulations as shall be prescribed by the Director of the Mint, subject to the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. STEWART. As some question was raised about that, I will ask for the reading of the letters of the Secretary of the Treasury and the Director of the Mint.

The Secretary read as follows:

January 19, 1869.

The views presented by the Director of the Mint relative to receiving deposits of refined bullion suitable for coinage and paying the depositors thereof in unparted bars meet my approval, and I have no doubt if the proposed bill shall become a law, and the discretion in this particular left to the officers of the Mint, subject to the approval of the Secretary, that the interests of all parties will be protected and a considerable amount saved to the Government at present lost from the wastage and expense of refining gold and silver bullion.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully,

H. McCULLOCH,
Secretary of the Treasury.

Hon. SCHUYLER COLFAX,
Speaker of the House of Representatives.

MINT OF THE UNITED STATES,
PHILADELPHIA, January 15, 1869.

SIR: I duly received your favor of the 13th instant, inclosing a draft of a law permissive to the Mint and its branches to exchange unparted gold or silver bars for refined gold and silver bullion under certain restrictions, and herewith offer my views of the same. In order to a clearer view of the subject I have prepared the following table of deposits of domestic gold (to be refined) at United States Mint and branches from 1804 to 1867.

1804 to 1867, inclusive.

Dates.	Number of years.	Amount of gold deposited.
		Total amounts.	Annual average.
1804 to 1827.....	24	$110,000	$4,500
1828 to 1837.....	10	5,063,000	506,300
1838 to 1847.....	10	7,835,000	783,500
1848 to 1857.....	10	415,557,000	41,555,700
1858 to 1867.....	10	271,690,000	27,169,000

An inspection of the table shows that up to the year 1848 the amount of gold requiring parting (refining) was so limited as hardly to tempt private capital to undertake refining as a remunerative operation except at exorbitant rates of charge to compensate for the small extent of the business. Hence arose that provision in the Mint law, from its origin, permitting gold to be refined at the Mint and its branches at rates not exceeding the bare cost of the operation. With the sudden expansion of gold production, however, in California from 1848, and in Australia from 1851, amounting to an average annual deposit in the United States Mint and branches of $41,555,000 of domestic gold, the necessities of the case started many private refineries into activity. For while the Mint deposits reached their summit in 1853 and 1854, amounting to about fifty million dollars per annum, this amount gradually declined in successive years, so that the last decennary only averaged $27,690,000 per annum; and yet we know that the total annual production has not diminished. It is therefore reasonable to estimate that about one half of the amount of the gold production of the United States is refined in private establishments, and as the same are sufficiently numerous, skillful, and responsible for all the refining business that can be demanded, there is no longer a reason for the Government being a manufacturer, which it becomes by refining gold.

Moreover, a Government establishment necessarily demands a larger official staff, buildings commensurate to the position of the United States as a world's Power, and other sources of cost which private refineries can avoid, so that the latter can and do refine at a lower rate of charge than the Government. As one great advantage alleged to be inherent in a Government refinery is the greater security of the depositor in receiving the full value of his deposit, it is evident that this is fully secured by the Government receiving a deposit, determining its value, paying the depositor, and then passing it into the hands of private refineries under conditions sufficient to secure the Government from loss. Security is thus attained both by the depositor and the Government. In addition to security the Treasury becomes indirectly a gainer by avoiding the losses termed wastage, which it is impossible to avoid when gold and silver are subjected to fire and chemicals in the art of refining. The difference between the charge by the Mint to depositors for refining and the price paid to refiners for their operations would cover all refining wastage to which the Government is now subject, and probably have a surplus to cover other necessary expenditures. As in all other business arrangements, the details of such an arrangement as is proposed should manifestly be left to the discretion of the proper officers, the Secretary of the Treasury and the Director of the Mint. Different localities, with their differing circumstances, will probably demand different arrangements. Some localities might not offer private refineries in all respects suited to the purpose, and hence it should not be obligatory on the Secretary to execute the proposed plan.

The draft of the proposed law is returned without alteration, as it fully meets all the requirements of the case.

Very respectfully,

H. R. LINDERMAN,
Director.

Hon. HUGH McCULLOCH,
Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. STEWART. I will make a brief explanation; I shall occupy but a moment; I want the proposition understood. For two years the Secretary of the Treasury and the Director of the Mint have recommended this policy, and I think I can in a moment make it understood why it is the policy of this country. A very large portion of the bullion of the United States is shipped, as is well known, to foreign countries to be refined and parted. I suppose no one desires that result. I myself did not know how that was brought when the subject was up last year; I had not given the subject accurate consideration, although I live in a mining country, and my State produces as much if not more than any other State in proportion, and is interested as much in the price of bullion as any State. I had not investigated this great measure as to how it would affect that question and was not prepared to take my stand. I am now.

Now, there are two reasons why bullion can be shipped to England and foreign bankers buy it and pay more for it than our people can pay at home. In the first place, the difference in the price of labor upon a thing of this kind is not so much as has been supposed, because the labor is not a very great part of the operation. It is not the cost of materials, which are almost as cheap here as there. You have to have a great deal of metal for the solution. The great difference results, first, from the fact that the mint in Great Britain does not make the charges the United States Mint does, and her coinage is practically carried on free, so that the coining value of bullion is higher. In the next place, the principal thing she does is to allow private enterprise to do the refining.

In the United States when we started the Mint there were no private refineries and a different system was adopted to refine in the Mint, and by law the expense of carrying on this establishment is charged to the person leaving his bullion with the Mint for coinage. The Government carries it on in an expensive way, and consequently the Mint charges are high. There are other Mint charges besides these, but the great charge is for the refining. The result is that in the United States on the Pacific coast the commercial value of bullion for exportation was from a half to three quarters of one per cent. higher than the Mint value of gold, and the foreign banker has shipped it to England, and it has been shipped after being refined to China, and shipped back to this country. It has been taken there because our charges are so high.

Now, what does this propose to do? It proposes to encourage these private refiners, to let them go on, and let the Mint when it can get refined bullion take it and exchange the crude bullion for it, and let the Mint be confined to the mere business of coining in all those localities where private enterprise will enter into refining.

The effort to defeat this measure illustrates this matter better than anything. I have investigated and read all the arguments on both sides. In San Francisco, after they started private refineries, the merchants who bought the bullion to refine have raised the price of bullion in my country about one half of one per cent., and perhaps as high as three-fourths of one per cent. The consequence is that a large portion of the bullion is retained at home and manufactured and a larger amount goes to the Mint, because the men get returns so much more quickly. All there is in this proposition is to say "We will allow private enterprise to refine bullion." If it can be done cheaper in that way, private establishments will do the work; otherwise the bullion will be refined at the Mint. I say—and I have investigated the subject—the effect is to raise the price of bullion, and thus we encourage an enterprise that benefits the miners, benefits the commerce of the country, raises the price of bullion at home, and stimulates this industry. Of course the foreign banker who desires to have bullion cheap in this country so that he can buy it and send it out is opposed to this. The miner who is interested in having the value of his bullion enhanced and the banker who wishes to trade at home are for this. The Director of the Mint and the Secretary of the Treasury favor it. Every one interested in home industry advocates the adoption of this measure. It is simply saying the Government shall not undertake to do business in a bungling way where private enterprise can do it profitably to the community.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. At the next session we shall unquestionably have here the subject of coinage and various matters in relation to the Mint; and it seems to me this is rather too important a matter to be disposed of in an appropriation bill. After we have made appropriations to establish assay offices and mints all over the country, now it is proposed to do away with them and leave the business to private assayers. I merely make the suggestion.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FERRY. The amendments of the Committee on Appropriations are now finished, I believe.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. They are.

Mr. FERRY. I move this amendment, to come in immediately after line ten hundred and sixty-three:

For investigation and report on the cattle disease, already made, $7,500.

The amendment I have offered grows out of this state of facts: it is familiar to the Senate that during the last year exceeding alarm was created in almost all sections of the country by the appearance and great prevalence of the cattle disease. The attention of the Commissioner of Agriculture was drawn to this circumstance, and he availed himself of the services of Professor Gamgee, of England, who had been familiar with and engaged in investigating the disease of pleuro-pneumonia of cattle in that country. Under the authority of the Commissioner of Agriculture investigations were made of this question in the western States, and to a very great extent in the State of Texas. Reports also were made by him to the Commissioner of Agriculture and forwarded to the committee of the House with the papers in the case, and that committee reported a bill containing the appropriation which is now in the amendment I have offered. That, however, I am informed was stricken out in the House; and I now move to reinsert it in the bill as it was originally inserted by the committee of the House.

I have before me quite a number of papers. I do not want to take up the time of the Senate in reading them or referring to them. I believe they have most of them been before the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I ask the Senator if this appropriation has been considered by the proper committee?

Mr. FERRY. I am not aware whether it has been considered by the Committee on Agriculture. So far as I understand the fact is that it was inserted originally in the bill reported in the House by the appropriate committee there; it was stricken out in the House, and when the papers were brought to the attention of the Committee on Agriculture—I think it was only yesterday morning—it was too late for an examination. The papers were submitted to us both by the gentleman who was employed by the Commissioner of Agriculture and by a gentleman connected with the agricultural societies of my own State with a very earnest request that I would give notice of this amendment and propose it at the proper time. I have examined the papers with care and believe the facts which I have stated to be true. The only reason why it has not been examined by the Committee on Agriculture is the fact that not until yesterday morning was the fact known that the item had been stricken out from the bill reported to the House, and the committee of this body had not had time to examine it. But the papers, as I have said, were sent to the Committee on Appropriations some time ago, and I filed the amendment and referred it to the same committee, I think. I wish to read a part of one letter which I possess. Says the writer:

"I am astounded at the treatment Professor Gamgee has received in the House. He gave up his private interests, which required his attention every moment, at the request of Commissioner Capron, and obtained the information wanted, which information could not thus have been obtained without him, and gave us facts worth millions to us. It will be a national disgrace to deprive him of his pay. All he says is true, and his family need the money."

I have a communication here from the Department of Agriculture, showing that the losses in four States alone last year amounted to $1,500,000 by this disease; that it spread through the western and southwestern States. It recites the acts of the various boards of trade and of health, and the agricultural societies of most of the western States. There are also in my hands papers from the agricultural societies of the eastern States, urging the continuance of this investigation and a fuller report; but at the present time I have simply offered an amendment to pay this gentleman for the services he rendered at the request of the Commissioner of Agriculture, which have been, upon the testimony of all these various bodies interested in this subject in different sections of the country, of very great value to the country.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FERRY. I offer another amendment on the same subject. It is to insert after line ten hundred and sixty-three:

For continuance and completion of investigations of the cattle disease, $7,500.

The Commissioner of Agriculture, from whom I hold a letter in my hands, is desirous of the continuance of this investigation. The professor himself does not care anything about it. To him it is entirely immaterial. He only asks for the appropriation made by the amendment already adopted. The various agricultural institutions in different portions of the country have earnestly urged upon the attention of Congress the continuance of this investigation, and a fuller report. I hold in my hand a resolution, for instance, from the Connecticut Board of Agriculture, recently passed:

"Resolved, That the Connecticut Board of Agriculture learns with alarm and regret of the widespread prevalence of contagious pleuro pneumonia in cattle, and respectfully urges on Congress the necessity for the appointment of a commission of investigation, and the early adoption of measures for eradicating the disease."

It has appeared to me from the papers which have been placed in my hands that it is a matter of great public interest that this investigation should be continued, that the loss threatened to the country during the ensuing season may possibly be entirely prevented, or at any rate materially diminished, by the continuance of the work in which this gentleman has been engaged during the past year.

Mr. POMEROY. I desire to ask the Senator what bureau has charge of this? Where are these investigations had?

Mr. FERRY. They are reported to the Bureau of Agriculture. As I have stated, I have a letter from the Commissioner of Agriculture, and an allusion is made in the last monthly report to this subject.

Mr. POMEROY. The matter is of considerable importance, indeed of very great importance to many sections of the country.

Mr. FERRY. It is under the control of the Bureau of Agriculture, and the amendment which I propose is under the head of that Department in the present appropriation bill.

Mr. POMEROY. Is the amendment to cover the expenses of the late investigation and report?

Mr. FERRY. An amendment has already been agreed to appropriating $7,500 for the expenses which were incurred in the investigation of last year in Texas and in the western States.

Mr. POMEROY. That belongs to the deficiency bill. But what do you propose to do for the ensuing year?

Mr. FERRY. For the ensuing year the present amendment appropriates $7,500.

Mr. POMEROY. I do not know but that this is very well. It occurs to me if this subject is going to be taken up by the nation with any degree of interest to arrive at results it requires a larger expenditure than that and a great deal of research. I have never yet been able to ascertain any one who could give us the cause of this disease and of the deaths that occur. I have seen cattle die by the road side, and no living man in our section of the country has ever been able to tell the cause. The cattle that are driven from Texas and that region of the country through my State appear to be healthy, but our own cattle following in their wake die. It is not the Texas cattle that die, for they do not seem to be diseased, but they leave it in their track. I would like to have a scientific investigation that would be thorough and complete and absorb the whole question. I do not know but that this might be a good beginning. It is a question of very great magnitude. With the best research we can give it in the West we have arrived at no conclusion about it. Our State has gone so far as to forbid the driving of cattle through the State except during two or three winter months. It will not let them be driven at all during the growing season.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Allow me to suggest to the Senator that by reference to one of the monthly reports some two or three months ago he will find a very interesting and I think, as far as I can judge at least, an able article on this subject in regard to the disease, its appearances, its symptoms, and the safest remedies as far as they are known, as far as they can be described in an article of that length, I believe, written by the gentleman who is provided for in the amendment already adopted.

Mr. FERRY. I have it before me. It is the monthly report for November and December, 1868.

Mr. POMEROY. That report I have seen.

Mr. HENDRICKS. When I read that article I felt it of such importance that I sent it out for the consideration of a gentleman learned in such matters in the State of Indiana. I thought it of great use indeed that it should be known.

Mr. POMEROY. The real facts are very well known; but the remedy, if any exists, is not even detailed in that report, and it is not known. What I want the appropriation for is, if possible, to pursue the investigation until some remedy can be reached.

Mr. FERRY. That is what it is for.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I offer the following amendment, to follow the last clause of the bill at the close of line thirteen hundred and sixteen:

And no United States marshal for the District of Columbia, in the settlement of his accounts with the Government, shall be chargeable with such fees as are uncollectable by reasonable diligence.

I suppose this amendment need not be explained much. It explains itself. I understand that under the law, as applicable to the marshal of the District of Columbia, he is chargeable in his accounts with all fees, and where he cannot collect the fees he seems to be a defaulter. Of course no suits are brought upon bonds in such cases, but it is disagreeable for a marshal to have accounts standing against him.

Mr. CONKLING. I hope this amendment will not be agreed to until we see more clearly the reason for it. It does not belong on this bill, certainly. I do not see how a marshal can be chargeable for any fees in this way.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I do not propose to discuss the wisdom of the law as it now is. The fact is that the marshal of the District of Columbia in the settlement of his accounts has to report all fees. The marshal tells me that they are charged against him on his report, whether he can collect them or not. He is willing to be held to the exercise of care and diligence, but if he cannot collect the fees, then he wishes to be credited with them. I asked the marshal this question: how it was that the marshals in the different States were not defaulters in that respect also, and he was of the impression that they do not report the fees where they cannot collect them, and therefore they do not come to the Department at all. But he esteems it to be his duty to report all fees under existing laws applicable to his office, and he stands chargeable now in the accounts with about a thousand dollars that he cannot possibly collect. That ought not to be.

Mr. CONKLING. I submit now to the honorable Senator himself upon his own statement that this is not the way to legislate on such a matter. The Senator does not seem himself to have referred to the statute. He is not able to say that there is any distinction between the law applicable to the marshal here and the marshal in any other district. No committee has been directed to investigate this. It is a very easy thing to refer it to a committee; there can be no urgency about it; and I do not see why we might not with as much propriety make this provision in reference to any other district as well as this. We do not know what the statute is as it stands, nor what changes such a provision as this would work in the law. It seems to me to be imprudent and hasty legislation.

Mr. HENDRICKS. It cannot do any harm anyhow.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WILLEY. I have had an interview with the Commissioner of Patents, and with him have reviewed so much of this bill as relates to the service in the Patent Office, and feel it my duty after information from him to move several amendments, to which I desire to direct the attention of the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations; and I invite his attention first to page 30, line seven hundred and thirty. The number of clerks in the office at this time of class two is fifty-six. The House bill as it comes to us, reported without amendment in this respect by the Committee on Appropriations on the part of the Senate, reduces this force to thirty-five clerks. The Commissioner assures me that it will be impossible for him to carry on the service devolved on him as the head of that office with the reduction of force made in this bill, and earnestly insists that the number of clerks of this class shall not be reduced at all. He says that it will be utterly impossible for him to keep the business up which is before that office, and daily and monthly increasing, with a less force of that class of clerks than he now has. I propose, therefore, to move that in line seven hundred and thirty the word "thirty-five" be stricken out and "fifty-six" be inserted instead thereof, that consequently the appropriation in that clause be changed from $44,800 to $78,400. The Commissioner has furnished me with a statement of the entire force in his Department, and also with a statement of the reduction of that force made by this bill; and the net reduction of employes by the bill below what the force now is in that Department would be fifty-five, including the one stricken out today on motion of the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, making a reduction of fifty-six employes in that Department. I have here a letter—

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. If the Senator pleases, I would prefer to have one amendment at a time.

Mr. WILLEY. In line seven hundred and thirty I move to restore the force to what it is now precisely.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Let us act on that first.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be reported.

The CHIEF CLERK. In line seven hundred and thirty it is moved to strike out "thirty-five" and insert "fifty-six."

Mr. WILLEY. I will read some extracts from a letter of the Commissioner in regard to this whole bill, which applies as much and more perhaps to this amendment which I have offered than to any other part of the bill:

"I inclose to you a list of the employes in the Patent Office and the changes made by the appropriation bill recently passed by the House. The bill would require the discharge of twenty-one clerks at $1,400. These are our most valuable and experienced clerks, and without them the business of the office cannot be promptly done."

So much in regard to that amendment. I will state in this connection that the Commissioner assures me that if he is allowed force sufficient to keep up the business before the office and execute it promptly the net proceeds of the Patent Office fund the present year beyond what will be necessary to pay the expenses of the office, keeping the force in the office at what it now is without any reduction, will amount to at least the sum of $150,000. That will be the excess after paying all the expenses of the office, provided he is allowed to retain the force he now has, which he assures me is only sufficient to enable him to discharge the duties of the office efficiently and promptly. He will be enabled to cover into the Treasury at the end of the year the nice sum out of the proceeds of the office of $150,000 beyond the expenses of the office.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Will the Senator state the amendment he proposes?

Mr. WILLEY. To strike out in line seven hundred and thirty the word "thirty-five" and insert "fifty-six," and as a consequence of it, to make the appropriation correspond by striking out "$44,800" and inserting "$78,400."

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. The next.

Mr. WILLEY. The next amendment is in line seven hundred and thirty-two to strike out "forty" and insert "fifty-four," that is the class of clerks at $1,200 a year; and to make a corresponding change in the sum appropriated by striking out "$48,000" and inserting "$64,800." If the Senator desires me to state all my amendments at once I can do so. I ask action on the first amendment I offered.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from West Virginia, in line seven hundred and thirty.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WILLEY. The next amendment is in line seven hundred and thirty-two to strike out "forty" and insert "fifty-four" before "clerks," and to strike out "$48,000" and insert "$64,800;" so as to read:

For fifty-four clerks of class one, $64,800.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WILLEY. I now desire to ask the attention of the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations to lines seven hundred and thirty-five, seven hundred and thirty-six, seven hundred and thirty-seven, seven hundred and thirty-eight, and seven hundred and thirty-nine. Here is a modification which I think is a change in the present system. The bill provides in these lines—

For thirteen copyists of drawings at $1,000 each, $13,000.

For fifty-three female copyists at $700 each, $37,100.

At present I am informed by the Commissioner that this copying, which consists of copying drawings and copying records and papers is done by giving the work out to parties outside of the office, to females outside the office. They are paid ten cents per every one hundred words. That fee is collected off the party who desires the copies and the compensation charged is paid to the party that does the labor.

Now, this bill provides, so far as female copyists are concerned at least, that they shall be paid as regular appointees of the office. The Commissioner says, in the first place, that there is no place to put them. He has neither a room nor rooms where these appointees at a fixed salary can be properly located; and inasmuch as the present system costs the Government nothing, inasmuch as he has all this copying done by giving it out of the office—

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. The honorable Senator will pardon me. If he will state what he proposes I shall be able to see the force of his remarks.

Mr. WILLEY. Before I state what I propose I will say that the Commissioner informs me in his letter that last year the total sum paid for this copying amounted to $60,000. He says it will amount to more than that this year. My proposition is to strike out lines seven hundred and thirty-five, seven hundred and thirty-six, seven hundred and thirty-seven, and seven hundred and thirty-eight and insert instead thereof the following:

For copies of drawing, and of records, papers, &c., the sum of $65,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, to be expended under the direction of the Commissioner of Patents.

I offer the amendment.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. That increases the appropriation.

Mr. WILLEY. I will say to the honorable Senator that the fees received for this copying amounted to $60,000 last year. The business is constantly increasing. The Commissioner supposes it will amount to $65,000 this year. It need not be expended unless it is necessary.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Very well. The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WILLEY. This bill also, in line seven hundred and forty-five, makes a reduction of the amount appropriated for skilled laborers, and the Commissioner thinks he cannot possibly get along with that reduction. In line seven hundred and forty-seven I move to strike out "thirty" and insert "thirty-four," and consequently to strike out "$18,000" and insert "$20,400;" so as to read:

For thirty-four laborers at $600 each, $20,400.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WILLEY. There is a force now of twelve laborers at $480 a year. To take the sense of the Senate I move to insert after line seven hundred and fifty the following words:

For twelve laborers at $480 each, $5,760.

That is just restoring the force there is now. The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WILLEY. I move to insert after line seven hundred and fifty-one "For five watchmen at $720 each, $3,600.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. COLE. I move an amendment on page 28, in line six hundred and eighty-four, to strike out "$4,500;" and in the following line to strike out "$7,500" and to insert "$9,500;" so as to make the clause read:

For surveyor general of California and Arizona, $3,000, and for clerks in his office, $6,500, $9,500.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Has the Senator examined that and found it to conform to the estimates?

Mr. COLE. It is in accordance with the estimates. In consistency with another appropriation of $20,000 for the work of the office, this appropriation is required for the proper working of the establishment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WHYTE. I offer the following amendment as an additional section:

And be it further enacted, That the clerks, messengers, watchmen, and laborers or other persons, male or female, now employed at Washington, District of Columbia, at a salary fixed by a law or by regulations of a Department, in the State, War, Navy, Interior, Agricultural, and Post Office Departments, (including the Attorney General's office and the Department of Education and city post office,) and the bureaus or branches of the several Departments herein named, who are paid at a rate not exceeding $1,800 per annum, shall be allowed an additional compensation of ten per cent. on the amount of salary or pay received or that shall be received by them respectively during the past and present fiscal years; and that the necessary amount to pay the same is hereby appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont, called for the yeas and nays; and they were ordered.

Mr. CORBETT. I should like to inquire whether this will not apply to the female laborers whose salary we have raised to-day to that of other employes?

Mr. TRUMBULL. They are raised for the next fiscal year.

Mr. CORBETT. I understand this is for the last year and for the present fiscal year.

Mr. TRUMBULL. This ten per cent. is not for the next year. It is proposed for the past year.

Mr. CORBETT. And the present year.

Mr. TRUMBULL. But not for next year. The next fiscal year commences on the first of July next.

Mr. WHYTE. The amendment is for the past fiscal year and the present fiscal year which will end on the 30th of June. The new appropriation bill commences on the 1st of July.

Mr. CORBETT. I would like to know when the salaries of the females commence which we raised to-day. Is it from the 1st of July next?

Mr. TRUMBULL. The 1st of next July, the beginning of the next fiscal year.

Mr. FERRY. I should like to inquire of the mover of this amendment what amount of money will be required to pay this extra ten per cent. for the period of two years?

Mr. WHYTE. I will answer the gentleman by saying that not being an accounting officer of the Treasury I have not made an accurate calculation. I know, however, that it only adds $180 to each clerk of the highest grade mentioned in the amendment.

Mr. SHERMAN. I should like to know what past year is referred to in the amendment, 1801 or 1865. What past year does it refer to?

Mr. WHYTE. The last past year, as a matter of course.

Mr. SHERMAN. It does not say so.

Mr. WHYTE. It means so. When you speak of the present year and the past year it means the year just passed.

Mr. SHERMAN. Why not go back to the beginning of the war?

Mr. WHYTE. This is only to enable these clerks during these high prices—

Mr. SHERMAN. The high prices commenced in 1863. I think we had better go back.

Mr. WHYTE. I have no objection. If you will propose an amendment for 1863 I will vote for it.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I would inquire of the Senator from Ohio if we did not pay them twenty per cent. two years ago?

Mr. SHERMAN. I do not know that. We paid some of them. We have raised the pay of some since that time.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I make the point of order that this is not in order under the thirtieth rule.

Mr. WHYTE. What is the point of order?

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. The amendment contains an item of appropriation, and does not come from any committee.

Mr. WHYTE. I had it referred to the Committee on Appropriations on Saturday last.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. But what committee did it come from? Who authorized it? I inquire of the Senator whether he is authorized to move this amendment by any committee of the Senate?

Mr. WHYTE. It was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, but there was no action on it. I have a right to offer it at this time.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I raise that question. It does not seem to be authorized by any committee of this body.

Mr. WHYTE. It is not necessary, as I understand.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The rule will be read.

The Secretary read the following portion of rule thirty:

"All amendments to general appropriation bills reported from committees of the Senate, proposing new items of appropriation, shall, one day before they are offered, be referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and all general appropriation bills shall be referred to the said committee."

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. That is not the clause.

Mr. WHYTE. That is the clause I offered it under.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. It is the first clause.

The Secretary read as follows:

"No amendment proposing additional appropriations shall be received to any general appropriation bill unless it be made to carry out the provisions of some existing law, or some act or resolution previously passed by the Senate during that session, or moved by direction of a standing or select committee of the Senate, or in pursuance of an estimate from the head of some of the Departments; and no amendment shall be received whose object is to provide for a private claim, unless it be to carry out the provisions of an existing law or a treaty stipulation."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is not in order unless it comes from a committee.

Mr. WHYTE. I offered it under the second clause of this rule, and I maintain that it is perfectly proper unless I do not understand how to read the English language.

"All amendments to general appropriation bills reported from committees of the Senate, proposing new items of appropriation, shall, one day before they are offered, be referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and all general appropriation bills shall be referred to the said committee."

I offered this amendment through my colleague [Mr. VICKERS] on Saturday last, and had it referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and under that clause I am entitled to offer it.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Now, if the Senator will pardon me, it cannot be offered at all under this rule unless it comes from a committee; and my inquiry was whether any committee had authorized him to propose the amendment. It has not. It cannot be proposed to my committee at all unless it be authorized first by some committee of this body. That is the point. This is an additional rule simply requiring that whenever a committee proposes to make an amendment, having determined to propose it, they must give the Committee on Appropriations twenty-four hours' notice.

Mr. WHYTE. Mr. President, it is not—

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator appeal from the decision of the Chair?

Mr. WHYTE. I do.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is, "Shall the decision of the Chair stand as the judgment of the Senate?"

The decision of the Chair was sustained.

Mr. CRAGIN. I offer the following amendment, to come in at the end of the seventy-third line, on page 4:

Provided, That all improvements, alterations, additions, and repairs of the Capitol building shall hereafter be made by the direction and under the supervision of the architect of the Capitol extension, and the same shall be paid for out of the appropriations for the said extension and from no other appropriation; and that no furniture or carpets for either House shall hereafter be purchased without the written order of the chairman of the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate for the Senate, or without the written order of the chairman of the Committee on Accounts of the House of Representatives for the House.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. NYE. At the end of line eleven hundred and forty-one after the word "Treasury" I propose to insert the following amendment:

Branch mint at Carson City, Nevada:

To pay a deficit on machinery and freight on machinery from Philadelphia to Carson City, $31,000. For fitting up machinery in said mint and putting it in working order, $11,000.

For salaries of officers and clerks, for wages of workmen, and for incidental expenses, including acids, chemicals, and waste, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1870, $74,900.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. We do not want that on this bill. That should go on the deficiency bill.

Mr. NYE. The latter part of it should go on here.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Perhaps the last two items should go on here.

Mr. NYE. I have in my hand an estimate made by the Secretary of the Treasury and the Director of the Mint at Philadelphia for the expenses for the fiscal year commencing July 1, 1869, and ending June 30, 1870, at $74,600. The mint will be ready to start its operations about that time or by that time certainly. The first item for deficiency for machinery not being appropriate to this bill can wait for the deficiency bill, but I will ask that the latter item, $74,600, for salaries, &c., be inserted here. I hate to have all the other mints in the bill without having ours mentioned.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Let the Clerk read what the Senator proposes to offer on this bill.

Mr. NYE. I propose to offer the amount we want for payment for machinery already shipped and for putting it up in the building. The first part of it I understood the honorable Senator as objecting to here, and therefore I offer the last item, $74,600, for salaries of officers and clerks, wages of workmen, and for incidental expenses, including acids, chemicals, and wastage, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1870.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Let it be reported by the Secretary.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to amend by adding at the end of line eleven hundred and forty-one:

Branch mint, Carson City, Nevada:
For salaries of officers and clerks, for wages of workmen, and for incidental expenses, including acids, chemicals, and wastage, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1870, $74,600.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I am not sure that that is estimated for at all. Has the Senator submitted that to us?

Mr. TRUMBULL. A communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, dated January 11, 1869, I see recommends it:

"As these appropriations seem to be necessary for putting the branch mint at Carson City, Nevada, in operation at the beginning of the next fiscal year, I respectfully request that the amounts asked for by the Director of the Mint may be appropriated.

And among them is this item of $74,600.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I believe that is right.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MORTON. I offer the following amendment as an additional section.

Mr. NYE. Allow me a moment further—

Mr. MORTON. Certainly.

Mr. NYE. I ask the honorable Senator from Maine if the other portion of my amendment is not germane to this bill?

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. As it struck me here I thought it was a deficiency. Let it be read.

The SECRETARY. It is as follows:

To pay a deficit on machinery and freight on machinery from Philadelphia to Carson City, $31,000.
For fitting up machinery in said mint and putting it in working order, $11,000.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. That ought to go on the deficiency bill.

Mr. NYE. Very well. I will not spend any time about it. I withdraw it.

Mr. MORTON. I offer the following as an additional section:

And be it further enacted, That the act regulating the tenure of certain civil offices, passed March 2, 1867, be, and the same is hereby, repealed.

Mr. NYE. I desire to make one more amendment, which I had forgotten. Before that discussion is entered upon I desire to offer the following amendment, to come in after line fifty-three:

Provided, That of the eight clerks in the office of the Secretary of the Senate one, to be designated the minute and journal clerk, shall receive an annual salary, beginning with the present session, of $2,592; and an amount necessary to pay said increased compensation is hereby appropriated.

Mr. GRIMES. We have got a committee on that subject, I believe. I should like to know whether they recommend it or see any necessity for it. It increases the salary of one clerk, and if you do that you have got to go through the whole list of officers of the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Nevada.

Mr. GRIMES called for the yeas and nays; and they were ordered.

Mr. CRAGIN. I would inquire if this amendment is in order? Does it come from any committee?

Mr. NYE. I have this to say, that I conversed with the chairman and different members of the committee and they consented that I should move the amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Then the question is on the amendment, and the Clerk will call the roll.

Mr. GRIMES. The Senator did not state that it came from a committee.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. He said he had the assent of the committee, as I understand.

Mr. GRIMES. What committee?

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. The Senator talked to me about moving it. That is what he means, I suppose.

Mr. NYE. I mean that.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. The question now is whether it is recommended by any committee.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Unless reported by a committee it is out of order. It is not in order. The question recurs on the amendment offered by the Senator from Indiana, [Mr. MORTON.]

Mr. FERRY. I wish to say a single word in reference to the amendment in this stage of the business of the session. I have not in former discussions expressed my opinion with regard to a repeal of what is known as the tenure-of-office law. I am, however, in favor of its total repeal, but I am not in favor of embarrassing the closing business of the session by appending so important an act to this appropriation bill. I shall therefore vote against it as an amendment to this bill.

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. President, I raise the question of order whether that is germane to the subject now before us.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That is not a question of order in the Senate of the United States. Whether it is appropriate or not is to be judged of by the Senate.

Mr. CONKLING. I do not understand the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection is made that this amendment is not in order because it is not germane; and that question is not to be decided in the Senate of the United States by the Chair. That is a question that Senators must judge of for themselves.

Mr. CONKLING. The Chair, then, will submit the question to the Senate.

Mr. HOWARD. I ask that it may be submitted to the Senate.

Mr. GRIMES. I inquire what rule it is that it trenches upon?

Mr. SHERMAN. What rule is it that requires us to pass a law germane in all its parts and only confined to one subject? I never heard of it.

Mr. CONKLING. What rule is there that requires any title to a bill? Is there any?

Mr. SHERMAN. A law would be good without a title.

Mr. CONKLING. I do not say it would or would not.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator appeal from the decision of the Chair? The question is not debatable; and the Chair decides the amendment to be in order.

Mr. CONKLING. There is no express rule of the Senate declaring such an amendment out of order; and so we do not have a rule to prevent any preposterous thing. Does the Chair refuse to submit the question to the Senate?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair decides that the amendment is in order. He cannot take cognizance of questions of relevancy.

Mr. CONNESS. Upon the amendment I call for the yeas and nays. Let us vote.

Mr. HOWARD. I appeal from the decision of the Chair.

Mr. POMEROY. There is no question that is in order. It may be improper to an appropriation bill, but it is in order.

Mr. CONNESS. I understand the Chair to have decided that.

Mr. CONKLING. The Senator from Michigan has appealed from the decision of the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair did not hear that. The Chair decides that this amendment is in order.

Mr. HOWARD. I take an appeal from the decision of the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Then the question is, "Shall the decision of the Chair stand as the judgment of the Senate?"

Mr. CONKLING called for the yeas and nays; and they were ordered.

Mr. SUMNER. Is this question debatable?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Certainly; the appeal from the decision of the Chair is debatable.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Mr. President, I do hope the Senator from Indiana will relieve us of this by withdrawing this proposition on this bill. He must know that there is some controversy in regard to this question. Without expressing my opinion now as to how I shall vote upon it it does seem to me, as it strikes the Senator from Connecticut, that we just endanger the passage of the appropriation bills. We have already laid aside one in consequence of a controverted matter of this character. I submit to the Senator from Indiana whether he will not bring it forward by itself.

Mr. MORTON. The friends of this amendment do not propose to debate it. The vote could have been taken almost by this time if there had been no objection made. It cannot hazard the passage of this bill, either in this House or in the other. It has been passed in the other House by a vote of nearly three to one and will not give the bill the least embarrassment in the other House, and we can take the vote here in five minutes, and if it is voted down, well; and if not, well; it will not embarrass the bill here or anywhere else.

Mr. CAMERON. I cannot consent to vote on this question without saying a word or two. I have said hitherto on more than one occasion that I shall vote for the repeal of the tenure-of-office law, but I cannot vote for this amendment on an appropriation bill at this stage of the session, when we shall endanger the whole bill and may occupy the whole evening upon this question. I think it is a most inopportune time to present this matter, and I am very much surprised that it should have been brought in now. I shall vote when it comes up in its naked form for the entire repeal of the law; but I think the friends of that measure can afford to wait a few days to have it done in the proper manner. I shall vote against this amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question now is whether the amendment is in order under the rules of the Senate, upon which question the yeas and nays are demanded. The question is whether the decision of the Chair shall stand as the judgment of the Senate, on which question the yeas and nays will be called.

Mr. FERRY. I hope the Senator from Michigan will withdraw the appeal. I have no doubt that under the practice of the Senate at any rate this amendment is in order. I hope the appeal will be withdrawn.

Mr. CONKLING. Before the Senator from Michigan withdraws or does not withdraw this appeal I hope Senators will stop to reflect upon the ground upon which it is taken. Nobody, I presume, will put it on the ground that there is a rule of the Senate which forbids it. I say with great respect that a more absurd and outlandish a thing is, in respect to parliamentary propriety, the more we do not have a rule to forbid that. Twenty illustrations of this could be given. Here is a proposition not only not germane but totally foreign to the thing before us as much as it would be to move an appropriation bill as an amendment to the tenure-of-office bill, as much as it would be to attempt to put together wholly dissimilar, and, indeed, repugnant things. There is no rule of the Senate, I remind Senators, providing that an amendment totally repugnant, totally absurd in its repugnance, shall not be in order, and yet I take it it would be excluded. Why? Because by general parliamentary law it is out of order, it is inharmonious, an infraction of the whole theory of parliamentary proceeding. That I take for granted is the idea of the honorable Senator who takes the appeal, and not that there is a particular rule of the Senate which says that you shall not do this thing. If everything were in order which is not forbidden by the few rules we have it would take a great deal of arithmetic to count up all the unheard of things which might with impunity be done here. The rules of the Senate, I submit, are not established to specify everything that may be done by parliamentary law and to prohibit everything which is indecorous, impertinent, or inadmissible by parliamentary law. I do not wish to debate it, but simply to present to the Senate and to the Chair the point that this is an extreme illustration of introducing a matter totally foreign, totally hostile, and repugnant to the nature of the thing under consideration under the name of an amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will have an authority read which contains the idea the Chair entertains.

The Chief Clerk read from Jefferson's Manual the following:

"If an amendment be proposed inconsistent with one already agreed to it is a fit ground for its rejection by the House, but not within the competence of the Speaker to suppress as if it were against order; for were he permitted to draw questions of consistence within the vortex of order he might usurp a negative on important modifications, and suppress instead of subserving the legislative will.

"Amendments may be made so as totally to alter the nature of the proposition, and it is a way of getting rid of a proposition by making it bear a sense different from what it was intended by the movers, so that they vote against it themselves."

Mr. HENDRICKS. That settles the question as far as the Senate is concerned, and I had supposed that the question of order was made, inasmuch as there is nothing in the rules of parliamentary usage, upon the fact that this question had been settled in a caucus. I supposed it was out of order for that reason, and I cannot conceive of any other. I was going to ask what was the ground of objection to it. I supposed that being a body which usually controls and governs that that was the ground on which it was out of order.

Mr. DRAKE. I would inquire of the honorable Senator from Indiana whether he was a member of that caucus that decided this matter?

Mr. HENDRICKS. I have so far maintained my integrity during this session as that I have not been connected with any such body, as far as I know. [Laughter.]

Mr. DRAKE. I do not see how the Senator, then, can speak as to what the caucus did if he was not a member of it.

Mr. HENDRICKS. A man can speak of very much that he did not do himself. I guess there is no doubt about it. It seems to be understood on all sides, in all classes of newspapers, that that thing was settled in caucus. Now, my colleague is setting up somewhat for himself, I think, on this question. [Laughter.] I am going to stand by him on it and do the best I can. I think this law ought to be repealed, and the sooner the better. It was regarded by the House of Representatives of such supreme importance last year as that the highest proceedings known to our form of Government were resorted to to enforce it and to punish by the severest penalty known its disregard by the President. Now, of course, the House repeals it, and I think the House has come to the right position. I think the law is unconstitutional and ought to be wiped out; therefore I vote for its repeal. I think it took away from the President a power that belonged to him under the Constitution, recognized as his from the foundation of the Government. So I shall vote for the repeal. The question of order is clearly as decided by the Chair.

Mr. CONKLING. Before this question is smothered by the jocose romancing about a caucus of the honorable Senator from Indiana, I wish to make one comment upon the passage from Jefferson's Manual which the Chair caused to be read. I submit humbly without arguing that it has nothing in the world to do with this question; that it does not come, if I may use the expression, within two rows of apple-trees of the point here at all. What is the effect of this language in Jefferson's Manual? That an amendment may be made inconsistent with one already agreed to, an amendment which totally alters the effect. Certainly; as for example if you adopt an amendment saying that a certain sum of money shall be paid, you may move to amend by inserting the word "not" and make it mean precisely the contrary, that it shall not be paid; and so on. You may totally displace and reverse the effect of an amendment by another amendment. But is that to the effect that when you are legislating upon a bill touching one subject it is in order to introduce into that bill all other subjects in the heavens above and in the earth beneath and in the water under the earth? Not at all. As the author of this commentary remarks, the fact that an amendment reverses the action of the House is good reason why the House should vote it down, but no reason why the Chair should exclude it on grounds of order. But can anybody doubt that nothing in parliamentary law is older than the distinction between what is germane and what is otherwise? Why is that a familiar distinction to everybody who has ever read the first chapter of parliamentary law always used, as the honorable Senator from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL] reminds me, in the House, always used in the British Parliament, and understood in the common councils of cities, in boards of supervisors, in the smallest and most insignificant theaters in which questions of parliamentary law are tried; and now we are to be told that because the Senate of the United States has not made a rule against it, as it has not against indecent conduct in this Chamber, and a variety of other more excessive things, therefore we are to wink so hard as not to see the old time, the immemorial and obvious distinctions of parliamentary law which lie deep down in the foundations of parliamentary proceeding.

Sir, I shall vote that this motion is out of order, regardless entirely of my opinion upon the tenure-of-office act, because I believe it to be out of order and because I foresee that as we have just escaped in one instance the destruction of an appropriation bill by the introduction of one subject comparatively foreign to it which led to a long debate, so we are to proceed now to a mooted question, destined of course to be debated on one side and on the other, when our business is to go forward in the remaining hours of this session and consummate the necessary appropriation bills.

Mr. HOWARD. Allow me to say one word, sir. This is an appropriation bill, purely such, to defray the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government. Its object is to apply money to the public service for the purpose of carrying it on. This amendment which is offered by the honorable Senator from Indiana simply, solely asks for the repeal of an existing statute of the United States which has not the remotest connection with appropriations of money to carry on the Government. I am not a very learned parliamentarian; but I have always understood it to be the rule of parliamentary law, one of its fundamental principles, that where a proposition is made by way of amendment which is totally foreign from the subject under discussion embraced in the bill before the House it is out of order; it is a subject upon which the House are not acting; it is not before them probably; and it tends only to create confusion in our legislative proceedings. Why, sir, you might as well tack on upon an ordinary appropriation bill, you might as well add to the bill now before you a proposition to declare war against a foreign country.

Mr. SHERMAN. That would be in order,

Mr. HOWARD. The Senator from Ohio says that would be in order. Certainly not. It would not be in order, because it is not in any way connected with the subject-matter of the bill before us; in other words, it is not germane. It is totally foreign to the subject before us. Certainly the Senate and the House of Representatives ought to be governed by rules as sensible, at least, as those which prevail in a boys' debating society in a school district; and I apprehend that a proposition like this, even before such an august assembly, would receive its quietus very soon. I say nothing now about the propriety of repealing the tenure-of-office act; that is not now under discussion; but what I insist upon is that this amendment to repeal the tenure-of-office act is not in order at this stage of this appropriation bill.

Mr. SHERMAN. It is scarcely worth while debating so clear a proposition as that this is not a point of order. It is a question of propriety. It is a question whether you will or will not attach to an appropriation bill a doubtful measure in the view of some Senators. I could give Senators many histories in our legislation where propositions of this kind much more incongruous than this have been attached to appropriation bills. The Wilmot proviso was attached to an appropriation bill, and nobody thought of raising a point of order even against that. So with many other cases. Our books are full of limitations, qualifications, legislation of all kinds on appropriation bills.

Mr. HOWARD. May I ask the Senator if that appropriation bill was not appropriating money for carrying on the business of the Territories as to which the Wilmot proviso applied directly?

Mr. SHERMAN. No, sir; it was an Army appropriation bill. I remember, too, that I myself moved in the House of Representatives, some years ago, a proposition that no money should be taken from the Treasury of the United States to enforce the territorial laws of Kansas, and it was put on the Army appropriation bill, and nobody thought of raising a question of order. It is true that as a question of propriety, of propriety of legislation to be decided by a majority of the Senate, it is a question that appeals to the judgment of every Senator whether he will put a disputed proposition on an appropriation bill. On the point of order the President of the Senate is clearly right; and no one, it seems to me, could in accordance with the practice of the Senate vote to overrule his decision when every precedent sustains it.

Mr. DRAKE. I thought I would look into the volume of the statutes of Congress to see how they spoke in reference to this question of order; and I find in the legislative appropriation bill of March 2, 1867, as section three, the following:

"And be it further enacted, That the Secretary of War is hereby authorized to direct a geological and topographical exploration of the Territory between the Rocky mountains and the Sierra Nevada mountains, including the route or routes of the Pacific railroad."

I think if that could be passed in 1867 this section now offered can be passed without violating the rules of congruity.

Mr. CONKLING. Was the point of order raised?

Mr. DRAKE. I do not know. It ought to have been if it could be.

Mr. CONKLING. If the point of order was not raised it does not show anything. We have put on this very bill by consent matters not germane to it. The question is how the point was decided when raised.

Mr. POMEROY. There can be but one objection in the Senate as to the propriety of putting on an appropriation bill things that do not belong to it. We have had a good deal of experience of that; but when it comes to a question of parliamentary law, and we have got to decide that question, we have no strict rule of interpretation that will prohibit it. We have made provision in this act for the payment of these civil officers for the year beginning 1st of July, 1869. This amendment relates to those particular officers among others; and while it may be very improper to do it as retarding the passage of an appropriation bill still it is strictly in harmony with parliamentary law to put it on, in my opinion. I remember some years ago when we passed a tax bill here, and I presume other Senators recollect it, the Senator from Ohio moved as an amendment a proposition to distribute the banking capital of the country among the States. The banking capital of this country was distributed among the States, to the ruin as I thought of the western and southern States, by an amendment to a tax bill.

Mr. SHERMAN. I did not move it.

Mr. POMEROY. I do not know that the Senator from Ohio moved it, but he had charge of the bill. The division of the banking capital of the United States did not belong to the tax bill, but it was put on the tax bill and was not at all germane to it.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. The subject is included in the original act in the tax bill.

Mr. POMEROY. I think when we get back to the old practice of the Senate, which was to put nothing on appropriation bills that did not relate to appropriating money for the current year, we shall be nearer the correct usage in legislation.

But I want to say one thing more. I am sorry the provision is to go on this bill on one account, because it will not go into effect until the 1st of July, 1869. My friend from Indiana wants to have it go into effect right off. He wants this repealing law to go into effect immediately, I take it; but if it be put on this bill it will not go into effect until the 1st of July, 1869. So we are to have this law upon us, even if it should be repealed by this amendment, until the 1st of July, 1869.

Mr. HOWARD. The Senator from Kansas will allow me one word. I dislike very much to be the occasion of wasting the time of the Senate in this way, and my friends about me suggest that I had better withdraw my appeal. I will do so; but I maintain that I entertain the same conviction.

Mr. POMEROY. I was only going to remark in addition that when I voted for the tenure-of-office act I said I wanted to do it to bridge over the administration of President Johnson. We have got so near through now that I think at the opening of the next Administration we can well afford to repeal it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Michigan withdraws his appeal. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Indiana, on which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

Mr. SUMNER. I send an amendment to the amendment to the Chair, to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert other words.

The words proposed to be inserted were read, as follows:

That the first section of the act entitled "An act regulating the tenure of certain civil offices," passed March 2, 1867, is hereby amended so as to read as follows: That every person holding any civil office to which he has been appointed by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, and every person who shall hereafter be appointed to any such office and shall become duly qualified to act therein, is and shall be entitled to hold such office until a successor shall have been in like manner appointed and duly qualified, except as herein otherwise provided.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That the second section of said act is hereby amended so as to read as follows: That it shall be lawful for the President, whenever during a recess of the Senate in his opinion the public good shall require it, to suspend any officer appointed as aforesaid, excepting judges of the United States courts, and to designate some suitable person to perform temporarily the duties of such office until the next meeting of the Senate, and until the matter shall be acted upon by the Senate; and such person so designated shall take the oaths and give the bonds required by law to be taken and given by the person duly appointed to fill such office; and in case of such suspension it shall be the duty of the President, within twenty days after the first day of such meeting of the Senate, to report to the Senate such suspension, with the name of the person so designated to perform the duties of such office; and if the Senate shall concur in such suspension, and advise and consent to the removal of such officer, they shall so certify to the President, who may thereupon remove such officer, and by and with the advice and consent of the Senate appoint another person to such office; but if the Senate shall refuse to concur in such suspension the officer so suspended shall forthwith resume the functions of his office, and the powers of the person so performing its duties in his stead shall cease; and the official salary and emoluments of such officer shall during such suspension belong to the person so performing the duties thereof, and not to the officer so suspended; Provided, however, That the President may, in his discretion, before reporting such suspension to the Senate as above provided, revoke the same and reinstate such officer in the performance of the duties of his office.

Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That no person shall hold nor shall he receive salary or compensation for performing the duties of more than one office or place of trust or profit under the Constitution or laws of the United States at the same time, whether such office or place be civil, military, or naval; and any person holding any such office or place who shall accept or hold any other office or place of trust or profit under the Constitution or laws of the United States shall be deemed to have vacated the office or place which he held at the time of such acceptance.

Sec. 4. And be it further enacted, That nothing in the foregoing section shall be construed to prevent such designations or appointments of officers to perform temporarily the duties of other officers as are or may be authorized by law, nor to prevent such appointments or designations to office or duty as are required by law to be made from the Army or Navy.

Sec. 5. And be it further enacted, That the penalties provided in the act to which this is an amendment shall apply to violations of this act.

Mr. GRIMES. I call for the yeas and nays on that substitute.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Mr. President, I am one of those who believe that the tenure-of-office act should either be repealed or essentially modified and changed, but I am also one of those who believe it the duty of the Senate to pass the ordinary appropriation bills for the support of the Government, and I believe it is entirely inappropriate and out of place and wrong to attempt to put these measures upon appropriation bills which must be passed in order to carry on the Government. I regret exceedingly that members of the Senate should insist upon putting on the appropriation bills controverted questions of this character at this stage of the session, when it is impossible to consider them, and when it must be apparent to all reflecting persons that the effect of offering these amendments is to defeat the ordinary appropriations and make a protracted session of Congress necessary after the 4th of March, reaching probably until midsummer, in order to pass the necessary appropriation bills which then will be discussed, there being no limit to our session, at the commencement of the incoming Administration, before its policy can be fixed, before the gentlemen at the head of Departments can understand them and indicate the policy which they believe it wise to pursue. For the Senate, by persisting in putting upon appropriation bills matters that do not belong to them, to force such a result upon the next Administration and the country I believe to be disastrous to the public interests, and for one I shall vote against this proposition; and I hope that Senators without regard to the measures that are proposed, whether they are right or wrong upon their intrinsic merits, will vote against them when offered as amendments on appropriation bills to which they do not belong.

Mr. GRIMES. I call for the yeas and nays on the amendment to the amendment.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. HENDRICKS (when his name was called) said: The Senator from Illinois [Mr. YATES] was called home by sickness, and I agreed to pair with him on any question of a political character. I am not sure how he would vote on this question, but my impression is he would vote with his party; and therefore I do not feel authorized to vote upon it, and consider myself paired with him.

Mr. STEWART (after having voted in the affirmative) said: I was paired with the Senator from Maine, [Mr. FESSENDEN,] but I forgot it at the moment my name was called, and I should like to withdraw my vote. He was in favor of universal repeal and I am opposed to it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection the Senator's vote will be withdrawn.

The result was announced—yeas 17, nays 32; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Chandler, Conkling, Cragin, Harlan, Harris, Howard, Howe, Morrill of Maine, Morrill of Vermont, Patterson of New Hampshire, Ramsey, Sawyer, Sprague, Sumner, Welch, Willey, and Williams—17.

NAYS—Messrs. Abbott, Cameron, Cattell, Cole, Conness, Corbett, Dixon, Drake, Ferry, Frelinghuysen, Grimes, Henderson, McDonald, Morgan, Morton, Nye, Osborn, Pomeroy, Pool, Robertson, Ross, Sherman, Spencer, Thayer, Tipton, Trumbull, Van Winkle, Vickers, Wade, Warner, Whyte, and Wilson—32.

ABSENT—Messrs. Anthony, Bayard, Buckalew, Davis, Doolittle, Edmunds, Fessenden, Fowler, Hendricks, Kellogg, McCreery, Norton, Patterson of Tennessee, Rice, Saulsbury, Stewart, and Yates—17.

So the amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question recurs on the amendment offered by the Senator from Indiana, [Mr. MORRIS,] on which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

Mr. HOWARD. I proposed to say something upon that amendment; but on the suggestion of others I suspend my remarks until we get into the Senate.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. STEWART. I am paired with the Senator from Maine, [Mr. FESSENDEN.]

Mr. CAMERON. I vote "nay;" but I feel very awkward about it. I am in favor of the repeal, but I vote against putting it on this bill.

Mr. CONKLING, (after having voted in the negative.) I wish to make a statement of a word. It escaped me entirely that the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. DOOLITTLE] came to me some time ago with rather a vague hint which I did not at the time understand—I see what it meant now, as this doubtless has been understood on one side—saying that a member of his family was ill and he wished to go away, and if he was not here on the final vote on this question he should like to consider himself paired. Although it was qualified somewhat, very likely he considers it a pair, and I therefore ask to withdraw my vote.

Mr. POMEROY. I supposed that I was paired with that Senator.

Mr. CONKLING. Then I inquire of the Senator from Kansas whether he withheld his vote under that supposition?

Mr. POMEROY. I did, because I felt embarrassed about it.

Mr. CONKLING. Certainly we ought not to be both paired with the same Senator. The Senator from Wisconsin did not disclose to me that he had made the request of any one else.

Mr. POMEROY. Then I will vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. CONKLING. That will not do. The Senator votes now on the same side as the Senator from Wisconsin. [Laughter.]

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from New York withdraw his vote?

Mr. CONKLING. Yes, sir; I prefer not to run any risk.

The result was announced—yeas 22, nays 26; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Cole, Conness, Dixon, Drake, Grimes, Henderson, Kellogg, McDonald, Morgan, Morton, Osborn, Pomeroy, Pool, Ramsey, Robertson, Ross, Sherman, Thayer, Van Winkle, Vickers, Warner, and Whyte—22.

NAYS—Messrs. Abbott, Anthony, Cameron, Chandler, Corbett, Cragin, Ferry, Frelinghuysen, Harlan, Harris, Howard, Howe, Morrill of Maine, Morrill of Vermont, Patterson of New Hampshire, Sawyer, Spencer, Sprague, Sumner, Tipton, Trumbull, Wade, Welch, Willey, Williams, and Wilson—26.

ABSENT—Messrs. Bayard, Buckalew, Cattell, Conkling, Davis, Doolittle, Edmunds, Fessenden, Fowler, Hendricks, McCreery, Norton, Nye, Patterson of Tennessee, Rice, Saulsbury, Stewart, and Yates—18.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. WILSON. I offer the following amendment as an additional section:

And be it further enacted, That the heads of the several Executive Departments be, and they are hereby, directed to report at the opening of the session of Congress beginning on the first Monday of December next the number of clerks in their several Departments, and what reduction, if any, can be made in the number of clerks in each grade.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CAMERON. I desire to offer an amendment from the Committee on Agriculture. It is to insert after line ten hundred and sixty-three the words "one watchman, $1,000." In offering this amendment I desire to say that the Commissioner informs me that an additional watchman is necessary for the agricultural building, and that in consequence of the need of a watchman he has been compelled to occupy a part of the upper story of the building himself. He has done so for the purpose of protecting the property, and unless you give him this additional watchman he will be compelled to remain there. I hope therefore that the amendment will be adopted.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SPRAGUE. I offer an amendment, to insert on page 22, after line five hundred and thirty-six, the following:

Provided, That after the passage of this act the proprietors of all bonded warehouses shall reimburse to the United States the expenses and salary of all storekeepers or other officers in charge of such warehouses; and the same shall be paid into the Treasury and accounted for like other public moneys.

I have consulted with members in relation to this amendment and it is all right. It comes from the Department.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I offer an amendment, to strike out on page 4, from line seventy-four to line eighty-three, the following words:

For one captain, $2,083; two lieutenants at $1,800 each; thirty privates at $1,584 each; twelve watchmen at $1,000 each; making in all $65,160, one half to be paid into the contingent fund of the House of Representatives and the other half to be paid into the contingent fund of the Senate.

And to insert in lieu thereof:

For one captain of police, $1,600; one lieutenant, $1,200; and twenty policemen and watchmen at $900 each, making in all $20,800.

Mr. President, I shall detain the Senate but a moment on this amendment. At this time I perceive by this bill that to guard this Capitol we are paying a captain of police above two thousand dollars; two lieutenants $1,800 each; thirty privates $1,584 each; twelve watchmen $1,000 each—making in all about forty-five persons employed as a guard of the Capitol building at an expense of $64,000. It is absurd to suppose that the expenditure of $64,000 is necessary to protect this Capitol. I do not believe the half of it is necessary, therefore I have proposed the amendment which has been read. It gives a force of about twenty-two men to guard one building, with reasonable compensation. These persons employed about the Capitol are watchmen; it is simply their business to see that the Capitol is protected. It does not require high qualities, except the quality of honesty. That, no doubt, ought to be well paid for in these times. But the proposition that I submit as an amendment gives a very ample compensation, and as I propose it, the expenses will be about twenty-two thousand dollars instead of $65,000. I believe that we can just as well save this $40,000 as not. This amendment was suggested at the last session of Congress, but it was objected to by the chairman, because existing laws regulated the number of persons to be employed and the rates of their salaries, and it was suggested by him at that time that the retrenchment and economy ought to be introduced by a bill amending the act under which these persons are employed; but no such steps have been taken: no bill for that purpose has been introduced by his committee or by any other. Now, I do not see any other way of correcting this great abuse than by the amendment which I have suggested. I believe the amendment gives ample force and a sufficient compensation, and that it ought to be adopted.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I hope we shall not enter at this late hour upon the work of reforming the service. I suggest to the Senator from Indiana that if we once enter upon that there is no end to an appropriation bill. This force was reorganized only two or three years ago by a joint committee of both Houses, and I think it would be unwise for us to undertake to put this amendment on an appropriation bill. I think it not unlikely that I did say last year that this proposition ought to be considered by an appropriate committee if it was desirable to consider it at all; and I understand that a joint committee of both Houses has been instructed to reorganize the entire force of both branches of Congress. I do not wish to extend remarks upon it, because I am extremely anxious to bring this bill to a conclusion. I hope, therefore, that we shall get a vote upon it without debate, and that it will not be agreed to.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. ABBOTT. On page 46, line eleven hundred and thirty, I move to strike out "$1,000" and insert "$2,000;" so that the clause will read:

For the care and preservation of the branch mint buildings, machinery, and materials, at Charlotte, North Carolina, including $500 for necessary repairs, $2,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I wish to inquire of the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations if it was not understood at the last session that the bureau of education was to be continued only until the book which has been placed on our desks should be published. I see that a provision is made on the twenty-fourth page of this bill for the continuation of the Department of Education. I think when the bill was up at the last session it was claimed that the Commissioner ought to be continued in his office, with sufficient clerical force, until he could complete the preparation of this book, which is now just out; and that when it was completed the appropriation for the maintenance of that Department ought to cease. But I suppose now it is to become a permanent institution if this appropriation shall be made. For the purpose of testing the judgment of the Senate upon that question I move to strike out from line five hundred and seventy-one to line five hundred and seventy-five, on the twenty-fourth page.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The words proposed to be stricken out will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

Office of Education:
For Commissioner of Education, $3,000.
For two clerks of class one, $2,400.
For contingent expenses, $600; in all, $6,000.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I did not know what the Senator was driving at. I will say to him that he is mistaken in supposing that the law providing for a bureau of education was repealed. It was modified so that the bureau, or Department, as I think it is called, was transferred to the Interior Department with two clerks. It may be that they ought to be appointed by the Secretary of the Interior; but they are provided for by law, both the Commissioner of Education and the clerks. The Senator will find if he looks at the statutes a provision, which was put upon an appropriation bill, that the Department was simply modified and not repealed. I hope, therefore, the Senator will see that it is a proper thing to make the appropriation unless we choose to repeal the law.

Mr. HENDRICKS. It seems that the only way we can get at matters of this sort is to reduce the appropriation. The proposition to repeal is not brought forward in any independent way; but each session the appropriation is made for the continuance of the Department.

Now, Mr. President, what is to be accomplished by this Department of Education? I do not yield to any Senator that he has a higher appreciation of the importance of general education in the country than I have. I would desire to foster and encourage education in the country in every way. But I do not believe that it is one of the purposes of the General Government to take charge of the educational interests of the country. I do not believe that it is within the constitutional powers of the Government; and further than that, I do not believe that the Government of the United States can successfully and advantageously to the cause of education itself take charge of that interest. The States have their own systems of education, and I believe very good systems. In the State of Indiana we have a system to some extent borrowed from the eastern States, and I believe it to be a very successful system, improving, of course, each year.

Now, what is proposed to be accomplished by this bureau or Department of Education? That bureau has no means of coming in direct contact with the school systems in the States. All that it can accomplish is to compile for publication books such as the one we have now upon our tables, just published, a large volume, costing a great deal of money, costing so much money that I suppose no private publishing house would undertake its publication with a view to profits out of the sale of it. This is rather an extraordinary looking book. Of course I have not had an opportunity to examine it with any degree of care, but as far as I have examined it it is a book rather easily made. It is a compilation, a gathering together of old things, and I should judge of no great importance to the cause of education. I should not think it equal, as far as I am able to judge, to the works on the subject of education published by the States. I think that our department of education in Indiana is very much superior to this bureau at Washington, if I am to judge by this book. Here, in the first part of the book, is a speech covering a number of pages, a speech made in the House of Representatives, a speech already published in the Globe. If that speech were not buried in that tomb of learning it certainly is completely and forever buried in this volume. But, sir, it seems to me it is not necessary to keep up a bureau of education to publish annually books made up of compilations simply, a part of which is speeches in the House of Representatives. I would not question that this is a very excellent speech. It may be a better document on the subject of education than the Commissioner himself would be able to produce, but still it is not the kind of original matter that we ought to publish a second time.

Mr. SHERMAN. Whose speech is it?

Mr. HENDRICKS. Mr. GARFIELD'S. Then further over I find about one hundred pages made up of plates of school-houses. When I first opened it I thought it was on the style of the report of the Commissioner of Agriculture. You know a part of that volume each year is made up of pictures of horses, sheep, and cattle, and it is a very pleasing thing to turn from one fine blood to another and contemplate their beauty. It also has pictures of apples and pears and the like. This book is gotten up on the same style. There are over one hundred pages of plates representing school-houses, colleges, buildings for normal schools; but I do not observe one that is suitable for the ordinary purposes of a school-house. This man undertakes the work of architecture.

Mr. ANTHONY. If the Senator from Indiana will allow me, I can explain some portion of what he complains of in that report.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I shall be very happy to hear it.

Mr. ANTHONY. Those plates and a large amount of the matter of which the Senator complains are furnished by the Commissioner without any expense to the Government, furnished from stereotyped plates of his own, and the engravings also, I think. I may not be literally correct, but I do not think the Government has spent a dollar for the engravings in that publication.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Does the Senator expect that that system will be continued; that the illustrations to be found in the volumes hereafter published shall be at the expense of the Commissioner?

Mr. ANTHONY. I should be very happy to have that system adopted for all the Departments. If the heads of bureaus were to furnish their own engravings and print their own documents it would be a very great economy to the Government.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Yes, Mr. President, it would save a great many hundreds of thousands of dollars in printing.

Mr. ANTHONY. I merely wished to explain that a much greater latitude might be allowed to the head of a bureau in publishing a report, if he published it without expense to the Government, than if he published it entirely at the expense of the Government. I say that rather in justification of the printing part of the document.

Mr. HENDRICKS. If the Senator will allow me I wish to ask him a question. As I looked over these pictures I supposed that the head of the bureau or Department here had simply borrowed from the States the plates that had been used to illustrate their styles of school architecture. Is not that the fact?

Mr. ANTHONY. I think not. The Commissioner of Education has devoted his life to that subject, and is undoubtedly one of the ablest, one of the most accomplished, and best-informed educators living; and this book embodies a large amount of the results of his studies and his experience. It is a book which is more of a treatise and less of a report than ought to be printed by the Government, unless, as was the case with the more expensive portion of it, it were printed at the cost of the Commissioner himself.

Mr. SPRAGUE. Who paid for the paper?

Mr. ANTHONY. The Government paid for the paper, and we furnished the type for a large amount of it, and the stereotyping.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I think the Senator is mistaken about this. I do not think these are new plates gotten up for this work.

Mr. ANTHONY. They are not new plates gotten up; they are old plates.

Mr. HENDRICKS. It seems to me I have seen these pictures before.

Mr. ANTHONY. Certainly; that is what I said.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I am not going to debate the question of the personal excellence or the attainments of the Commissioner of Education. He may be all that the Senator from Rhode Island claims for him; but this book will not do to put very much money in, in my judgment, if we consult the good of the people and the cause of education. It is not worth publishing so far as I can judge from a hasty examination of it. It is not worth publishing when it is made up of newspaper articles and speeches delivered in Congress and plates taken from old publications. We ought not to have one hundred pages of such plates as those. I understood at the last session of Congress that the purpose was to continue this gentleman in office until he could get his great book out, and then that he would not care anything more about it. We had better leave the cause of education where it is, with the States. I know that the States of the Northwest are going on with great rapidity and success in the cause of education, and they are not looking to Washington; and if they did look to Washington and only every two or three years got a book of this sort as a return for their hopes in that direction they would not get much. I do not believe that the bureau which is now being established will be of such service to the cause of education as to justify the expenditure of money. It is simply a book-making Department, and we have more books now published at the public expense than we ought to have.

Mr. CONNESS. There is not a clerk in the country who could not get it up for one tenth of the money it has cost.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I have no doubt about that. It has not the dignity of an original book. It is a compilation and collection together of scraps; I will not say scraps; I take that back, because there is a speech in there from a member of Congress, and of course that is not scraps; but it is a collection together of floating matter. I did not understand that to be the purpose of the establishment of this bureau. We have got to put an end to it now, or it becomes a permanent bureau. It is a growing thing. Pass this period, and let him commence another book, and the argument will be that that must be finished also. If I thought this institution was useful to the cause of education I would not object to it, except upon the ground that the Government of the United States has no proper connection with that business.

Mr. ANTHONY. I do not stand here to defend the publication of treatises upon any subject. I think that the head of a Department or bureau should make a report of the operations of his Department or bureau during the year.

Mr. CONNESS. It would be a very small book.

Mr. ANTHONY. It would be; and that is all we ought to have. I do not believe that we ought to have treatises here on political economy or upon international law or upon science.

Mr. GRIMES. Why should we not?

Mr. ANTHONY. I do not think we ought to have them at the expense of the Government. But of the class of books of that kind I think the one which my friend from Indiana has denounced so severely, and evidently has examined so cursorily, is one of the best we have had. I think that book contains more information upon the subject of education than will be found between the covers of almost any book that has been published. I do not say that, in my judgment, the Government ought to go to the expense of publishing books because they are good books. I do not think we ought to publish any books, good or bad, or anything except what is sufficient to give the country information on the operations of the Government for the past year. But I do not like to hear that book traduced so by my friend from Indiana, who evidently has not read anything in it, for I think he does it very great injustice. It is a very valuable work on education which might well have been printed at the expense of any State or of any educational society.

Mr. DIXON. Mr. President, the appropriation for the support of the bureau of education in this bill is only $6,000. I do not know how much the entire bill appropriates for all purposes; but it is an enormous amount, of which the sum of $6,000 is appropriated for the bureau of education. It does not seem to me that this is an extravagant amount. I do not know whether it is the purpose and design of the Senate to continue this bureau. It has been established by law. The officer has been appointed. The policy has been established, as I suppose; at least, the sense of both Houses of Congress has been expressed in the enactment of a law on the subject; and now it is proposed to appropriate the sum which I have mentioned, $6,000, for the great cause of education.

The principal objection made to it by the Senator from Indiana is the character of the report of the Commissioner, and he has exhausted his powers of ridicule and sarcasm, which are certainly very great as we all know, upon this very innocent and, in my judgment, very useful publication. I must confess that I had supposed it a meritorious work. I had examined it with considerable care. I had found in it the proofs of very great labor, of very great investigation, of very great research, of very great knowledge; the product, in fact, of a life spent in the cause of education. It may not all be precisely original. I do not know that it is necessary that on the subject of education every word published should be a word that never was published before; that the Commissioner should at all times and on all occasions say that which had never been said before. There may be some old truths in this book; there may be truisms in it. It would be difficult to publish a book of this size on this subject which should be entirely original. I will not take up the time of the Senate by reading the table of contents. Here, it is true, is the speech of Mr. GARFIELD, of Ohio, in the House of Representatives, upon the publication of which, not upon the speech itself, the Senator pours out a torrent of ridicule. As a general rule, I should say that it was not best to publish in a report of this sort speeches that are published in the Globe; but this was an exception. This was a speech in which the subject of establishing the bureau was considered, and Mr. Barnard thought it proper to publish it in his report. It may be a matter of somewhat doubtful propriety, because somewhat doubtful as a question of taste, whether it is well to publish the speech of a member of Congress in this way; but it was certainly a very able speech, a speech which reflected great honor upon the distinguished member who made it, and a speech which elucidated and illustrated the question upon which he was speaking, and Mr. Barnard, it seems, thought it would be useful to publish it in his report. But, sir, aside from that, I do not find anything in it which is not extremely useful.

Now, with regard to these pictures. The Senator has objected because one hundred pages of this book have been devoted to illustrations.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I beg the Senator to allow us to take the vote.

Mr. DIXON. I will not take up time; but I feel it my duty, knowing as I do the Commissioner, to say that he has published a report of very great value.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I am sorry that the Senator from Indiana should signalize the last hours of his service in the body of which he has been so distinguished a member by an attack upon this bureau in order to save $6,000, when only this afternoon he voted for an expenditure of $300,000 without wincing at it at all.

Now, Mr. President, in relation to this matter, I suppose it is intended to have something of this to continue, and it matters not whether the party now in the office is a fit person to fill the place or not. He certainly is a man of distinguished abilities and acquirements, who has spent a whole life on this subject and evinced an enthusiasm that might be copied to advantage by younger men. Instead of striking out the appropriation I should much prefer that the Senate should raise the two clerks of class one to two clerks of class four. Two clerks of class one of course must be the lowest grade, and they are not equal to the duties which they will be called upon to perform. But I suppose such a motion would be ruled out of order, and therefore I shall not make it.

Mr. GRIMES. The Senator from Vermont is chairman of the Committee on Education, and perhaps he can give me some information that I have never yet been able to ascertain; and that is, what is the purpose of this bureau?

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. Why, Mr. President, the Commissioner has been in correspondence with the educated men of the whole country for the last year, and he has had clerks here compiling the laws in relation to education in the several States. If you examine that book you will find some matter there that will be useful for reference for all time.

Mr. GRIMES. When they have got those laws thus compiled what is going to be done with them? Is it proposed that the national Government shall take charge of education in the several States? Does the Committee on Education look to such a consummation as that?

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I do not propose to be drawn into a constitutional argument on this subject.

Mr. GRIMES. It is not a constitutional question.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I have no question that the Commissioner can find something to do that will be useful and valuable to every part of the Union.

Mr. GRIMES. But what does the Committee on Education propose that this bureau shall grow into, or what duty is it to exercise in a national point of view? I can very well see that there is propriety in having some one in charge of the schools in this District, but I should like to know what relation this bureau is to have to education in any State?

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. If the Senator from Iowa finds that they have a better system or have introduced any improvement in relation to the art of teaching, the books used, or the houses constructed for the accommodation of children in other States, I have no doubt he would welcome it in his own; for I believe that when he was Governor of the State of Iowa he was a distinguished advocate of the improvement of the schools in that State.

Mr. GRIMES. But not through any agency of the Government. We took the common school journals; we took the various magazines that were published; and we thus learned at our own expense quite as much as I think we shall be apt to learn by an annual report from the Commissioner of Education located here at the capital of the nation, and at much less expense to ourselves.

Mr. WELCH. I do not think that there are any magazines published in any State by which any one State in the Union can obtain adequate information in regard to education in other States. There are a large number of States in which no educational journals are published at all, and the educational journals that are published by some of the States do not circulate generally in the other States. It needs, it seems to me, some agency, whether it be an agency established by the General Government or not, by which any State can get the light thus shed on the great subject of education by other States of the Union. This appropriation of $6,000 only it seems to me is a very insignificant sum to be appropriated by the General Government to so great a purpose as this. There are very many causes not half so important as the great cause of education to which large sums are appropriated for their advantage and progress. I know, indeed, from the experience that I have had as an educationist, that there are positively no means by which any institution can gain knowledge of the progress of the various interests of education in the other States other than through this agency.

I do not think that this book which has been referred to should be taken by any means as a criterion by which to judge whether this Department is to be continued or not. I cannot see that the matter which is embodied in a single volume published by this Department can be made a proper criterion to judge whether the Department should be continued or not. The Department may be of immense value to the Government and the cause of education through future years, and yet the book be utterly valueless. And so I may say of the man who occupies the office. Although I believe him to be a man of great expression and great enthusiasm upon the subject of education, a man who no doubt fills the office with great honor, still I do not think his success in the conduct of the office should be made any criterion by which to judge of the future value of the office. I take it that the object of that office is to disseminate information in regard to the progress of the different interests of education to each State throughout the whole country, and I think it is a sad thing to hear honorable Senators make objections to such an enterprise as that. Not one of them will have the temerity to say that he is the enemy of education. Indeed, every argument is begun with a declaration of the devotion of the speaker to education, just as an honorable Senator this morning, when he spoke against the payment of labor according to the skill of the laborer, and not according to the sex of the laborer, began by saying that no dollars and cents could measure his devotion to the sex, and yet he was against their being paid according to the value of their labor and made their sex the criterion by which to measure the amount of payment. The cause of education is a great cause. I think it is due to the dignity of this great nation that it should have a department by which information shall be disseminated through all the States as to the progress made in each State in every department of this great subject.

Mr. GRIMES. The reference of the Senator from Florida to the remarks of the Senator who made some objections this morning on the subject of female labor was rather unfortunate, for if I recollect aright that objection was made by the distinguished Senator from Vermont, who is the chairman of our Committee on Education.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. Oh, no.

Mr. WELCH. I beg the Senator's pardon.

Mr. GRIMES. At any rate, he was the gentleman who led the opposition to giving to a woman the same compensation for the same sort of labor and the same amount of labor that was given to a man. Now, Mr. President, the argument of the Senator from Florida amounts to this: that in case educational journals are not taken in a particular section of the country, therefore the Government of the United States should furnish that section with them free; that where there is a want of capacity and a want of inclination or of disposition to elevate or extend or to encourage education in any particular section of the country, we are in duty bound to put the other portions of the country to very great expense in order to force upon that portion of the country educational periodicals, and those only to be annual, like the large volume that is upon our desks. The same argument will apply to all sorts of journals, embracing all sorts of subjects, and the jurisdiction of this Federal Government would be extended into every neighborhood and every family throughout the country. For one, as a representative of one State, I shall always protest against the national Government having anything to do with education in my State. We can take care of ourselves. We have been able to take care of ourselves, and so far as depends upon my vote I am determined that we shall take care of ourselves.

The first thing we shall know this Government will be grasping at our school fund to supply some portion of the country where they are deficient in it. I think we have gone far enough in that direction. Why, sir, we have laid the basis to-day of a veterinary college by an appropriation this evening of $9,000 to pursue investigations on the subject of the cattle disease; the very thing that all the States of the Northwest are investigating now through commissions of scientific and practical men and have been for two years, and yet we are going to establish some sort of a bureau here in connection with the Agricultural Department; and that will be swollen into a great big national veterinary college that will publish a book probably twice as big as that which the Senator from Missouri has in his hands.

Mr. WELCH. The reference of the Senator to the independence of his State from the national Government is rather an unfortunate one. If I understand the honorable Senator, he says his State does not want any help, or does not recognize any dependence upon the national Government. Now, in point of fact, that State has lately received two hundred and forty thousand acres of land for the establishment of an agricultural college, and it is now deriving an income of $30,000 a year for the support of that institution. Now, is it not proper that this Government should look after appropriations of that sort, and look into its own educational offspring in the different States? It seems to me that it would be well for this Government to see that the vast amount of land it has donated for the progress of agricultural and industrial science is so appropriated as to secure the great objects for which it is made; and that is one great purpose for which this Department is established.

Mr. SUMNER. If my voice had not failed me I should deem it my duty to discuss this question at some length. So far from striking out the appropriations for the bureau of education I would increase them. All told now they are but $6,000; for a Commissioner $3,000, for two clerks $2,400, being $1,200 apiece, the lowest grade of clerks. That is all that you give to the bureau of education. Now, turning to the bureau of agriculture, I find numerous clerks, assistants, watchmen, officers of all kinds, with salaries making in all $70,100. Thus much you appropriate to agriculture, while you appropriate only $6,000 to education. Is that right? The Senator from Iowa says that he does not wish this bureau to control education in his State. Does he wish the bureau of agriculture to control agriculture in his State? I presume not; and yet I am not aware that the Senator proposes to abolish the bureau of agriculture. That bureau is at this moment useful to the agricultural interests of the country.

Mr. GRIMES. I will say to the Senator that I will most cheerfully vote to abolish it. If he will give me an opportunity to so vote he will find that I will do so.

Mr. SUMNER. Then the Senator would make a great mistake.

Mr. GRIMES. That is a question of judgment.

Mr. SUMNER. The bureau of agriculture is of infinite value to the country at this moment; and let me say that a bureau of education properly endowed, with a sufficient number of officers and clerks to organize it powerfully, would be more valuable to the country than even any bureau of agriculture.

I should not say even these few words at this late stage of the discussion if I did not feel unwilling that debate on this question should close without bearing at least one word of testimony to the value of this branch of the public service. Sir, I hope that Congress very soon will see its way to enlarge these appropriations. For the present I hope the Senate will vote down the proposition of the Senator from Indiana.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I rise to appeal to the Senate to vote on this proposition and close this bill. The Senator from Iowa, in reply to a suggestion of mine, said there was time enough. I hope my honorable friend will hold to that opinion. Between this and six o'clock to-morrow morning I hope with his effort we shall be able to pass two other bills which it is my purpose to bring before the Senate between that and this time if we can finish this bill.

Mr. GRIMES. Leave out the Massachusetts amendment and we can pass them both.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I hope we shall have a vote on this amendment.

The amendment was rejected.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments made as in Committee of the Whole were concurred in.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills and joint resolutions; and they were thereupon signed by the President pro tempore:

A bill (H. R. No. 112) relating to captures made by Admiral Farragut's fleet in the Mississippi river in May, 1862;

A bill (H. R. No. 425) for the relief of Mary A. Filler;

A bill (H. R. No. 1279) in relation to additional bounties, and for other purposes;

A bill (H. R. No. 1827) to amend an act entitled "An act to exempt certain manufactures from internal tax, and for other purposes," approved March 31, 1868;

A bill (H. R. No. 1314) to confirm certain private land claims in the Territory of New Mexico;

A bill (H. R. No. 1487) to declare and fix the status of judge advocates of the Army;

A bill (H. R. No. 1867) for the relief of the Illinois Iron and Bolt Company;

A bill (H. R. No. 1879) for the relief of certain companies of scouts and guides organized in Alabama;

A bill (H. R. No. 1989) for the relief of Peter McGough, collector of internal revenue and disbursing agent, twentieth district, Pennsylvania;

A bill (H. R. No. 1928) granting a pension to Lemuel Bartholow;

A bill (H. R. No. 1930) granting a pension to Madge K. Guthrie and Robert B. Guthrie;

A bill (H. R. No. 1973) in reference to certifying checks by national banks;

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 211) for the relief of Henry S. Gibbons, Luther McNeal, and Seth M. Gates; and

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 438) relative to certain purchases by the Interior Department.

THOMAS W. PHIPPS.

Mr. RAMSEY submitted the following; which was considered by unanimous consent, and referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate:

Resolved, That there be paid to Thomas W. Phipps from the contingent fund of the Senate his salary as messenger acting assistant doorkeeper of the Senate, from the 1st day of May, 1867, up to the present time, deducting therefrom the amount received by him during that time.

MARY A. DAVIS.

The Senate proceeded to consider the amendment of the House of Representatives to the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 596) granting a pension to Mary A. Davis, widow of William P. Davis, a private in the war of 1861, which was to strike out the word "one" in the third line of the Senate amendment and insert the word "four."

The amendment to the amendment was concurred in.

OREGON MILITARY ROAD.

The Senate proceeded to consider the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. No. 167) granting lands to the State of Oregon to aid in the construction of a military road from the navigable waters of Coos bay to Roseburg, in said State; which were read, as follows:

Insert after the first proviso in page 3, line thirteen, the following:

Provided further, That the grant of lands hereby made shall be upon the condition that the lands shall be sold to any one person only in quantities not greater than one quarter section, and for a price not exceeding $2 50 per acre.

Insert at the end of section five the following words:

Provided, however, The entire amount of public lands granted by this act shall not exceed three sections per mile for each mile actually constructed.

The amendments were concurred in.

PREVENTION OF REVENUE FRAUDS.

The Senate proceeded to consider its amendments to the bill (H. R. No. 375) to repeal an act approved March 2, 1867, entitled "An act to regulate the disposition of fines, penalties, and forfeitures received under the laws relating to the customs, and for other purposes," and to amend certain acts for the prevention and punishment of frauds on the revenue and for the prevention of smuggling, disagreed to by the House.

On motion by Mr. MORRILL, of Maine, it was

Resolved, That the Senate insist upon its amendments to the said bill disagreed to by the House of Representatives, and agree to the conference asked by the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

Ordered, That the conferees on the part of the Senate be appointed by the President pro tempore.

SYMPATHY WITH SPAIN.

The Senate proceeded to consider the amendment of the House of Representatives to the joint resolution (S. R. No. 178) tendering sympathy to the people of Spain.

The Secretary read the amendment, which was to strike out all after the resolving clause of the resolution and to insert:

That the people of the United States sympathize with the patriotic people of Spain in their efforts to establish the liberties of the Spanish nation.

Sec. 2. And be it further resolved, That the people of the United States sympathize with the people of Cuba in their efforts to secure political independence, and that they will welcome to the family of independent nations any Government that guarantees liberty to all men and recognizes the principle of the absolute sovereignty of the people.

Sec. 3. And be it further resolved, That the President is hereby authorized to recognize the independence of Cuba whenever in his opinion a republican form of government shall have been established.

The House proposed also to amend the title of the joint resolution by adding the words "and Cuba."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on concurring in the amendment made by the House of Representatives.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I move that it be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations. The motion was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CLINTON LLOYD, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had passed the following bills of the Senate:

A bill (S. No. 264) for the relief of Henry C. Noyes;

A bill (S. No. 661) for the relief of Lieutenant Colonel John W. Davidson, of the United States Army;

A bill (S. No. 679) to amend an act entitled "An act granting lands to the State of Oregon to aid in the construction of a military road from Oregon City to the eastern boundary of said State;

A bill (S. No. 705) further to provide for giving effect to treaty stipulations between this and foreign Governments for the extradition of criminals;

A bill (S. No. 760) for the relief of Rev. D. Hillhouse Buel;

A bill (S. No. 781) for the relief of Alpheus C. Gallahue;

A bill (S. No. 844) for the relief of Captain Charles Hunter, United States Navy; and

A bill (S. No. 862) amendatory of the act providing for the sale of the arsenal grounds at St. Louis and Liberty, Missouri, and for other purposes, approved July 25, 1868.

POST OFFICE APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 1808) making appropriations for the service of the Post Office Department during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1870.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The Secretary proceeded to read the bill; but was interrupted by Mr. WARNER. With the consent of the Senator from Maine, I ask the unanimous consent of the Senate to take up Senate bill No. 890. I will state that it is the first measure to which I have asked the attention of the Senate at this session; but it is one of importance to our State, and of pressing importance to be passed now, because at the next session of Congress Alabama will have no representation in the other House.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. (Mr. CONNESS in the chair.) The Senator is not in order at present pending the reading of the bill. The Secretary will continue the reading.

The Secretary resumed and concluded the reading of the bill.

Mr. WARNER. I now ask the consent of the Senate, with the permission of the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, to take up Senate bill No. 890. It is a very important bill and the only one to which I have asked the attention of the Senate this winter.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there any objection to the bill proposed to be taken up by the Senator from Alabama?

Mr. WARNER. I will state that on the 4th of March Alabama will have no Representatives in the other House, and consequently it is important that it should be attended to now. I move to take up Senate bill No. 890, renewing a grant of lands to a railroad in Alabama—a grant made before the war. It is a simple renewal of the grant in the very words of the old law. The road is very important to our people in every way. I move to take up the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It can only be done by unanimous consent. Is there any objection?

Mr. HOWARD. It is objected to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection being made, the motion cannot be entertained.

Mr. RAMSEY. I inquire of the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations whether he has any amendment to propose to this bill from that committee?

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. No, sir; the committee propose none.

Mr. RAMSEY. Then I move to amend the bill by striking out the proviso in the twelfth and thirteenth lines, in these words:

Provided, That no part of said sum shall be paid for inland transportation between Fort Abercrombie and Helena.

Mr. President, in my judgment this is a very unfair, unreasonable, and odious discrimination against this mail route. At present we have a tri-weekly mail carried from St. Paul and from our northern towns on the Mississippi river to Fort Abercrombie; and again upon the other side from Helena to Walla-Walla there is a tri-weekly mail carried. To make this link comport with the service both east and west the act of about six months ago was passed. The business is increasing, the settlements are pressing east and west, and there is necessity for this particular kind of service. The other mail service upon the central route is some five or six hundred miles south of this; and surely an American Congress will not say that the whole service between the East and West upon this continent is to be confined to one line. It might be suspected that this proviso was owing to the selfishness of the central line of railroad wishing to accumulate upon its line all the mail transportation upon this continent, instead of allowing those great and growing and prosperous northern regions of the country to be served upon their own line from the States from which most of their people have come, and where much of the travel is, seeking to divert it all to that central line. I hope the Senate will repudiate this odious discrimination upon the part of the House of Representatives, and will strike out the proviso.

Sir, already population is rapidly spreading toward the Red River valley. As I said, we have a mail service three times a week up to Fort Abercrombie. Farmers have settled through the whole Sauk valley, stretching from the Mississippi to that point. It is a thickly settled country. Again, upon the other side, along the valley of the Missouri, settlements are growing and extending every year. The distance from Fort Abercrombie to the bend of the Missouri river is only about three hundred and fifty miles; and within the next year the railroad system of Minnesota will extend to the Red river. Contracts have been entered into looking to the completion of our railroad system to that point.

Now, Mr. President, this kind of service is not nearly so much in advance of the growth of this region of country as was the service upon the central route when that was entered upon. I think it is an odious and unfair discrimination to select this route from all the routes of the country, and say that no service shall be placed upon it, especially as the Congress of the United States, after solemnly considering the subject, passed a law six months ago ordering the service upon that route. The proposition to discontinue it is either owing to the disposition of the central railroad line to accumulate, as I said, all the business upon its route, or it is owing probably to some contractor who was caught in his bid and who now desires to avoid executing his contract by this kind of legislation. I hope that the Senate will not consent to anything of the kind, but will agree to my amendment and strike out this proviso.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I will say one word on this subject. It seems by a resolution passed in 1868 that a mail route was provided for, and the Postmaster General was authorized to make a contract for the mail service between these two points, some three or four hundred miles or more. The Postmaster General reports that the thing is utterly impracticable; that he cannot carry the mail.

Mr. RAMSEY. No, sir.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. That is the report, that he has made a contract which cannot be executed.

Mr. RAMSEY. Where is there such a report, I would ask the Senator?

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. In the report of the Postmaster General.

Mr. RAMSEY. You will find nothing of the kind. The Senator is entirely mistaken. He has misread the report. It has reference to a contract previously made for carrying it upon horseback simply.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I have reference to the precise contract under consideration—a $194,000 contract—which he says is impracticable, and further, that there is but one single residence on the whole route.

Mr. RAMSEY. The Senator does not mean to say that he finds that statement in any report of the Postmaster General?

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Yes, sir.

Mr. RAMSEY. There are numerous settlements on the line of this route.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. The upshot of it, Mr. President, that the Postmaster General reports that it is impracticable to carry the mail on this route. That is the information before the committee, that no service has been rendered, and no service under the contract is practicable; and furthermore, that the establishment of the post route was improvident; that Montana can be supplied from another point to a great deal better advantage; and for that reason the House of Representatives provided that no part of the sum appropriated in this clause should be paid for that service; and on that information the Committee on Appropriations on the part of the Senate thought it reasonable to concur. I hope the Senate will retain this proviso.

Mr. RAMSEY. I will read an extract from the report of the Postmaster General, and the Senator will see how entirely he has been misinformed on this subject:

"In the last annual report allusion was made to the route from Fort Abercrombie, Dakota, to Helena, Montana, (or the route from St. Cloud to Pembina,) intended to provide direct mail communication to the Territories of Montana, Idaho, and Washington."

That is the northern mail line, five hundred miles north of the central line of mail service.

"It was stated that in consequence of Indian hostilities on nearly the whole of the line the service was unreliable, of no value to the Department, and would be discontinued in the spring unless a marked improvement occurred. As there was no improvement the service was discontinued from March 30, 1868; but at the last session of Congress a resolution was adopted as follows:

"Resolved, &c., That the Postmaster General is hereby authorized to change the character of the mail service from Fort Abercrombie, Dakota Territory, to Helena, Montana Territory, to post-coach service."

"No service existed on the route at the date of this resolution, and the resolution is not mandatory in its terms; but considering it as indicating that the legislative will required that the mail should be carried, and on post-coaches; and acting on the supposition that a special appropriation would be made to meet the expense," &c.

Mr. President, of course a mere horse mail could not be carried over that long line; and for that reason Congress determined that it should be a coach service. The present occupant of the chair [Mr. CONNESS] will recollect that that was the kind of service to California a few years ago, and but very few people then lived on that line after you left the borders of Kansas until you reached those of California. Nevertheless, the service was a dear one to California—I do not mean simply that it was an expensive one, but it was one which the country estimated very highly. It is necessary to have such a service to enable the contractors to build posts, erect places at which travelers can stop, where their stages can stop at night, where they can place their horses, and so on. A mere horse line would not enable them to do that; the compensation would not be sufficient; but by giving them a coach service they will be enabled to do this. That is the reason why all the transcontinental service has been coach service. It was not only so on the central line, but it was so on the great southern line. These northern Territories and these northern States demand this kind of service. We have not had the opportunity to carry the law into effect. The contractor has made a proposal. Probably it has been accepted. My impression is that from his great desire to get the contract he may have put his bid a little too low, and he may desire to retreat from that, and for that purpose appeals to Congress for this kind of legislation.

I assure Senators that by the next year there will be railroad communication to Red river; and from that point to the Great Bend of the Missouri is but three hundred and fifty miles. Persist in this service, and in less than three years it will more than compensate the Treasury of the nation for whatever it may draw from it—not in the postages returned, I admit, but in the general growth of all that country. We all know that next to Nevada at this time Montana yields more gold and silver than any other Territory or State of the Union. It is growing in population more rapidly than any other Territory of the Union. The same is true of Idaho to almost the same extent. Will you not furnish them some direct mail communication with those regions from which their population largely came? The pioneers of Montana and Idaho were largely drawn from Minnesota. The communication is frequent, is constant, between the settlements of those Territories and Minnesota. I hope that the Senate will agree to the amendment that I have offered.

Mr. NYE. Will the honorable Senator allow me to make an inquiry of him before he sits down?

Mr. RAMSEY. Certainly.

Mr. NYE. As the franking privilege is not abolished, I ask the Senator whether the speech that he has now made well circulated up there will not satisfy the people for this year? [Laughter.]

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I think I am entirely sustained in my statement by the report of the Postmaster General, introduced by the Senator himself. He says:

"In the last annual report allusion was made to the route from Fort Abercrombie, Dakota, to Helena, Montana, (or the route from St. Cloud to Pembina,) intended to provide direct mail communication to the Territories of Montana, Idaho, and Washington. It was stated that in consequence of Indian hostilities on nearly the whole of the line the service was unreliable, of no value to the Department, and would be discontinued in the spring unless a marked improvement occurred. As there was no improvement the service was discontinued from March 30, 1868."

That is the statement I made. That covers the whole of it and a little more. It emphasizes it. But here is the point—

"but at the last session of Congress a resolution was adopted, as follows:

"Resolved, &c., That the Postmaster General is hereby authorized to change the character of the mail service from Fort Abercrombie, Dakota Territory, to Helena, Montana Territory, to post-coach service."

"No service existed on the route at the date of this resolution, and the resolution is not mandatory in its terms; but considering it as indicating that the legislative will required that the mail should be carried, and on post-coaches; and acting on the supposition that a special appropriation would be made to meet the expense, an advertisement was issued," &c.

Now, I think my statement is fully sustained the first proposition; and secondly, that the by Postmaster General has not changed his mind, but he feels that you have instructed him: he feels that although he had communicated to Congress that this service was a failure, that it was unreliable, and Congress ought not to make the appropriation, you instructed him by the resolution of 1868. The House of Representatives by this amendment say that he ought not to feel himself instructed, and we say to him that he is not instructed and that he shall not appropriate any portion of this money to a service which he represents to be impracticable.

Mr. RAMSEY. That was not precisely the statement of the honorable Senator. It was that this service was useless. It was the service previously had, before the legislation of 1868, that was useless, because of Indian interruptions. Those have ceased, and new legislation was had.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Does the honorable Senator mean to say to the Senate that where a horseback service was found to be impracticable it does not follow that a coach service three times a week would not also be improvident?

Mr. RAMSEY. Certainly not.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Does he mean to say that the Postmaster General recommends coach service?

Mr. RAMSEY. With a single horse how can the lonely rider travel over a region of country like this, with no place to rest at night?

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I will not argue that.

Mr. RAMSEY. How was the mail carried over the central route? How was it carried over the southern route? The expenditure requisite for the erection of stations upon the great plains involves, requires a coach service. Then again, the Senator says that there are no settlements on all that line. Sir, we have several military posts there that require this mail service. This service, if I am not very much mistaken, is recommended strongly by General Grant and the military commanders of that northern district. Immediately after you pass the space between the Red river and the Missouri you come upon the settlements in the valley of the Missouri river. There is a space between the settlements of three hundred and fifty miles; and these very Territories are growing rapidly, and they are entitled to this direct communication, and they ask it. The people of Montana and the people of Idaho ask it as much as do the people of Minnesota and the other northern States lying east of them. I think it is unfair to make this discrimination. It is in the discretion of the Postmaster General whether or not he will put service on this line. I have no doubt if you would search all the States over you would find many lines which would seem much more useless than this. Why not seek them out and instruct the Postmaster General to place no service upon them? Why single out this particular one? I say there is no other mail line directly across the continent within five hundred miles of this; and I assert that there is infinitely more settlement upon the line of this route than there was upon the line of the central road when you first sent your mail across there in coaches.

Mr. CORBETT. I think the statement made by the Senator from Minnesota is very practical and self-evident to any one who has any acquaintance with an extent of country through which a mail is to pass, and at the end of which there are settlements to be supplied. As he says, a one-horse mail cannot be sustained through the unsettled country. In order to sustain stations and keep persons there to take care of the passengers and horses you must have a sufficient service to make it an object to establish those stations. It was so through the central route when it was established, and it has been so on every new route that has been established. It was so through our country when the first mail route from California to Oregon was established, and yet it settled up all the whole length of the line. You have got to establish this kind of service before you can settle up the country. That is the pioneer. At these stations you commence your settlements and they become a nucleus for forming settlements along the whole line, and finally railroads extend through the country. I think the gentleman from Minnesota is perfectly right in his statement in that respect.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. Here is manifestly one of the links by which the Post Office Department, instead of being self-sustaining, is a weight of five or six millions beyond its actual revenue. The proposition is to send a mail-coach, I suppose, with six horses where it is impracticable even for a man on horseback to get through. The next thing will be that we shall be required to make the road for the stage-coach, and we shall be told although there are no inhabitants there now to be supplied with the mail if we only establish a mail route there will be.

Mr. CORBETT. I understand there are inhabitants at each end of the road.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. Then the proposition is that the contract has been taken too cheaply. It will only cost $195,000, and if we allow this to go in it will probably cost $500,000.

THE PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Minnesota to strike out the proviso in lines twelve and thirteen.

The amendment was rejected, there being on a division—ayes nine, noes not counted.

Mr. RAMSEY. Let it pass for the present. I will renew it in the Senate. On page 2, line twenty, I propose to increase the appropriation for clerks for post offices from $2,000,000 to $2,500,000. I will state that the estimate of the Department was $2,500,000, and I can see no reason for striking it down. I will send to the desk a letter of the Postmaster General to be read in explanation of the amendment.

The Secretary read the following letter:

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT,
WASHINGTON, February 2, 1869.

SIR: Inclosed I have marked the items where the appropriations have been cut down by the Appropriation Committee. The estimate I made for post office clerks is not too high. The business of the post offices is constantly increasing, and new calls are constantly made for additional clerk-hire. It will be most mischievous to the service to cut the appropriation down.

The amount expended last year for mail-bags, mail-catchers, &c., was about one hundred and four thousand dollars, I believe. The report will show. That item is cut down to $30,000. New bags are constantly required, and the mails will be seriously damaged if the supply of good bags is at all restricted. The same kind of embarrassment will occur if the appropriation for locks and stamps is cut down. Cutting off $1,000,000 for next year will require a material reduction of the mail service. I shall not be here to be annoyed by applications for additional service or to bear complaint that must arise if these appropriations are not made; but my successor will have great trouble about these questions, and the service will materially suffer.

Very truly,

A. W. RANDALL.

Hon. J. F. FARNSWORTH.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I call the attention of the Senator to the last provision of this bill, which is evidently intended to cover any deficiency of that sort, and I ask him whether in his judgment that is not ample? It provides $5,740,000 for supplying deficiencies in the revenues of the Post Office Department.

Mr. RAMSEY. Oh, no; the Senator does not understand it. The last provision of the bill provides for any deficiency in the postal treasury. Supposing you make the appropriation in the previous part of this bill, that would probably produce a deficiency say of $5,000,000 in the postal treasury, and it makes that up by an appropriation out of the national Treasury; but you could not make up this deficiency for clerks from $2,000,000 to $2,500,000 without being authorized by this law. The Post Office Department has estimated for this amount. The increase of the service all over the country seems to require it, and there can be no motive for the present officials in that Department to overestimate the wants of the country in this regard. I think it but fair to give it to them.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Well, sir, I do not know that it is not so.

THE PRESIDING OFFICER put the question, and declared that the ayes appeared to have it.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I ask for a division.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I wish simply to say, on the statement of the Senator from Minnesota and the statement of the Postmaster General which he reads, it appears that the amount named in the bill is not sufficient to carry on the business of the Post Office Department. Now, if we are to vote money for anything we must vote for it on the statements of the heads of Departments as to the necessity for it. There is nothing in the world shown why this is not necessary. The chairman of the Committee on Appropriations gets up and says, "I do not know that it is not so," and then the Senate vote it down.

THE PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will put the question again.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. RAMSEY. I now wish to offer an amendment in the thirty-fifth line.

The clause now reads:

For detecting and preventing mail depredations and for special agents $82,000; and no greater sum shall be paid special agents than is hereby provided.

The estimate is $118,350, and I have a communication from the Department in explanation of this item which I will send to the Chair.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. What is your motion?

Mr. RAMSEY. My motion is to increase the appropriation to the estimate of the Department, which is $118,350; and here is a letter from the Post Office Department in explanation of it which I ask to have read.

The Secretary read the following letter:

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT,
CONTRACT OFFICE, INSPECTION DIVISION,
WASHINGTON, February 23, 1869.

SIR: I have the honor to report the following as the number of paid special agents of this Department for the respective years mentioned below as obtained from the official register, the intervening years of 1862, 1864, and 1866 approximating 1861, 1863, 1865, and 1867; also the amount charged annually to the account of "special agents and mail depredations," for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1861, to June 30, 1868, inclusive:

	Number special agents.	Amount paid.
1861.....	21	$47,837 22
1862.....	21	48,320 06
1863.....	16	45,719 39
1864.....	16	49,932 62
1865.....	33	62,936 22
1866.....	33	95,756 83
1867.....	42	123,074 05
1868.....	49	158,905 16

By the act approved March 3, 1865, an additional special agent was appointed for the Pacific coast at a salary of $2,500 per annum, and a sum not exceeding five dollars per diem for incidental expenses. Previous to the passage of the act referred to there was only one special agent on the Pacific coast. The same act authorized the Postmaster General to increase the per diem of all other special agents to a sum not exceeding five dollars, and as it was found that the amount previously allowed—two dollars per diem—was totally inadequate, on account of the increased cost of living, to pay their expenses, other special agents have been allowed from two to four dollars per diem, according to their several localities and the character of the services required by them.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

GEORGE W. McLELLAN,

Second Assistant Postmaster General.

Hon. ALEXANDER RAMSEY, Committee Post Offices and Post Roads, United States Senate.

Mr. RAMSEY. I will state that in the appropriation bill of last year $100,000 was appropriated for this purpose. It seems but reasonable in the growth of the affairs of the Department that this little increase should occur from $100,000 to $118,000; and it seems to me very unreasonable that the appropriation should be cut down now to $80,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. RAMSEY. I desire to move an amendment in the next clause, which reads:

For mail-bags and mail-bag catchers, $120,000.

The Department have estimated for $130,000, and I move to increase that item to the estimate of the Department.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. That is so near the estimate that I would not do it.

Mr. RAMSEY. Very well; I will pass that by; but this balance accumulates from year to year, and it will require a very large appropriation some other year. That is the only difference. Probably before we pass it over I ought to say that I have a communication from the Department on the subject; but still as the chairman says that the difference is very slight I will let it pass. I now call attention to the clause in lines forty-one, forty-two, and forty-three, which reads:

For miscellaneous payments, including payment of balances to foreign countries, $250,000.

I move to amend that by making the appropriation $875,000. This reduction on the part of the House of Representatives was a clear mistake. The miscellaneous disbursements under that head amount to the sum appropriated here alone, and the balance due foreign countries amounts to between three and four hundred thousand dollars.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. The Senator has a communication on that subject I believe?

Mr. RAMSEY. Yes, sir; and I will send it to the desk and have it read.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. The Committee on Appropriations concurred in the House proposition upon the statement in the Globe from one of the managers of the bill in the House that in a conversation at the Department he was told that the estimate was a mistake and that this sum was all that was necessary. I think the Senator from Minnesota showed me a communication the other day which seemed to contradict that statement or showed that there was a misapprehension about it.

Mr. RAMSEY. It was a clear mistake on the part of the member of the House who made the inquiry at the Department. It was a misapprehension on his part entirely. I ask that the letter be read.

THE PRESIDING OFFICER. The communication will be read.

The Secretary read it, as follows:

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT,
February 24, 1869.

SIR: I have the honor to ask your attention to the following: In the estimates for expenses of this Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1870, as submitted to the House of Representatives on December 12, 1868, there appears the following item:

"For miscellaneous payments, including balances due foreign countries, $875,000," which was made up in the following manner: For rent, light, fuel, and incidental expenses of post offices, $500,000; for miscellaneous payments, the character of which may be seen by reference to pages 147 to 152 inclusive of report of 1867 herewith inclosed, $75,000; and for balances to foreign countries, $300,000. In the bill, as passed by the House of Representatives, this item has been reduced to $250,000, or barely sufficient to meet the payments to foreign countries.

I would therefore request that some provision be made for the other items embraced in the original item for which $750,000 were asked.

The amount actually expended for these items during the year ending 30th June, 1868, as per report now in the hands of the printer, were—

For rent, light, fuel, &c.....$403,360 76
For miscellaneous expenses..... 63,990 43
For balances to foreign countries..... 465,616 91

I am, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

ALEXANDER W. RANDALL,

Postmaster General.

Hon. ALEXANDER RAMSEY, Chairman Committee on Post Offices, United States Senate.

Mr. RAMSEY. Balances on account of foreign mails arise in this way: it seems that the American letters sent abroad are three fourths of them prepaid, while only about one fourth of the foreign letters received here are prepaid. This necessarily leaves a very large balance in transactions, amounting to millions of dollars on both sides, which must be remitted to foreign countries and sent back, and to do this requires an appropriation. The money goes into the Treasury and is taken out again and returned.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I am satisfied that the provision in the bill was a mistake.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. RAMSEY. I have another amendment to offer. I move to amend the bill by adding the following as an additional section:

And be it further enacted, That the Postmaster General is hereby authorized to purchase for a post office the lot and building at the southwest corner of Lime-stone and High streets, in Springfield, Ohio, known as the Episcopal church property, for the sum of $10,000; Provided, however, That the entire cost to be paid by the United States for the said property and for fitting it up for a post office shall not exceed the sum herein appropriated.

The Senator from Ohio could explain this matter fully if he were here. The proposition has the approval of the Post Office Department as an economical measure. It is to buy a church conveniently situated, and it is for a reasonable sum, to be made an advantageous post office in the town of Springfield, Ohio.

Mr. GRIMES. What kind of a church is it?

Mr. RAMSEY. I do not know what denomination; that is not important; but the measure has the recommendation of the Department.

Mr. GRIMES. I am not talking about the character of the people who worship there; but what is the structure made of? Wood?

Mr. RAMSEY. Brick or stone, I imagine. There are a parcel of papers here on the subject. I had expected the Senator from Ohio to be here and explain it more fully.

Mr. GRIMES. What is the peculiar necessity for having a post office belonging to the United States in the town of Springfield, Ohio? It is an ordinary county town, of Clark county, I believe.

Mr. RAMSEY. It is a town, I understand, of fifteen or sixteen thousand inhabitants, in which there will be economy in buying this building as compared with the rent now paid for the post office.

Mr. CONNESS. I was opposed to this amendment when it was first proposed in the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads; but from the statement made to me by Mr. SHELLABARGER, of the other House, who is a very careful man and a good legislator, I became entirely satisfied that it was an economical measure and a saving of money to the Government. The sum appropriated is small and the property will answer all the purposes of a post office.

Mr. RAMSEY. The letter of Mr. SHELLABARGER addressed to the Post Office Department will make the matter very clear.

Mr. POMEROY. I believe the committee were at first opposed to it, but subsequently they agreed to recommend the proposition.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. RAMSEY. I offer the following amendment:

For commencement of post office and sub-Treasury building at Boston, Massachusetts, $200,000.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I think no notice was given of that.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I hope we are not going to put on this bill appropriations to build post offices all over the country. We just had one from Springfield—I disliked to divide the Senate upon it—a little town in Ohio. You propose to build a post office there. If it is done there it will be done in every other place. We have a dozen such towns in my State. Is the Government going to build a Government house for the accommodation of post offices at all these towns?

Mr. GRIMES. It is because Mr. SHELLABARGER wants it.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Suppose Mr. SHELLABARGER does want it, what of that? If we commence that we shall not finish this appropriation bill this session it is certain. I hope these amendments will not prevail.

Mr. CONNESS. The question before us is on the amendment making an appropriation for Boston. Do I understand a point of order to be raised upon it?

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I inquire whether it has been referred?

Mr. RAMSEY. The Senator is aware that a large and expensive lot was purchased in the city of Boston.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. But was notice given of this amendment?

Mr. RAMSEY. Notice was given.

Mr. POMEROY. Do I understand the Senator to say that it passed the Post Office Committee?

Mr. CONNESS. I never heard of it.

Mr. RAMSEY. The committee was consulted informally.

Mr. CONNESS. I never heard of it before.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I want to know what this means. I do not think my committee has had any notice of it. It did not come to my personal attention.

Mr. RAMSEY. Notice was placed on the Clerk's desk.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I inquire whether any notice has been given to the Committee on Appropriations?

Mr. RAMSEY. The notice was placed on the Clerk's desk.

Mr. EDMUNDS. What do you mean by "placed?"

Mr. RAMSEY. Offered in open Senate to-day.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. That will not do.

Mr. POMEROY. My inquiry was whether the Post Office Committee had authorized it?

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. It is not in order. No notice has been given.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. THAYER in the chair.) The Senator from Maine raises a question of order.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I raise the question of order that no notice such as the rule requires has been given to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. SUMNER. I hope my friend from Maine will not raise that point of order on this proposition. The appropriation is needed; the land has been purchased at a large outlay; the plans are already made; the whole question has been considered again and again most carefully; architects are engaged—

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. The Senator will allow me to suggest that this amendment would be a great deal more proper on the miscellaneous bill which will come in to-morrow; and notice of it can be given at the present time.

Mr. SUMNER. Very well. If it can go on the miscellaneous bill I do not care about its going on here. I only want it passed.

Mr. GRIMES. It can be put on the Army bill with the other Massachusetts matter. [Laughter.]

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment is out of order.

Mr. CONNESS. I offer the following amendment to come in as an additional section:

And be it further enacted, That it shall not be lawful for the Postmaster General to make any steamship or other new contract for carrying the mails on the sea for a longer period than ten years, nor for any other compensation than the sea and inland postages on the mails so transported by steamships built and registered in the United States; and every contract made under this act shall reserve to the United States the right to reduce the rates of postage at any time during the continuance of such contract without giving to the contractor any right to any claim for damages or indemnity; but in any such contract to be made the United States shall reserve the right to send its agents over any such line free of any charge whatever.

I wish to say in regard to this amendment that it changes the existing law only in one respect, and that as to one word, inserting "ten" for "two." The Postmaster General now, under the act of June 14, 1858, has the right to make these contracts for ocean service, but that act says they shall not extend beyond two years. This gives him authority to make such contracts for a period of ten years upon the same conditions; provided, however, that he is not at liberty, as now, to contract that the American mails may be carried by foreign ships, but they shall be ships of American build and register, and the carriage shall be for the sea and inland postages.

Mr. GRIMES. How much do they amount to between here and Europe?

Mr. CONNESS. That would depend entirely on the amount of mail carried at the time.

Mr. GRIMES. But what is the average amount?

Mr. RAMSEY. Seven or eight hundred thousand dollars now.

Mr. CONNESS. They would not get all that. The ships would get what was ready to be transported at the time they were about to sail. It is a measure proposing to encourage the introduction of American ships into the Atlantic trade, not in favor of any particular person or company, because the Postmaster General may contract with any American ship-builder and ship-owner that he sees fit.

Mr. WILSON. I move to amend this amendment by adding the following section:

Sec. — And be it further enacted, That for the purpose of encouraging the construction and employment of American steamships and restoring ocean commerce under the American flag all money received by the United States from the ocean and inland postage on foreign mail matter carried between the United States and Europe, to an amount not exceeding $2,000,000 annually, is hereby set apart for the period of ten years, and is authorized to be paid and expended as hereinafter provided.

Sec. — And be it further enacted, That the Postmaster General is hereby authorized and directed to contract with responsible citizens of the United States for the transportation of the foreign mails of the United States in American steamships for a term not exceeding ten years, on such conditions and with such limitations as will secure the full and faithful per*formance of such contracts, between ports of the United States and ports in Europe; and he shall contract for the performance of the aforesaid service by not less than four and not more than sixteen steamships in all, and for not less than four and not more than eight departures monthly from New York, and for not less than two and not more than four departures monthly from Boston, the days and time of departures to be fixed by the Postmaster General. Said steamships shall be of not less than twenty-eight hundred tons, register measurement, and shall be wholly owned by citizens of the United States. They shall class A1 at 'American Lloyds' and by one of the marine inspectors of three of the cities of the United States from which the said steamers may run. Their speed shall be equal to the average speed of steamships of similar size and class now or hereafter employed between the United States and Europe. They shall carry all mail matter offered by the Post Office Department, but the United States shall receive all postages therefrom. The owners of said steamships shall furnish passage free of compensation for all diplomatic and other agents of the Government of the United States when requested by the proper Department. The Postmaster General shall pay from the money provided by the first section of this act to the owners of said steamships for each round voyage to Europe and back a sum not exceeding $20,000: Provided, That the amount derived from postages under this act shall be sufficient therefor; and if not sufficient, then such sum as may be derived from said postages shall be apportioned ratably for each steamship for each round voyage: Provided, however, That the deficiency of any one voyage may be made up from the excess of any at any time during the continuance of any contract made in accordance with this act.*

Sec. — And be it further enacted, That the Secretary of the Navy is hereby authorized, in time of war or of public danger, to take possession of any or all steamships employed under the provisions of this act and use them in the service of the United States; and the owners shall be paid a fair compensation for any steamship so taken and for any loss or damage they may suffer thereby.

Sec. — And be it further enacted, That all acts and parts of acts inconsistent herewith are hereby repealed.

Mr. CHANDLER. If any action is taken on any steamship line, or any arrangement for carrying mail matter by ocean, steamers, I hope the measure now offered will pass. It was considered very carefully by the Committee on Commerce and unanimously reported from that committee, and I think it a good bill and hope it will pass.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Here is a very important provision regulating the whole mail service between this country and Europe, as I suppose. It has been considered by the Committee on Commerce, as we are informed by its chairman, and he thinks it a good bill. The Senate has never considered it. It is just read here now for the first time; and is it right—I ask the Senator from Michigan who reports this bill—is it right at this hour of the night and so near the close of the session to introduce so important a feature as this on an appropriation bill? I know it is in order under our rules, but ought it to be put upon a bill merely appropriating money to carry on the postal service?

Mr. CHANDLER. No, sir; I do not think it is right; but I think it is just as germane as the amendment of the Senator from California.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I think it is as germane as that, but I hope it will not be persisted in.

Mr. CONNESS. Very well, sir; I will withdraw the amendment I offered.

Mr. CHANDLER. I would like to pass this measure on its merits, and it ought to pass.

Mr. WILSON. It has been reported by the Committee on Commerce. I believe it to be a good, honest, and just measure in every respect, and I think if it be passed we shall again revive, or rather more than revive, we shall establish, on the north Atlantic steamship lines carrying the American flag. There is no job in it. It simply appropriates the sea postages and land postages for that purpose. They will not at the present time amount to probably a million dollars a year, something between nine hundred thousand and a million dollars in the aggregate. That will probably be soon increased. It is a fair, open movement, and I think an honest one. I think it will put an end to all schemes and arrangements from whatever quarter they may come, and I certainly think it an honest and fair proposition, and one that it will be for the interest of the whole country to adopt.

Mr. CONNESS. There is only one little irregularity about this measure, and that is that it never was referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads; and how the Committee on Commerce usurps this business from the honorable chairman of the Committee on Post Offices I do not understand. The business of commerce generally and the seal fishery belongs to the Committee on Commerce; but if they step in to regulate the question of ocean postages I suppose we might as well dispense with the honorable Senator from Minnesota and his committee.

Mr. CHANDLER. It has generally been supposed that steamship navigation had something to do with commerce. It may be that under the new dispensation of the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads they have the control of steamships. It was unheard of before; but if it should prove that the honorable Senator from California is correct, and that the post roads are intended to run the steamships, then the Committee on Commerce was out of place.

Mr. SUMNER. Mr. President—

Mr. TRUMBULL. This amendment is withdrawn.

Mr. SUMNER. It is not withdrawn.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will state that there is no amendment pending.

Mr. SUMNER. No amendment pending?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from California has withdrawn his amendment; and consequently the amendment to it offered by the Senator from Massachusetts fell with it.

Mr. WILSON. I move it as an independent amendment to the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Then that amendment is before the Senate.

Mr. SUMNER. I understand that there is no objection to this amendment in substance.

Mr. CONNESS. There is.

Mr. SUMNER. Very well; none has yet been presented. The objections that have been presented have been only of form. There has been a criticism on the committee that reported it. Sir, what has that to do with the amendment? Look at it on its merits; judge it by these. If it has merit, why reject it because it comes from the Committee on Commerce instead of the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads? I know not why the Committee on Commerce should not have jurisdiction of this matter as well as the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads. It seems to me that the subject belongs as much to the one as to the other.

Now, sir, the Committee on Commerce, a most respectable committee of this body, has reported in favor of this proposition after careful consideration, as the chairman has told us just now. Why, then, are we reminded that it is not reported by the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads? Enough, sir, that it is reported by a committee of this body. Therefore it is in order when moved. And now I ask you, sir, if there is no objection to it on the merits, for that is the only question. I see the Senator from Iowa just ready to spring; but he can have no objection to this proposition except the general objection that he makes to almost everything. [Laughter.] There can be no objection to this. It is, as my colleague says, a fair proposition; it is an honest proposition; it is one by which the Government will lose nothing and the commercial interests of this country will gain much—those interests which since the rebellion and since the fitting out of British cruisers have suffered so much, and which now have a right to look to you for a little aid. Give them this aid, then. It is not much; but give it to them and the country will gain while its commerce will be extended.

Mr. GRIMES. Mr. President, so far as it relates to the controversy between the two committees, I think myself the Committee on Commerce is the proper committee to whom such a proposition as this should be referred, because, as I understand, all these subsidies are claimed to be granted for the purpose of extending and enlarging our commerce. It is in other words to encourage ship building, and

I believe they have always been supported here upon the patriotic principle that we did not desire that our mails should be carried under any other than the American flag, if it were possible that we could build or buy ships to sail under the American flag; but I wish to say that this subject has been under consideration, as I learn from the newspapers, in Massachusetts as well as in Washington.

Mr. SUMNER. Very well.

Mr. GRIMES. Although we have not a written report from the committee of the Senate on the subject of subsidies we have one from the Legislative Assembly of the State of Massachusetts. If I am right about it—and the chairman of the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads will correct me if I am wrong—we now have our mails carried between our country and Europe for the sea postage.

Mr. RAMSEY. Yes.

Mr. GRIMES. Which amount to about one-half of the entire postages, both inland and sea.

Mr. RAMSEY. Oh, no.

Mr. GRIMES. What is the relative proportion?

Mr. RAMSEY. The sea postage to England is twelve cents and the inland postage three cents.

Mr. GRIMES. What is the average? That is what I am talking about.

Mr. RAMSEY. Three to twelve. The inland postage is but three cents, while the postage to England and almost all European countries is twelve cents. Our sea postages amount to about seven hundred thousand dollars a year, and the inland postages on foreign letters $100,000.

Mr. GRIMES. At any rate the proposition is to give, under all the bills I have seen lying on our tables, to these steamships, on patriotic principles, the inland postage as well as the sea-going postage. As I was saying, this subject has been under consideration in Massachusetts as well as here, and I believe the proposition now offered is peculiarly a Massachusetts bill. I hold in my hand the report of the mercantile committee of the General Assembly of the State of Massachusetts, to which I would call the attention of the Senators from Massachusetts and of the Senate. It is excellent reading. The question was whether steps should be taken by the Legislature of Massachusetts to memorialize Congress on the subject of steamships. I have cut the slip from a newspaper, and I will ask the Clerk to read it as a part of my remarks.

The Secretary read as follows:

"The committee of the Massachusetts Legislature on mercantile affairs have just submitted an interesting report on the depression of commerce. They refuse to memorialize Congress to subsidize steamship companies, and give, among others, the following conclusive reasons for the refusal:

"In view of the restrictions now imposed upon foreign commerce, the committee do not deem it expedient to memorialize the General Government to interpose for the purpose of promoting ocean steam transportation, and beg leave to recommend that no such application be made unless it is made as part and parcel of a general plan for the relief of foreign commerce from the burdens and trammels which our present system of United States laws for the collection of revenue have imposed upon it. Your committee cannot believe that our commerce with foreign nations can be restored to a prosperous condition by an artificial system of bounties or subsidies rendered necessary in part, if at all, by the artificial obstacles to foreign commerce which are maintained under the name of revenue laws.

"Of what use, we may ask, is it to attempt to promote ocean steam transportation, which is but an incident to commerce, if our whole policy is framed for the purpose of preventing a free exchange of our commodities and manufactures for those produced elsewhere, which exchange constitutes commerce itself?"

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I desire to say to the Senator from Iowa that it is an entire mistake to suppose that the Boston board ever adopted this report. It has never been adopted; it was right the reverse.

Mr. GRIMES. What do you mean? Right the reverse of what?

Mr. SUMNER. I will show the Senator. I have in my hand a series of resolutions bearing date February 24, 1869, adopted by the Legislature of Massachusetts in both its branches, and which it is the duty of my colleague or myself to present to the Senate. We have not thus far discharged that duty. Therefore the Senator from Iowa may be pardoned for his ignorance with regard to the action of the Legislature of Massachusetts. These are as follows:

"Resolves in relation to American steamship companies.

Resolved, As the sense of the Legislature of Massachusetts that the bill introduced into the Senate of the United States by our distinguished Senator, Hon. HENRY WILSON, entitled 'A bill to establish a line of American steamships between the United States of America and Europe,' should at once be passed, and that our Senators and Representatives in Congress be requested to use all their influence to secure the passage of said bill at the present session.

Resolved, That his Excellency, the Governor, be requested to transmit a copy of these resolutions to each of our Senators and Representatives in Congress.

Mr. GRIMES. What has that to do with this?

Mr. SUMNER. It is on this very bill.

Mr. GRIMES. What has it to do with this report? Does the Senator say that what I present is not an authentic report?

Mr. SUMNER. I know nothing about that report.

Mr. GRIMES. I find it published.

Mr. SUMNER. It has never been communicated to me.

Mr. GRIMES. I only saw it in the newspapers.

Mr. SUMNER. I have not seen it in the newspapers.

Mr. GRIMES. I know it is a very potential argument, worthy of the Massachusetts Legislature and of the intelligent gentlemen who compose the mercantile committee, and I have no doubt it would meet the approbation of the Senators themselves if they would only suffer it to be read through. I hope the Senator [Mr. SUMNER] is willing to hear an expression of sentiment on the part of the mercantile committee of the General Assembly of Massachusetts.

Mr. SUMNER. The Senator knows now what is the opinion of the Legislature of Massachusetts.

Mr. GRIMES. I would respectfully inquire what has become of my speech that I was making? [Laughter.]

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Iowa has the floor. Does he request the further reading of the paper?

Mr. CONNESS. I desire to say, in reference to the reading of this document, which is a part of the speech of the honorable Senator from Iowa, that I hope the reading will be finished. It is one of those free-trade documents that the honorable Senator has been so industrious in gathering up. I hope he will be allowed to read it as a part of his remarks.

Mr. GRIMES. And one of the most hopeful signs in that connection is that it emanates from Massachusetts; hence I want to put it upon record.

Mr. RAMSEY. The Senator from Massachusetts assumes that this was within the province of the Committee on Commerce.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair feels obliged to arrest this debate and to ask the Senator from Iowa if he requests the further reading of this communication?

Mr. GRIMES. I should like to hear it read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The reading will be proceeded with.

The Secretary continued the reading, as follows:

"As the Massachusetts Legislature has in its special charge the interests of the Commonwealth, let us glance at the position of the State in its relation to other countries. We have a sterile soil, a harsh climate, and a more dense population than any other State. Let us suppose that instead of being one member of a great nation our Commonwealth had been one independent community similar to one of the lesser kingdoms or duchies of Germany, governed by our own laws and collecting our own revenue. As a matter of course the same general principles would have applied to Massachusetts which it is now claimed to apply to the United States as a nation. It would have been said that we should establish our entire independence and make or raise everything that we needed, could make or raise at all. Our first need would have been to have protected our farmers, and we should therefore have placed a heavy duty upon the wheat of the Genesee valley and upon the beef cattle of the prairies, for are we not as a nation now protected against the barley, oats, and potatoes of the provinces and of Canada? Next we should have protected the owners of our peat bogs from the competition of the anthracite of Pennsylvania, precisely as the nation has protected us against the competition of the cheap coal of Nova Scotia. Our next step would have been to shut out the wool of Ohio, where sunlight and good feed enable the farmers to raise wool more cheaply than we can afford it upon our Berkshire hills; precisely as Ohio has been protected by the nation against the yet cheaper wool of South Africa and South America. We would not have admitted the textile fabrics of England then any more than we would now, since it would have been unwise to protect the wool and not the woollens. We could perhaps have admitted cotton duty free, in order that we might share with England in the prosperity which is said to ensue from the export of manufactured goods rather than of raw materials. We would have enacted that all our railroads should be built of Berkshire iron, as it is now enacted that most of our railroads shall be built with Pennsylvania iron; and that the State flag, the glorious symbol of our independence, should be made, as it is now, in the single factory owned by our distinguished soldier, patriot, and legislator. Then from our own iron and oak we would have constructed our own steamer with boilers especially adapted to the use of our own peat, and have granted her a subsidy from the revenue collected on tea, coffee, and sugar, in order that she might carry to the pauper laborer of Europe an account of the glorious system of common schools and the noble position of the laborer in our free Commonwealth. We could not, it is true, have offered him an abundance of all that men require for their grosser need; but, better than that, we could have offered him protection for his labor and independence as a citizen of a State which relied only upon its own resources.

"We would also have said to him, 'we have freed ourselves from that tyrant, gold, and with a better and cheaper money we now carry on all our transactions. We have stamped the faith of the State upon a piece of our own paper, made in our own mills, printed in our own press, and declared to be a legal tender for all debts due from our own citizens.'

"Thus free, independent, and proud Massachusetts would have stood forth as an example among States. Her government would have protected labor and fostered Massachusetts industry. Can any one doubt that her commerce would have prospered or that her steamers would have controlled the seas?

"Would she not have established her independence and protected her people from the competition of ignorant and pauper laborers? Would not her farmers, her mechanics, her spinners, and weavers, have earned high wages, and would not the great accumulation of capital have secured to us lower rates of interest than in any other country? Would not our capital have been represented by money made and secured upon the faith of the State, which the State would never permit to become so scarce as to command usurious interest?

"It will be said, and truly said, that the independence they secured would have been that of starvation; that no commerce worthy of the name could have existed, and that no subsidy could have built it up.

"It may now be said, as truly, that our commerce has been starved from the seas because our laws have excluded from our ports the merchandise, which is the food of commerce, as far as it has been possible to do so.

"That Massachusetts is not in all respects in the same condition as her commerce is due to the fact that free trade upon a continental scale has saved her from the starvation of total independence. Interdependence or free trade among communities having apparently interests as opposite and antagonistic to each other as can be imagined—if different conditions of soil and climate presuppose antagonism—has saved Massachusetts from the disaster which the laws regulating our foreign trade would have brought upon her. In the regulation or the absence of regulation as to our internal commerce the truth has been fully recognized that no commerce can permanently exist unless the exchange of products benefits both parties in the transaction. Thus when we send to Illinois our textile fabrics, our boots and shoes, and our clothing, and take her wheat and corn, each State gets what it wants with the expenditure of less labor than would otherwise be required.

"It is true that we have raised the cost both of corn and wheat by the imposition of taxes called duties upon the iron and steel which enter into the tools and implements of our husbandry, and we have also raised the cost of our boots and shoes, our woollen and cotton goods, and our clothing, by imposing taxes called duties upon the iron and steel which we also use, as well as upon our leather, our coal, our starch, and our wool.

"We have increased the cost of transportation by taxes called duties upon railroad iron, and upon every article which enters into the cost of our locomotives and our cars.

"But this imposition of taxes only prevents our exchange with other nations; it has simply resulted in a general high cost, both of farm products and manufactures, and under the guise or pretext of a general benefit it has simply confined our commerce within our own limits and compelled us to conduct it at high prices, with no benefit to any special class, except where a representative of some special interest has secured a heavier rate of tax upon his neighbor than upon himself.

"We have attempted a universal system of protection, and the only gain to any one results from its inequality, but the loss is the loss of our foreign commerce and a partial sacrifice of our prosperity as a nation.

"Your committee cannot ask that a feeble attempt shall be made to make the running of steamships profitable by granting them a bounty from the proceeds of the very taxes, by the unwise imposition of which the profitable use of steamships has been destroyed.

"Rather would we urge upon Congress a complete revision of the laws for the collection of revenue known as tariff laws, and demand that such revision be made with a view to the collection of the revenue only, and without regard to the claims of any special interest for fostering care, bounty, or protection. We believe that the law which results in protection to one results in privation to another, and that it is not the province of Government to lay taxes which inure to the benefit of any one class at the expense of another."

Mr. GRIMES. I think that every member of this body will agree with me that that is very excellent reading, and that it is such as is worthy of emanating from the distinguished source whence it came—the committee on mercantile affairs of the Legislature of Massachusetts.

Mr. SUMNER. I wish my friend would allow me to correct him there. I understand that article is the production of a very excellent gentleman, a personal friend of my own, Mr. Atkinson, of Boston. It has not the official sanction of a committee of the Legislature. The Legislature has spoken by the resolutions which I have read.

Mr. GRIMES. I do not vouch for the authenticity of the article. I stated when I introduced it that I cut it from a newspaper. Nor am I responsible for the change of sentiment that may possibly have come over the minds of the members of the Legislature of Massachusetts who may possibly have passed this memorial on considerations which have been presented to them since the report is alleged to have been made by the committee on mercantile affairs. I only know that it is a better speech on this subject than I could make; and being opposed to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts, I thought I would substitute a Massachusetts argument or speech rather than one from Iowa.

Mr. CONKLING. Mr. President, it now wants less than a quarter of an hour of midnight, and one day of the session remains. I submit to the honorable Senator from Massachusetts that he ought not to persevere in this amendment. It is the presentation of one of several schemes of kindred nature that have been reported favorably from the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads. In at least one of these my constituents are largely interested. It is a scheme better, as I believe, for the country and the service than this. I have sent for the bill, and if the Senator will persevere I must offer it as an amendment to this amendment in the nature of a substitute, and then we will proceed to discuss the positive and relative merits of these propositions. I do this not with a view of antagonizing him at all, but because if he will persist in thrusting upon appropriation bills a matter of this sort, foreign and independent, grave and somewhat complicated in its nature, which ought to be deliberately considered, of course I cannot allow other interests equally meritorious presenting propositions to be preferred, I think, to this, to be estopped because in the haste and snatch of the closing hours he succeeds in putting upon an appropriation bill a provision of this sort.

I am sure if we are to go into this consideration only fairly, only reasonably, it will take hours to compare the merits of these different schemes; and I submit to my honorable friend that it is not fair toward the rest of us. It is not fair to attempt to do this without the presentation of rival propositions; nor is it fair to drive us to stay here all night when tomorrow we shall very likely be compelled to remain here all night at best, and when the result at last is to be of no service to anybody. If I thought the honorable Senator would listen to any appeal from me, I would respectfully and earnestly expostulate with him against continuing this process, which I think is trifling, and worse than trifling, with the appropriation bills. They will fail at last, some of them, if we all conspire to their consummation. Why should we not, then, go forward and do what we can to pass them, each one withholding his selfish scheme—I say it not invidiously, but selfish in the sense of being local and particular in its application and independent and foreign to the purposes of these bills.

Now, sir, I will wait and see if this is to be persevered in; and if it is I will offer a scheme which I think should be adopted as an amendment to this amendment.

Mr. POMEROY. I agree precisely with what the Senator from New York has said. The committee has reported on this subject and we have had it up two or three times in the session. The chairman of the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads has succeeded in getting the subject to the attention of the Senate. Here is a proposition reported from the Committee on Commerce that has never been considered by the Senate at all. I do not know how much consideration it had with the committee, and I know that committee is as capable of considering a proposition of this character as any other committee; but to bring in the subject here in this way looks to me only like an effort to defeat an appropriation bill. The Army appropriation bill lies sleeping because something was undertaken to be put on to it that was not at all germane; and this appropriation bill if it be lost will be lost because schemes not connected with any appropriation are insisted upon to deter us from voting on the passage of the bill. I, too, if the Senator from Massachusetts intends to persist in this amendment, would like to move an amendment as a substitute, and another Senator near me has one; and these are propositions which have been considered in committee, reported upon, considered in the Senate, voted upon in the Senate, where the whole question has been considered in the Senate. I shall, of course, have to bring my substitute to the attention of the Senate and try to get a vote upon that. Unless the Senator from Massachusetts chooses to withdraw the amendment I shall move an amendment as a substitute.

Mr. RAMSEY. I call the attention of the Senator from Massachusetts to the gross errors of his bill although he informs us that the Committee on Commerce have considered it and it is a most perfect bill. Look at the first section of this measure of the Committee on Commerce; and this illustrates the propriety of individuals and committees sticking to the business that belongs to them. They have presumed to dabble in postal matters which they clearly did not comprehend. This bill is intended to transport your mails. That is the pretension. What business had they with it? The whole thing is in regard to postage. What business had they with it? Had they not better turn their attention to the river and harbor bill that has been smothered up for months and that the country has been clamoring for? Doubtless they could attend to that much better than to this. The first section of this bill reads:

That for the purpose of encouraging the construction and employment of American steamships and restoring ocean commerce under the American flag, all money received by the United States from the ocean and inland postage on foreign mail matter carried between the United States and Europe, to an amount not exceeding $2,000,000 annually, is hereby set apart for the period of ten years, and is authorized to be paid and expended as hereinafter provided.

There are only $700,000 received from that source every year; and yet the Committee on Commerce appropriate $2,000,000 for this purpose! Then again we are told that that committee have thoroughly examined this subject and understand it well, and that this is a most perfect bill. They go on further, and in the second section declare:

The Postmaster General is hereby authorized and directed to contract for not exceeding eight trips a month from New York and four from Boston.

Now, the United States mail is sent four times a week at present from New York. What kind of improvement in the mail service would this be and how much are the parties to receive for these trips? A sum not exceeding $20,000:

that is, the Postmaster General shall pay from money provided by the first section of this bill "to the owners of said steamships for each round voyage to Europe and back, a sum not exceeding $20,000." That would amount to about five millions a year; the number of trips provided for from Boston and from New York at $20,000 a trip would amount to $5,000,000; and yet all this is to be paid out of $700,000 income from land and sea postages! In the first place they appropriate $2,000,000 when there are but $700,000 to pay, and then the service is to cost $5,000,000, without increasing the sum!

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. Mr. President—

Mr. CONKLING. I ask the Senator to allow me to send up an amendment which, if this is persevered in, I will ask to have read. It avoids the errors the Senator from Minnesota has referred to. I move it as an amendment.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I will say nothing about the propriety of offering this amendment on this bill; but whenever the question comes up on the merits of the respective propositions that have been presented I shall be prepared to discuss the merits either with the Senator from New York or the Senator from Kansas. We have had various propositions here—some offering subsidies, some offering to guaranty bonds, some offering postages, and some offering to allow the materials of which the vessels were to be built to be exempt from all tariff or internal revenue taxation. Now, the chairman of the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, in order to show the ignorance of the Committee on Commerce about this business, has exposed some of his knowledge of their bill. I think that on that proposition alone the Committee on Commerce might rest content. Their bill only proposes to appropriate so much as may be received from postages not exceeding the sum of $2,000,000. The chairman of the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads is not correct even in estimating the amount now received; it is something over nine hundred thousand dollars.

Mr. RAMSEY. Here are the documents. If the Senator will turn to them and find $900,000 I shall be obliged to him.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. The amount received in any case, no matter what the increase of postages may be, is not to exceed the sum of $20,000 for each round trip. No one expects that there will be half that; but there is some ambition on the part of some portion of our country and of the Senate that we shall establish an American line of steamships with foreign countries. Every one understands that at the present moment the major part of all our commerce is brought here and carried away under a foreign flag by these large and fast-sailing steamers. It is something of an object to establish these lines, and when it can be done without any cost to the Government, except the mere postage received, I think the Congress of the United States will not hesitate long in relation to it. I do not propose now to consume any time in relation to this matter any further than I have already done.

Mr. CONKLING. I only wish to say to the Senator from Vermont, agreeing with him in the suggestions he makes, that they are all met and answered by the amendment which I have sent to the Chair. There is no subsidy, there is no exemption of materials, there is nothing except that for the naked postages these men, already provided with the materials with which to do so, propose to carry the mails in the most expeditious manner. That is all they ask. It does not exempt anything from taxation. Everything of that sort has been eliminated from the bill; and it is a simple proposition without expense to get the ocean-carriage of mails and to get it under our own flag. I move it as a substitute for the amendment offered by the Senator from Massachusetts.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It will be read.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I think we might as well adjourn. It is no use to stay here and punish ourselves. It is evident that we cannot pass this appropriation bill.

Mr. CONNESS. Yes, we can. I hope the Senator from Massachusetts will withdraw his amendment and let us go on with our work.

Mr. TRUMBULL. He has had it here for an hour, and persistently refuses to withdraw it. I move that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. WILSON. Mr. President—

Mr. TRUMBULL. I will withdraw the motion if the Senator will allow us to go on with the business.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The motion to adjourn is withdrawn.

Mr. WILSON. I think the Senate ought to sustain this amendment, and I should be very glad to have a vote upon it and a vote upon the proposition made by the Senator from New York, to test the sense of the Senate as between the two. Under the present state of affairs in the Senate I shall withdraw the amendment; and whenever—and I hope it will be very soon—we shall take up this matter I shall be prepared to declare and maintain that this proposition is the broadest, fairest, and most liberal proposition that has been made; and if anybody can show one better I am ready for that.

Mr. CONKLING. I will show one better at that time.

Mr. WILSON. I withdraw the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment is withdrawn.

The bill was reported to the Senate, as amended.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on concurring in the amendments made as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I ask to except the amendment in regard to the post office at Springfield, Ohio, and let the vote be taken on the others together.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That exception will be made. The question is on concurring in the amendments made as in Committee of the Whole, with that exception.

The other amendments were concurred in.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I ask for the vote on the amendment making appropriation to build a post office at the town of Springfield, Ohio.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on concurring in that amendment.

Mr. RAMSEY. Before that is done I should like to have the letter read that the Senate declined hearing before when we put on the appropriation.

Mr. CONNESS. I hope the honorable Senator will allow this to go with the other amendments, that it may be considered in conference, where the bill will have to go. It will only delay us to have these papers read. It is a very small matter at best.

Mr. RAMSEY. If we are going to vote on this question I should like the letter of Mr. SHELLABARGER to be read.

Mr. TRUMBULL. This appropriation ought not to go on the bill. I object to it.

Mr. CONNESS. Let the amendment be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It will be read.

The Secretary read the amendment, as follows:

And be it further enacted, That the Postmaster General is hereby authorized to purchase for a post office the lot and building at the southwest corner of Lime-stone and High streets, in Springfield, Ohio, known as the Episcopal church property, for the sum of $10,000: Provided, however, That the entire cost to be paid by the United States for the said property and fitting it up for a post office shall not exceed the sum herein appropriated.

Mr. SHERMAN. I will state the facts in regard to that. It is a matter in which my colleague, Mr. SHELLABARGER, who is about to leave the House of Representatives, takes a very deep interest, and you will find letters on file from him and also a letter from the Postmaster General and from the First Assistant Postmaster General recommending it. Springfield is a town of about sixteen thousand inhabitants; a rapidly-growing town. A church in the heart of the city has recently been substantially purchased by the citizens there with a view to remove the church to an outlying part of the city and build a very fine one. In connection with building a new church it has been proposed by the citizens to buy this property and substantially donate it to the Government of the United States upon the Government paying $10,000. The property is worth a great deal more. They want this particular site, which is right in the center of the city, selected for a post office, and the facts in regard to the expense are these: the present rent is about twenty-four hundred dollars, and the building now occupied by the post office must be abandoned and considerably more rent will have to be paid for the necessary accommodations. There is not only a population of sixteen thousand, but there is a considerable population around getting their mail matter there. On the whole the Postmaster General was of the opinion that it was better to take this property and let it be fitted up with the limitation that the expense should not exceed $10,000, fitted up solely for a post office in a central position. On the whole the Government will make by it. They would have to pay probably in four years, perhaps in three years, more rent than they would have to pay for this building complete. They substantially get the building at little or no cost.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Will the Senator from Ohio allow me to ask him if he is prepared, as chairman of the Finance Committee, to recommend the building of post offices in all towns of this size throughout the country?

Mr. SHERMAN. I would recommend the building of a post office in any town under the same circumstances. That town substantially contributes the site. It is a matter in which Mr. SHELLABARGER takes very deep interest, and I trust the Senate will allow it to go on the bill for his benefit. He lives in the place, and I think it is manifestly for the interest of the Government, and I trust therefore the Senator from Illinois will not press his objection. If similar circumstances arise in any other city I certainly should vote for building a post office there.

The question being taken on concurring in the amendment, a division was called for; and the ayes were eight.

Several SENATORS. Give it up.

Mr. SHERMAN. I do not give it up. I think this opposition is unreasonable under the circumstances.

Mr. POMEROY. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. CONKLING. I am going to vote against this, and I wish to say to the Senator from Ohio that I shall not be unreasonable in doing it. In the city in which I live, for example, there is a much stronger case than this presented; and yet I do not feel at liberty to vote for an appropriation there, although nothing, absolutely nothing has ever been done to provide by the Government a public building there for any public purpose.

Mr. GRIMES. What is the population?

Mr. CONKLING. Much larger than here.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 16, nays 20; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Conness, Corbett, Drake, Nye, Osborn, Pomeroy, Ramsey, Rice, Robertson, Ross, Sherman, Sumner, Thayer, Van Winkle, Warner, and Welch—16.

NAYS—Messrs. Anthony, Cattell, Chandler, Cole, Conkling, Edmunds, Grimes, Harlan, Harris, Hendricks, Howe, McGreevy, McDonald, Morgan, Morrill of Maine, Morrill of Vermont, Sawyer, Sprague, Stewart, and Trumbull—20.

ABSENT—Messrs. Abbott, Bayard, Buckalew, Cameron, Cragin, Davis, Dixon, Doolittle, Ferry, Fessenden, Fowler, Frelinghuysen, Henderson, Howard, Kellogg, Morton, Norton, Patterson of New Hampshire, Patterson of Tennessee, Pool, Salisbury, Spencer, Tipton, Vickers, Wade, Whyte, Willey, Williams, Wilson, and Yates—30.

So the amendment was non-concurred in.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed, and the bill to be read a third time. The bill was read the third time, and passed.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CLINTON LLOYD, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had passed the following bills of the Senate:

A bill (S. No. 228) for the further security of equal rights in the District of Columbia;

A bill (S. No. 753) to provide for the execution of judgments in capital cases;

A bill (S. No. 810) to regulate elections in Washington and Idaho Territories;

A bill (S. No. 836) for the relief of Celestra P. Hartt; and

A bill (S. No. 891) for the relief of George Fowler and the estate of De Grasse Fowler, deceased, or their assigns.

THE DEFICIENCY BILL.

Mr. HOWE. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill No. 1911, making appropriations to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the service of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1869, and for other purposes.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

Mr. POMEROY. I suppose the Senate desires to adjourn now.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. We must pass the deficiency bill to-night if we intend to make any progress.

The bill was read.

The first amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was to strike out from the commencement of line thirteen to line forty-nine, in the following words:

And after the present fiscal year there shall only be employed and paid for labor in the Treasury building and the five other buildings used by the Department for lighting, cleaning, and general care and superintendence thereof the following persons, to wit: one superintendent, at a salary of $2,500 a year; one clerk of class four and one clerk of class one; one engineer in charge of heating apparatus, at a salary of $1,200 a year; five firemen, at a salary of $600 each per year; one machinist and gas-fitter, at a salary of $1,200 per year; one captain of the watch, at a salary of $1,400 per year; one storekeeper, at a salary of $1,000 per year; thirty watchmen, at a salary of $820 each per year; thirty laborers, at a salary of $800 each per year; seventy women as cleaners, at a salary of $180 each per year. And it is hereby provided, That no account for contingent expenses at any of the bureaus of the Treasury Department shall hereafter be allowed, except on the certificate of the general superintendent of the Treasury buildings that they are necessary and proper, and that the prices paid are just and reasonable; and that the said superintendent shall keep a full, just, and accurate account in detail of all amounts expended under the head of contingent expenses for the several bureaus of the Treasury Department, which shall be transmitted to Congress by the Secretary of the Treasury at every December session. And the expenditure for furniture and repairs for the same shall be made by the said superintendent, subject to the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury; and it shall be the duty of said superintendent to keep a just and accurate account in detail of all the amounts paid for the purchase of furniture, and also for the repairs thereof, as well as a full statement of the disposition of the old furniture; all of which shall be transmitted to Congress at every December session thereof by the Secretary of the Treasury.

And to insert in lieu thereof:

Provided, That hereafter no disbursements shall be made from any contingent fund nor from any appropriation made for the purchase of furniture or for the repairs of the same except upon an account duly audited and allowed by the proper accounting officers of the Treasury Department, and a full, just, and accurate account in detail of all such disbursements shall be annually rendered to Congress at the December session thereof by the Secretary of the Treasury.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in line fifty-seven, before the word "provided," to strike out the words "it is hereby."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in line fifty-eight, after the word "this" and before "act," to insert "or any subsequent;" so as to read:

And provided further, That no part of the appropriations made by this or any subsequent act for contingent and incidental expenses shall be paid for clerk hire, messengers, or laborers.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to insert after line sixty-three the following:

Provided, That no extra compensation shall hereafter be allowed to any officer or person for disbursing any moneys appropriated to the construction of any public building.

Mr. COLE. I am strongly of the impression that that amendment ought not to prevail. I believe it is customary when public officers are required to discharge the duty of disbursing public moneys to allow them as a compensation for the responsibility and trouble a small fraction of a percentage, perhaps one fourth of one per cent. This proviso, it seems to me, will cut off all that. I do not see what inducement, therefore, a public officer can have for discharging this extra duty, a duty above the ordinary duties of the office. The collector of the port has to discharge many duties of this kind, and so it is, perhaps, with other public officers; and if they are not to have, as has been customary heretofore, any compensation whatever they will be disposed to decline the duty. I think this amendment ought not to be adopted.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. WILLIAMS, (at twelve o'clock and twenty minutes.) There is nobody here paying any attention to this business. I move that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Had we not better meet at ten o'clock in the morning?

Mr. ANTHONY. I do not see the Senator from Maine here.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The Senator from Wisconsin has charge of this bill.

Mr. HOWE. All our amendments have to be engrossed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Discussion is not in order. The question is on the motion to adjourn.

The question being put, there were on a division—ayes eleven.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I think we had better have the yeas and nays. ["Oh, no!"] I withdraw the call.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Take the negative.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will be obliged to request Senators to resume their seats that we may proceed intelligently. The Chair will take the count again.

The question being again put, there were, on a division—ayes 17, nays 18; no quorum voting.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Mr. HENDRICKS, and others, called for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. MORRILL of Maine. I want to say one word. If there is any purpose to pass the appropriation bills this bill must be passed to-night, because there will be three bills to-morrow—

Mr. GRIMES. What are they?

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. The Senator asks what they are. There is this bill, the deficiency bill, the Army appropriation bill, and the miscellaneous bill.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Which ones are here now?

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. The deficiency bill and the Army bill. If this is not passed to-night it is an abandonment of this bill or some other bill.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I ask the Senator from Maine if he expects to carry the Army bill with that Massachusetts claim?

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. It is not for the Senator from Maine to answer. The Senator from Maine proposes to present to the Senate all the appropriation bills that come from the House if the Senate chooses to hear them.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will call the roll on the motion to adjourn.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I yield my own judgment at the earnest desire of the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations and vote against the motion.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 7, nays 28; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Edmunds, Grimes, Harlan, McGreevy, Pomeroy, Ross, and Williams—7.

NAYS—Messrs. Anthony, Cattell, Cole, Conkling, Corbett, Cragin, Harris, Hendricks, Howe, McDonald, Morgan, Morrill of Maine, Morrill of Vermont, Nye, Osborn, Patterson of New Hampshire, Ramsey, Rice, Robertson, Sawyer, Sprague, Stewart, Thayer, Trumbull, Van Winkle, Warner, Welch, and Wilson—28.

ABSENT—Messrs. Abbott, Bayard, Buckalew, Cameron, Chandler, Conness, Davis, Dixon, Doolittle, Drake, Ferry, Fessenden, Fowler, Frelinghuysen, Henderson, Howard, Kellogg, Morton, Norton, Patterson of Tennessee, Pool, Saulsbury, Sherman, Spencer, Sumner, Tipton, Vickers, Wade, Whyte, Willey, and Yates—31.

So the Senate refused to adjourn.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was to strike out from line sixty-nine to line seventy-six, inclusive, as follows:

For necessary expenses in carrying into effect the several acts of Congress, authorizing loans and the issue of Treasury notes, $400,000: Provided, That no work shall be done in the Engraving and Printing Bureau for private parties: And provided further, That no part of the money hereby appropriated shall be paid for clerk hire or other service except to persons actually engaged in producing such issues in the Bureau of Engraving and Printing.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to strike out lines seventy-seven and seventy-eight, as follows:

For supplying deficiency in the fund for the relief of sick and disabled seamen, $50,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to insert after line one hundred and twenty-three the following:

Senate deficiency:
For clerks to committees, pages, horses, and carryalls, $30,000.

For heating and ventilating, $5,000.

For miscellaneous items, $15,000.

For stationery for committees and the Secretary's office, $5,000.

For additional messengers, $3,500.

For stationery and newspapers for Senators for the third session of the Thirty-Ninth Congress, $9,000.

Mr. HOWE. I move to amend the amendment in line one hundred and twenty-nine by striking out the words "for committees and the Secretary's office;" so that it will read: "For stationery, $5,000."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HOWE. I move further to amend the amendment by inserting after the appropriation for additional messengers the following:

For folding documents and materials, $5,000.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment, as amended, was agreed to.

The next amendment was to strike out from line one hundred and thirty-seven to line one hundred and forty-seven inclusive, in the following words:

New Mexico:

For salary of the secretary of the Territory, as ex officio superintendent of the public grounds, from July 28, 1868, to June 30, 1869, at $1,000 per annum, $920 38: Provided, That after the expiration of the present fiscal year the said secretary shall only receive $2,000 per annum, and no more, in full compensation for all official services, whether as secretary or superintendent of public buildings and grounds.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was after line one hundred and forty-seven, to strike out the following clause:

Colorado:

For supplying deficiency in the appropriation for the salaries of the Governor, Judges, and secretary, caused by the increase of compensation to the judges by act of March 2, 1867, $1,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in line one hundred and fifty-six, to strike out "five" and insert "two," and in line one hundred and fifty-seven to insert the words "one hundred;" so that the clause will read:

Dakota:

For amount required to pay the increased salaries to the judges of Dakota Territory authorized by the act of March 2, 1867, $2,100.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was after line one hundred and sixty-two, to strike out the following clause:

For refunding to the appropriation for the legislative expenses of Idaho Territory the amount advanced from this fund and not accounted for by the secretary of said Territory, $38,000.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I hope that amendment will not be agreed to.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I think myself it ought not to be.

Mr. HOWE. I also think it ought not to be agreed to. The committee had no information before them on the subject, and it was stricken out because we found that only $20,000 was appropriated last year; but I learn since that this is to replace a former appropriation which was made away with.

Mr. WILLIAMS. The secretary of the Territory absconded with it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. THAYER in the chair.) The question is on the amendment of the committee striking out this clause. The amendment was rejected.

The next amendment was in the appropriations for Montana Territory, after line one hundred and seventy to strike out the following clause:

For amount required to pay outstanding liabilities on account of compensation and mileage of members of the Legislative Assembly, officers, clerks, and contingent expenses of the Assembly, $20,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to strike out after line one hundred and ninety-one the following clause:

For compensation and mileage of the members of the Legislative Assembly and pay of officers and clerks and contingent expenses of the Assembly, $10,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to insert after line one hundred and ninety-four the following:

Interior Department:

For amount to supply deficiency in the contingent expenses of the Indian department, $11,500.

Mr. HARLAN. I should like to have an explanation of that amendment before it is adopted. If there is no explanation I hope it may not be adopted.

Mr. HOWE. Let that be passed by for the present.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It will be laid aside for the present.

The next amendment was to insert after line two hundred and seventeen the following words:

For the construction of a barge office at New York, $50,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ANTHONY. As I understand from the Senator in charge of this bill that amendments are being made other than those reported by the committee, as we go along, I desire to move an amendment to come in on page 6. It is the amendment of which I gave notice.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. We are now proceeding with the committee's amendments.

Mr. ANTHONY. I hope this amendment will be allowed to go in now.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. But you will go away if we agree to the amendment.

Mr. ANTHONY. Oh, no; I will not. It is to insert on page 6, after line one hundred and twenty-three, the following:

For Congressional Globe and Appendix, $29,842, or so much thereof as may be necessary to complete the work under the contract expiring March 3, 1869.

This is required for the Senate precisely as the similar appropriations in the bill are required for the House. On account of the extra sessions that we had last year the appropriation is short.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Secretary continued the reading of the bill to the following clause:

For the construction of a public building at Springfield, Illinois, for a court-house and post office, and the accommodation of officers of the United States, $25,000.

Mr. WARNER. I should like to have an explanation from the Senator from Illinois as to the necessity of a court-house and post office at Springfield, Illinois, as he did not seem to think there was any necessity for one at Springfield, Ohio.

Mr. TRUMBULL. The Senator from Alabama must perceive that this is a building at the capital of the State of Illinois. One of these buildings is in the capital of the State, and there is an appropriation here for another at Cairo, where there is not only a post office, but a custom-house, and also a court-room, and it has been customary, I believe, always for the Government of the United States to provide a public building for custom-houses, court-houses, and post offices where they were all together. There is no custom-house, I suppose, at Springfield, Ohio, and no terms of the United States courts held there.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. No amendment is offered to this clause, and the reading will be proceeded with.

The next amendment of the committee was after line two hundred and thirty-three to strike out the following clause:

For continuing the work on the marine hospital at Chicago, $25,000.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I hope those words will not be stricken out. The Secretary of the Treasury and the architect who is the superintendent of these public works have recommended an appropriation for a larger amount than this—$50,000, I think. This is for a deficiency upon the work on the marine hospital in the city of Chicago. It is partly constructed. The walls are up, certainly above the first story, and the building is there in that half-finished state, subject to the weather, and I suppose this, being in a deficiency bill, is probably to pay liabilities already existing.

Mr. ANTHONY. What do you want a marine hospital at Chicago for?

Mr. TRUMBULL. Why, we have more commerce at Chicago than Rhode Island ever saw. The Senator from Rhode Island probably is not aware of the number of vessels and seamen that go into Chicago.

Mr. ANTHONY. Flat-boats, I suppose.

Mr. TRUMBULL. The city of Providence, Rhode Island, could be set down at Chicago and would hardly be noticed. I hope the committee will consent to let these words stand. They come from the House, and it is evidently an appropriation that is absolutely necessary in the condition of things there. It is not a question now as to the building of a marine hospital. That has been undertaken under authority of law. The building has cost more than it ought to cost. I agree to that. I do not propose to go into a discussion of this subject. I trust the committee will see the propriety of letting this appropriation stand.

Mr. HOWE. The Senate will do as they think expedient about this amendment. In my own judgment, this whole business of building marine hospitals is a profound mistake, not to call it by any harsher name than that. And yet the Government has undertaken it in a great many places, and has spent, I think, seven or eight million dollars in the construction of marine hospitals. They are expending somewhere from two to three hundred thousand dollars a year in taking care or professedly in taking care of invalid sailors. I think all these appropriations are entirely wrong. But in pursuance of this system the Government undertook to build a hospital at Chicago, and built one, and finished it, and finished the grounds all complete; and a few years ago passed an act authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to sell that hospital and grounds, and buy another site in or near Chicago, and build another hospital, upon the condition that the amount to be expended in purchasing the new site and building the new hospital should not be more than was received on the sale of the old one. They sold the old hospital for something less than one hundred and fifty thousand dollars, I believe—somewhere from one hundred and thirty to one hundred and forty thousand dollars—and they have been constructing, I understand, a new hospital. I find here an appropriation of $25,000 as a deficiency. For the work of the current year I believe there is an estimate for $100,000, to be spent the next fiscal year. What the present purpose is, how much it is proposed now to expend on that hospital, I do not know. It seems to me that the Government ought not to expend a dollar; it ought to sell what it has there, and ought to sell what it has in every other marine hospital. I want to say once more what I said here last year, that there is no reason in the world why the Government should take upon itself the support of the sailors employed in the marine service any more than there is why they should undertake to support the farmers, the tillers of the soil, or the operatives in your factories.

Mr. TRUMBULL. That opens a great question to determine whether we should dispense with all the marine hospitals in the country or not. It is hardly worth while, I think, to discuss that question in reference to this appropriation. Here is a building partly finished, and the proper Department recommends this appropriation for a deficiency. It seems to me it is one of those cases that if we appropriate any money anywhere on any showing we must do it here. I trust the words will not be stricken out. I could go into a statement that would show that there is a necessity for a marine hospital at Chicago; but I do not propose to do it on the present occasion, as I am anxious that this bill should pass as early as possible. I trust the Senate will not agree with the committee in striking out this proposition as it has been put in by the House.

Mr. HOWE. I ask the Senator from Illinois, who is usually as jealous of making unnecessary appropriations as any one, what means we have of enforcing laws which impose restrictions upon expenditures if just as often as those laws are violated we assent to the violation? When the work of building this hospital was undertaken there was the express command of law upon the Treasury Department not to exceed the amount received from that hospital. They go on in open defiance of that, and simply come in here and ask us to appropriate year after year additional sums of money to do this work, when we told them it should be done for a given sum. If we vote this money what use is it to put conditions upon the expenditures?

Mr. TRUMBULL. I quite agree with the Senator from Wisconsin that it is very improper to enter into contracts for erecting buildings to cost more than the appropriations; but it is the way all our public buildings are built. You will see in this very bill numerous appropriations to go on in the construction of works. We appropriate perhaps $100,000 for a custom-house in Boston or in Charleston; and we have got a law, or ought to have one, requiring the officers charged with the construction of these buildings not to enter into contracts for the erection of buildings to exceed the amount of the appropriations. That has been the law, and I think is the law now; and yet they cost a great deal more. I think that is wrong. I struggled here in the Senate some years ago to try and prevent that. In this very case the direction of the law was to sell the old hospital and with the funds arising from the sale to purchase a site and erect another. I do not know that there were any words of prohibition in the statute.

Mr. HOWE. Yes, sir; express.

Mr. TRUMBULL. At any rate, it meant that the new building was to be put up with that amount. Instead of that they are making it cost very considerably more; I do not know the exact amount. The Senator is right as to the purport of the law. I do not know whether the words were express words of prohibition, but at any rate that was the fair construction of the act. That was not done. You find the same thing here:

For the construction of a public building at Springfield, Illinois, for a court-house and post office and the accommodation of officers of the United States, $25,000.

Then follows an appropriation for appraisers' stores at Philadelphia, and an appropriation for a custom-house at St. Paul, Minnesota; but there was an appropriation originally of a certain amount to erect all these buildings in the first place. What authority, I ask the Senator from Wisconsin, had the officer charged with the construction of a custom-house and court-house, if you please, at Springfield, when the law appropriated $50,000 to erect that building to make a contract for a building that would cost $150,000?

Mr. HOWE. How do you know that he did?

Mr. TRUMBULL. Here is a deficiency. There would not be any deficiency unless that was so.

Mr. HOWE. That does not follow.

Mr. TRUMBULL. It certainly necessarily follows; because if the building had been constructed for the amount appropriated there would not be any deficiency.

Mr. MORRILL of Maine. Let us have a vote.

Mr. TRUMBULL. The Senator from Maine says "let us vote." I shall say no more. I hope the Senate will not agree to this amendment.

Mr. RAMSEY. You can have a committee of conference upon it.

Mr. TRUMBULL. But I ask the Senate not to strike it out. This clause was put in by the House, and there is no reason for striking it out. It has the recommendation of the Secretary.

Mr. HOWE. Let the amendment be made, and then it can go to a committee of conference.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the committee.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. COLE. With the leave of the committee, I offer an amendment to be inserted after line two hundred and thirty-five, on the tenth page:

For repairs of the custom-house at San Francisco, California, $15,000.

I find this in the list of estimates from which these other appropriations are taken, and I think it must have been by some oversight that the amount was left out. The repairs were rendered necessary by the earthquake that occurred in October last. The building was so far racked and injured as to require the front portion to be taken down entirely, and considerable other repairs to the wall inside and other portions of the building were rendered absolutely necessary. So badly, indeed, was the building injured, that it has not been occupied for the purposes for which it was built since; but it is in the process of getting repaired, and will be occupied again in a very short time. I presume it was a mere oversight that this appropriation was left out. I ask, therefore, that the amendment be adopted. It will be found on the first page of the estimates.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Is that reported by any committee?

Mr. COLE. All the rest of the items in the estimates seem to have been included in the bill except the two items that relate to California. I do not know why they were left out. Appropriations for deficiencies for buildings at Cairo, Ogdensburg, St. Paul, Madison, Springfield, Chicago, Philadelphia, and New York, and everywhere else are made, except at San Francisco. Two items are mentioned in the estimates for California, and why they should have been overlooked I cannot see. One of them is certainly absolutely necessary, rendered so by the late earthquake at that place, the custom-house building having been very badly injured by it, and the repairs have been rendered necessary on that account.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. THAYER. I send an amendment to the Chair, to follow the amendment just adopted:

For the purchase, inclosure, and preservation of a parcel of ground at Omaha, Nebraska, for a site and for the erection of a building for the use of the Federal courts, post office, and other Federal offices, $25,000.

Mr. HOWE. Has there been any notice of that amendment?

Mr. THAYER. There is a report from the Postmaster General on the subject which I will have read if it is desired.

Mr. HOWE. But has any notice been given of it to the Committee on Appropriations?

Mr. THAYER. Certainly. It was first before the Post Office Committee and approved by them, and I now offer it here.

Mr. HOWE. Has it ever been submitted to the Committee on Appropriations?

Mr. THAYER. Yes, sir; it has been in their possession for some time.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. POMEROY. Have the amendments of the committee been concluded.

Mr. TRUMBULL. The bill has not yet been read through, and I think it had better be finished.

The Secretary resumed the reading of the bill.

The next amendment was in line two hundred and fifty, to strike out "July" and insert "June."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was after line three hundred and two, to strike out the following clause:

For collecting and preparing the proceedings at the decoration of the soldiers' graves, under resolution of June 22, 1868, $2,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was after line three hundred and ten, to strike out the following clause:

For necessary repairs and furniture for the office of the register of deeds of the District of Columbia, $350.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to strike out after line three hundred and thirteen the following clause:

For a sufficient amount to pay the regular salary of the present minister resident at Portugal, and the exchange thereon, from the 1st day of July, 1866, so long as the same was withheld from him.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. POMEROY. I offer the following amendment in the language of the estimate of the Department. I read from Executive Document No. 56, second session Fortieth Congress:

For additional appropriation required to complete the survey of a line dividing the Creek country under the third and fifth articles of the treaty with the Creek nation of Indians, concluded June 14, 1866, and for surveying the exterior boundary of a grant of land to the Seminole nation of Indians under the third article of the treaty with that nation, concluded March 21, 1866, $5,000.

This amendment was agreed to first by the committee of the House of Representatives, and my colleague from the House informs me that by some means it did not get on the appropriation bill. I moved it from the Committee on Public Lands, and it was referred to the Committee on Appropriations yesterday. I suppose it is unnecessary to explain it any further than to say that the work has been done and this is a deficiency. The appropriation was made last year; but there was not enough appropriated by $5,000, and the Secretary has made this estimate, and I now move it on the appropriation bill.

Mr. HOWE. Where?

Mr. POMEROY. Under the head of "miscellaneous" on page 15, after line three hundred and forty.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. NYE. I move an amendment to come in after the amendment introduced by the Senator from Nebraska, [Mr. THAYER:]

To supply a deficiency for the payment for machinery for the branch mint at Carson City, and balance of freight on the same from Philadelphia to Carson City, $31,000.

For fitting up machinery of said mint and putting it in working order, $11,000, or so much thereof as is necessary for that purpose.

This is estimated for by the Secretary of the Interior and by the Director of the Mint, and I have shown it to the chairman of the committee.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. WARNER in the chair) put the question on the amendment and declared that the yeas appeared to have it.

Mr. NYE. Oh, that is a mistake.

Mr. WILSON. You can move it again in the Senate.

Mr. NYE. I cannot move it on anything else. The machinery is all there ready to be fitted up, and the Senate this very night made an appropriation to put this mint in operation.

This is an appropriation for the freight on the machinery and the machinery itself.

Mr. TRUMBULL. It is manifest that the Senate did not hear the report that was read some time ago when the other bill was up. There is an estimate here and a recommendation from the Secretary of the Treasury for this very thing.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. By common consent the Chair will put the question again on the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. NYE. I am instructed by the Committee on Naval Affairs to offer the following amendment, to come in at the end of the bill, and I send to the Chair the recommendation on which it is based:

Navy Department:

To supply a deficiency for provisions for the Marine corps for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1868, $2,000.

To supply a deficiency for provisions for the Marine corps for the year ending June 30, 1869, $56,000.

Mr. HOWE. What does that mean?

Mr. NYE. All that I know about it is contained in the statements that I have sent to the desk. I was directed by the Senator from Iowa, [Mr. GRIMES,] the chairman of the Naval Committee, to offer this amendment, as he thought he would not be present when this bill was considered. I ask that the statement be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

Statement of deficiency in the appropriation for provisions for the Marine corps for fiscal year ending June 30, 1868, and estimated deficiency in same appropriation for fiscal year ending June 30, 1869.

There will be required to meet deficiency in the quartermaster's department, Marine corps, in the appropriation for provisions for fiscal years ending June 30, 1868, and June 30, 1869, the sum of $99,223 65, as follows:

For deficiency for fiscal year ending 30th June, 1868..... $42,551 05

For rations for fifteen hundred and thirty-three non-commissioned officers, musicians, privates, and washerwomen for one year from 1st July, 1868, to 30th June, 1869, one ration per day each at twenty-eight cents per ration..... $156,672 60

Deduct amount appropriated per act approved 17th June, 1869..... 100,000 00

Deficiency for fiscal year ending 30th June, 1868..... 56,672 60

Total deficiency..... $99,223 65

Respectfully submitted.

W. B. SLACK,
Quartermaster Marine Corps.

Mr. HOWE. I could not hear the letter read. I could hear everything in the world but that. I do not know now whether it states what the appropriations made for the year are. It would seem as though the subsistence of a force not numbering over two thousand five hundred at the commencement of the war, and which was really reduced to eighteen hundred during the war, might be estimated for within $90,000; but I do not know that it was within $90,000.

Mr. NYE. If the Senator will allow me, I will read a portion of the report of Major Slack. That shows it very clearly. Perhaps the Secretary had better read it. I ask him to do so.

The Secretary read as follows:

HEADQUARTERS MARINE CORPS,
QUARTERMASTER'S OFFICE,
WASHINGTON, December 12, 1868.

Sir: I have the honor to submit herewith, in triplicate, with the request that they be transmitted to the honorable Secretary of the Navy, a statement of deficiency in the appropriation for "provisions Marine corps" for fiscal year ending June 30, 1868, and estimated deficiency in the same appropriation for fiscal year ending June 30, 1869.

In explanation of the deficiency in fiscal year ending June 30, 1868, I would state that in the estimate for that year rations for eighteen hundred and sixty enlisted men and washerwomen were estimated for at twenty-five cents per ration, while the average cost of rations per contract for that period was thirty cents, and in consequence of the gradual reduction of the naval forces afloat more marines were rationed on shore than had been estimated for.

In regard to the present fiscal year the number of enlisted men supposed to be on shore is fifteen hundred, and the actual cost of rations as per contracts average twenty-eight cents per ration, making the amount necessary for the year $156,672 60.

The sum appropriated by Congress was $100,000, thus leaving a deficiency of $56,672 60, which added to the actual deficiency on the 30th June, 1868, makes the sum of $99,223 65 necessary to reimburse the appropriation for provisions and meet the requirements of the service to the close of the present fiscal year.

I am, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

W. B. SLACK,

Quartermaster Marine Corps.

Brigadier General J. ZEILIN,
Commandant Marine Corps, Headquarters.

Mr. NYE. Now I ask that the letter of the Secretary of the Navy be read.

Mr. WILSON. That is enough. That tells the story. We have got to pay it anyhow.

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will call attention to an amendment of the Committee on Appropriations which was passed over. It was on page 9, after line one hundred and ninety-five, to insert:

Interior Department;

For amount required to supply a deficiency in the contingent expenses of the Interior Department, $11,500.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. That is all right.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate, as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

Mr. HOWE. The bill is still open to amendment, I believe.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is.

Mr. HOWE. I renew the amendment on the fourth page, line sixty-four, which was not agreed to in Committee of the Whole.

The Secretary read the amendment, which was to insert after line sixty-three the following proviso:

Provided, That no extra compensation shall hereafter be allowed to any officer or person for disbursing any moneys appropriated to the construction of any public building.

Mr. COLE. I do not know how the Government will be able to procure the disbursement of money for the erection of public buildings unless some compensation is offered for it, as has been the custom heretofore. The Senator from Wisconsin, who has charge of this bill, may be able to assign some reason for this amendment which I do not know of; but certainly there should be some reason given why this proviso should be inserted. Is there anything in the estimates or in the reports of the Departments on the subject?

Mr. HOWE. No. The only reason the committee had, I think, for proposing the amendment was simply this: the Government transmits money where these works are going on—deposits it in a bank; and it seems the Treasury Department is in the habit of allowing a commission of from one fourth of one per cent. to two per cent. to the bank for paying out the money. When I get any money and deposit it in bank they pay it out for nothing; and I suppose they would do it for the Government if the Government insisted on the same terms. I do not know any reason why we should pay them.

Mr. COLE. Then I move to amend the proviso, before the vote is taken upon it, by striking out the words "or person;" so that it will read:

Provided, That no extra compensation shall hereafter be allowed to any officer for disbursing any moneys appropriated to the construction of any public building.

Mr. HOWE. I hope that amendment will not be agreed to.

Mr. COLE. That will obviate the objection to the practice that the Senator from Wisconsin has, I believe. I was not aware that the banks were intrusted with the public moneys for any such purposes. I supposed they were received by the collector of the port, if there happened to be a collector at the place where the moneys were to be disbursed, and that he acted as disbursing officer; and that where there was no collector of the port at the place where a building was being erected, another officer who had given bonds, the highest officer, perhaps, in the service of the Government who had given bonds, would be the one called upon to receive and disburse the moneys. I should be willing to join with the Senator from Wisconsin in prohibiting the placing of public moneys in the hands of banks, to be disbursed. I suppose they should go into the hands of some officer who gives bond for the faithful use of the money placed in his hands, and for the proper disbursement of it.

But I really think that an officer who is called upon to perform this service should receive some small compensation for it. I believe that the compensation that has hitherto been allowed has been no more than about one fourth of one per cent. If that is too large make it one eighth of one per cent., but do not burden a public officer with this duty without making him some compensation. If it were put into the hands of a bank for this purpose it could perhaps be made the basis of its business to some extent and be of advantage to it; but that cannot be the case with a faithful public officer. He must do this work if this proviso is adopted without any compensation whatever, if he can be required to do it at all; and I do not know why a public officer could not absolutely decline this duty if there is to be no compensation attached to it.

Mr. HOWE. I guess they will not.

Mr. COLE. It will be guess work so far as the Senator is concerned.

Mr. CORBETT. Where there is a collector of customs it is usual for the Secretary of the Treasury to designate such collector to disburse this money; and I believe it has been the custom at places distant from points where there are collectors of customs, and not convenient for the disbursement of the money through a public officer, for the Secretary of the Treasury to appoint a disbursing agent to whom he allows one half of one per cent., and the disbursing agent has to give bonds for the faithful disbursement of the money. Is it not better to do that than to allow a person who does not give bonds to disburse it? It strikes me that it is more safe to do that than it is to deposit it in a bank that does not give any bonds, and that we do not know anything about, and allow the bank to disburse it. It seems to me the law is better as it is. For instance, in Carson City, where they propose to erect a mint, I suppose they will have to appoint there, as there is no collector of customs, a disbursing agent, and perhaps pay him one half of one per cent. for doing the business. It seems to me that this amendment of the committee ought not to be agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from California to the amendment.

The amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question now is on the amendment of the committee.

Mr. CORBETT. I hope the Senate will not agree to it.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let it be read.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I have it before me. It is a proviso in these words:

Provided, That no extra compensation shall hereafter be allowed to any officer or person for disbursing any moneys appropriated to the construction of any public building.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I move to amend the amendment by adding after the word "person" the words "or corporation," and striking out the word "or" before "person;" so that it will read, "No officer, person, or corporation," and save all possible question about a bank getting this. Has the Senator from Wisconsin any objection to that?

Mr. HOWE. No, sir.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment, as amended, was adopted.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I wish to ask the chairman of the committee what is the aggregate of appropriations in this bill?

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. About twenty million dollars.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I merely want to keep the run of this business on the records of the country. Mr. President, one appropriation that should be made in this bill, and which I had expected to come from the committee, that is to pay the minister at Portugal for the two years for which he has not been paid, is not in the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Indiana make a motion to amend?

Mr. HENDRICKS. Yes, sir; I make a motion to amend by inserting that clause.

Mr. HOWE. I will say to the Senator from Indiana that the reason the committee had for striking that out was because no sum was mentioned. It did not appropriate any particular sum; but merely a sum sufficient to pay him for his salary, and it was thought a committee of conference could ascertain the sum that was due and put it in, and do it in a manly way, if we are going to do it at all.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Is it in the bill now in such shape that a committee of conference can allow it?

Mr. HOWE. Yes, sir.

Mr. HENDRICKS. That is satisfactory.

Mr. President, I dare say most of these appropriations are necessary, but my object in rising was to call the attention of the Senate to the amount of money that is now appropriated in a deficiency bill. I do not blame the officers who have expended money to carry on the service as much as ordinarily I should be inclined to do, for the reason that last year when the appropriation bills were passed it was well known, as I thought, that very limited appropriations were made in some of the departments of the public service, so as to make it appear during the campaign of last year that the party was returning to a system of economy. I did not believe much in it, but I suppose it had the effect that was desired; it accomplished the end that was intended; and now this vicious mode of legislation has to be resorted to. A deficiency bill goes upon the idea that the executive department have incurred expenses that were not authorized by the legislative department. It is always vicious legislation, and it is particularly so when a party in the majority makes an appropriation with a view to that very thing. Twenty million dollars in an appropriation bill to supply deficiencies is a very extraordinarily large sum of money. Having stated the aggregate as I get it from the chairman, I am content now to allow the vote to be taken, and restore the composure of the Senator from Maine.

Mr. HARLAN. I desire to make a remark or two on the same head. I have learned privately from the Senator who has this bill in charge that some fourteen millions of this sum is for expenses incurred by the Army. Doubtless this was occasioned by the Indian war, a matter that could not be anticipated. It could not have been known when the appropriations were made for the current fiscal year that there would be a war of that magnitude on the plains.

Mr. HENDRICKS. What war is the Senator speaking of?

Mr. HARLAN. The war between the United States and the Arapahoes, Cheyennes, and Comanche Indians.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I will ask the Senator, with his permission, how many have been killed in this war? I am not speaking of women and children; but in battle, how many warriors have been killed?

Mr. POMEROY. I can answer that question; one Indian for every $1,000,000.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I am asking information from the Senator from Ohio. He is on the Indian Committee, and I know he knows or ought to know. Now, he has laid this great deficiency to the charge of a terrible war. I want to know how many warriors have been killed in battle in that war?

Mr. HARLAN. I very much regret to say that I am unable to give the number of those who may have been slain; but I had not previously learned that the importance of a campaign depended on the number of the slain. Brave and great warriors frequently achieve victories without very much bloodshed. It is said that the illustrious commander of our armies in Mexico was a general of that character and that he achieved victories by strategy as much by slaughter.

Mr. POMEROY. I think General Harney made a report on this subject a few days ago, or wrote a letter at any rate, in which he shows that it has cost us about a million dollars to kill one Indian warrior.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I think, if the statement of the Senator from Iowa be correct that this enormous appropriation of $20,000,000 is mainly to be attributed to the Indian war, that even the statement of General Harney is not entirely accurate; for here is an appropriation of $20,000,000, and I understand that the generals have succeeded in killing six Indian warriors in the war.

Mr. STEWART. As many as that?

Mr. HENDRICKS. They have succeeded in killing six warriors; so that it is much more than a million dollars apiece.

Mr. HOWE. How many does the Senator think they ought to have killed? [Laughter.]

Mr. HENDRICKS. Mr. President, I think this: that it is all a pretense and a sham when you tell me that there is a war and nobody is hurt. There has been a waste and a squandering of the public money I have no doubt, but there is no war that will furnish the Senator from Iowa the defense he seeks to make. I know that the border men at a small expense used to make war at a very different rate from this when the Indians invaded the settlements.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed, and the bill to be read a third time. It was read the third time, and passed.

ARMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the Army appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I now move that the Senate adjourn.

HOOR OF MEETING.

Mr. RAMSEY. I hope the Senator will withdraw that motion for one moment. I wish to move that when the Senate adjourn it adjourns to meet to-morrow at twelve o'clock. We have but one or two appropriation bills left, and we shall probably be late rising in the morning and will be continuously, in session all day to-morrow and the next day. I therefore move that when the Senate adjourn it adjourns to meet at twelve o'clock to-morrow.

Mr. ANTHONY. I think we had better have all the time we can.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. THAYER.) The question is on the motion of the Senator from Minnesota, that when the Senate adjourn it be to meet to-morrow at twelve o'clock.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, March 2, 1869.

The House met at ten o'clock a. m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. C. B. BOYNTON.

STRENGTHENING THE PUBLIC CREDIT.

The SPEAKER. The reading of the Journal has been dispensed with, and the House resumes the consideration of the motion to suspend the rules to take up and non-concur in the amendments of the Senate to the bill to strengthen the public credit.

Mr. SCHENCK. I yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts, from the select Committee on Prince Edward Island, submitted a report; which was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

The resolution to print extra copies was, under the law, referred to the Committee on Printing.

REPORTING THE DEBATES.

Mr. LAFLIN. I ask the unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table Senate joint resolution No. 231, providing for the reporting and publication of the debates in Congress. It is perfectly satisfactory to have that passed as it came from the Senate.

Mr. ROBINSON. We do not object if it is proposed to pass the Senate joint resolution without amendment. We do object to the resolution being amended. It is right as it is, and ought to pass immediately.

Mr. KERR. I think there is no objection to it.

The resolution was taken up, and read as follows:

Be it resolved, &c., That the joint Committee of Congress on Public Printing is hereby authorized to contract on behalf of the General Government with Rives & Bailey for the reporting and publication of the debates of Congress for the term of two years on and from the 4th day of March, 1869: Provided, That before the United States shall be called on to pay for any reporting or the publication of the debates the accounts therefor shall be submitted to the joint Committee on Public Printing or to such other officer or officers of Congress as they may designate, and on their or his approbation thereof, as being in all respects according to the contract, it shall be paid for from the Treasury of the United States, after having passed the proper accounting officers thereof.

SEC. 2. And be it further resolved, That in case the joint Committee on Public Printing are unable to conclude a satisfactory contract with the said Rives & Bailey, or that they be unable to fulfill any contract that they may make, the joint Committee on Public Printing be authorized to have the debates reported and printed under the direction of the Congressional Printer at the Government Printing Office.

SEC. 3. And be it further resolved, That for the purpose aforesaid there be appropriated and paid out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated the sum of $350,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary.

The Senate joint resolution was ordered to a third reading; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. LAFLIN moved to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

NEWPORT AND CINCINNATI BRIDGE.

Mr. SCHENCK. I will yield to my colleague [Mr. CARY] to move to take up without objection a joint resolution on the Speaker's table.

Mr. CARY. I ask unanimous consent to take up from the Speaker's table a joint resolution (S. R. No. 219) giving the assent of the United States to the construction of the Newport and Cincinnati bridge.

Mr. HOLMAN. I have no objection if two or three little pension bills can be taken up also.

Mr. CARY. The gentleman will not object to this, I am sure.

Mr. HOLMAN. I will not.

The joint resolution was accordingly taken up and read a first and second time. It proposes to give the consent of Congress to the erection of a bridge over the Ohio river from the city of Cincinnati, Ohio, to the city of Newport, Kentucky, by the Newport and Cincinnati Bridge Company, a corporation chartered and organized under the laws of each of the States of Kentucky and Ohio. The bridge is to be built with an unbroken or continuous span of not less than four hundred feet in the clear, from pier to pier, over the main channel of the river, and to be built in all other respects in accordance with the conditions and limitations of an act entitled "An act to establish certain post roads," approved July 14, 1862. The bridge, when completed in the manner specified, is to be deemed and taken to be a legal structure, and to be a post road for the transmission of the mails of the United States; but Congress reserves the right to withdraw the assent hereby given in case the free navigation of the river shall at any time be substantially and materially obstructed by any bridge to be erected under the authority of the resolution, or direct the necessary modifications and alterations of said bridge.

The joint resolution was ordered to be read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. CARY moved to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

DENVER PACIFIC RAILWAY.

Mr. SCHENCK. I yield to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. PRICE] to move to take up a bill by unanimous consent.

Mr. PRICE. I ask unanimous consent to take up from the Speaker's table a Senate bill (S. No. 871) to authorize the transfer of lands granted to the Union Pacific Railway Company, eastern division, between Denver and the point of its connection with the Union Pacific railroad, to the Denver Pacific Railway and Telegraph Company; and to expedite the completion of railroads to Denver, in the Territory of Colorado.

The bill was accordingly taken up and read a first and second time. It authorizes the Pacific Railway Company, eastern division, to contract with the Denver Pacific Railway and Telegraph Company for the construction and operation of that part of its line of road and telegraph between Denver City and its point of connection with the Union Pacific railroad, which point shall be at Cheyenne, and to adopt the road-bed already graded by said Denver Pacific Railway and Telegraph Company as the said line, and grant to the said railway company the perpetual use of its roadway and depot grounds, and transfer to it all the rights and privileges, subject to all the obligations pertaining to said part of its line. Section two provides that the Union Pacific railroad, eastern division, shall extend its railroad and telegraph to the City of Denver, so as to form a continuous line from Kansas City by way of Denver to Cheyenne. Section three authorizes the said companies to mortgage their respective portions of said road for an amount not exceeding $32,000 per mile, and to enable them to do so each company is granted alternate sections of land along their respective lines, the same as is provided by law in the case of lands granted to the Union Pacific railroad, provided that neither of the companies shall be entitled to subsidy in United States bonds under the provisions of this act.

Mr. JULIAN. I ask the gentleman from Iowa to allow me to move an amendment.

Mr. PRICE. That will lose the bill, as I cannot hold the floor.

Mr. JULIAN. I only wish to move to amend by providing that the lands transferred from one company to the other shall be sold to actual settlers only, in quantities not greater than a quarter section to each settler, and at a price not exceeding $2 50 an acre.

Mr. PRICE. It cannot be amended.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. PRICE moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

PACIFIC RAILROAD.

Mr. McCORMICK presented resolutions of the Legislature of Missouri on the subject of the Pacific railroad; which were referred to the Committee on the Pacific Railroad.

Mr. SCHENCK. I yield now to the gentlemen from New York.

EAST RIVER BRIDGE.

Mr. ROBINSON. I ask unanimous consent to take up from the Speaker's table the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 1304) to establish a bridge across the East river between the cities of Brooklyn and New York, in the State of New York, a post road. I hope there will be no objections. This is the greatest work of the age.

Mr. FARNSWORTH objected, but on Mr. ROBINSON's earnest request withdrew the objection.

There being no objection the amendments of the Senate were taken up and read, as follows:

Strike out all after the word "that," in line fifteen, as follows: Nothing herein contained shall be construed so as to legalize any structure which shall materially injure the navigation of said river; and insert in lieu thereof:

The said bridge shall be so constructed and built as not to obstruct, impair, or injuriously modify the navigation of the river; and in order to secure compliance with these conditions the company, previous to commencing the construction of the bridge, shall submit to the Secretary of War a plan of the bridge, with a detailed map of the river at the proposed site of the bridge, and for the distance of a mile above and below the site, exhibiting the depths and currents at all points of the same, together with all other information touching said bridge and river as may be deemed requisite by the Secretary of War to determine whether the said bridge when built will conform to the prescribed conditions of the bill, not to obstruct, impair, or injuriously modify the navigation of the river.

Add to the bill the following additional sections:
SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That the Secretary of War is hereby authorized and directed, upon receiving said plan and map and other information, and upon being satisfied that a bridge built on such plan and at said locality will conform to the prescribed conditions of this bill, not to obstruct, impair, or injuriously modify the navigation of said river, to notify the said company that he approves the same; and upon receiving such notification the said company may proceed to the erection of said bridge, conforming strictly to the approved plan and location. But until the Secretary of War approve the plan and location of said bridge and notify said company of the same in writing the bridge shall not be built or commenced; and should any change be made in the plan of the bridge during the progress of the work thereon such change shall be subject likewise to the approval of the Secretary of War.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That Congress shall have power at any time to alter, amend, or repeal this act.

Mr. ROBINSON moved that the amendments of the Senate be concurred in.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. ROBINSON moved to reconsider the vote by which the amendments of the Senate were concurred in; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

NORMAN WIARD.

Mr. SCHENCK. I ask unanimous consent to report back from the joint select Committee on Ordnance a bill for the relief of Norman Wiard, with a substitute.

Mr. CULLOM. Does not the bill contain a large appropriation?

Mr. SCHENCK. The amount is to be paid out of funds already appropriated.

The SPEAKER. The Chair would state to the gentleman from Ohio that his motion to suspend the rules being now pending the bill cannot be reported except by unanimous consent.

Mr. SCHENCK. I am aware of that.

Mr. DAWES. I object.

Mr. STEVENS. I call for the regular order of business.

Mr. SCHENCK. I hope the gentleman from Massachusetts will withdraw his objection and allow me to make a brief explanation.

Mr. DAWES. I withdraw the objection.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New Hampshire [Mr. STEVENS] has demanded the regular order of business.

Mr. STEVENS. As I understand this is a matter in which the gentleman from Ohio feels a strong personal interest, I withdraw the demand for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The bill will be read, and then the Chair will ask for objections.

The bill was read. It authorizes and directs the Secretary of the Navy to pay the sum of $125,848 49 to Norman Wiard out of any appropriation made for the support of the Navy Department, provided that sum be accepted by him as in full for all guns of steel made by him and delivered in 1861, and afterward sold by the Navy Department, he not having been paid for them, and in full for all expenditures incurred in making experimental guns for the Government in 1863 and 1864 under a joint agreement with the War and Navy Departments.

Mr. SCHENCK. I ask consent to explain the bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio asks for a few moments to explain the bill before the Chair asks for objection. If there is no objection the gentleman will have five minutes. The Chair hears none.

Mr. SCHENCK. There is a very full report on this subject from the joint select Committee on Ordnance containing all the proofs and statements in the case. This is the unanimous report of the joint select committee, consisting of Senators and Representatives.

The case disclosed is simply this: Mr. Wiard, under a contract with the Government to make steel guns, bought the steel and other material, paid for it all in gold at the time, did the work, and delivered the guns to the Government; but there was some difficulty about the contract, and he never was paid. His guns have been sold and the money derived from the sale paid into the Treasury, and Mr. Wiard now stands knocking at the door of Congress asking for relief.

Mr. HARDING. When was this steel bought?

Mr. SCHENCK. In 1862 and 1863, during the war. It is all disclosed in the report of the committee; there is a very full report, giving the whole testimony in the case. A bill for his relief, two bills I believe, the substance of both of which is embraced in this one, passed the House and went to the Senate, but failed there simply for want of time. The very Senator who objected to it, thinking injustice had been done, at the very next session introduced a similar bill in the Senate; but that also failed for want of time.

The matter was then referred to the joint select Committee on Ordnance, consisting of three Senators and three Representatives; they have investigated the whole subject from beginning to end, and the Senators and Representatives of whom the committee is composed are unanimously of opinion that it is a clear, strong, just case, and that the lowest amount that ought to be paid to that gentleman is the sum proposed in this bill. We also find that no special appropriation for this purpose is necessary, for there is a sufficient amount under the control of the Navy Department to pay this claim. We therefore propose that it shall be paid out of appropriations already made for the Navy Department. No interest has been computed in making up the amount.

Mr. HARDING. What was the gross amount of purchases for this purpose made by this claimant?

Mr. SCHENCK. I do not recollect; it is all in the report. The price allowed is the actual contract price without any interest.

Mr. WARD. I must object to the consideration of this bill at this time. I do not think we should pass a bill of this description—

The SPEAKER. Objection being made, the bill is not before the House.

Mr. WARD. I desire to say that I do not think we should pass bills of this importance without there being a quorum present.

Mr. SCHENCK. I can only say that I have been trying for one month to get an opportunity to make this report, but have been prevented from doing so.

The SPEAKER. The bill is not before the House, objection being made by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. WARD.]

Mr. SCHENCK. Then I call for the regular order.

PUBLIC DEBT—GOLD CONTRACTS.

The SPEAKER. The regular order of business is the consideration of the motion of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. SCHENCK,] pending at the adjournment last night, to suspend the rules for the purpose of non-concurring in and asking a committee of conference upon the amendments of the Senate to House bill No. 1744, to strengthen the public credit and relating to contracts for the payment of coin.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Is this debatable?

The SPEAKER. It is not. A motion to suspend the rules is not debatable, nor pending such a motion is it in order for a member to call for the reading of the amendments of the Senate, for the motion is to suspend all rules, even the rule which gives any member the right to call for the reading of the amendments. But as they are brief they will be read if there be no objection.

No objection was made.

The amendments of the Senate to the first section were to strike out "interest bearing" before "obligations of the United States;" also strike out the words "provided, however, that before any of said interest-bearing obligations not already due shall mature or be paid before maturity the obligations not bearing interest, known as United States notes, shall be made convertible into coin at the option of the holder;" so that the section would read as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That in order to remove any doubt as to the purpose of the Government to discharge all just obligations to the public creditors, and to settle conflicting questions and interpretations of the laws by virtue of which such obligations have been contracted, it is hereby provided and declared that the faith of the United States is solemnly pledged to the payment in coin, or its equivalent, of all the obligations of the United States, except in cases where the law authorizing the issue of any such obligation has expressly provided that the same may be paid in lawful money or other currency than gold and silver.

The amendment to the second section was to strike out the words "and on the trial of a suit brought for the enforcement of any such contract proof of the real consideration may be given;" so that the section would read as follows:

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That any contract hereafter made specifically payable in coin, and the consideration of which may be a loan of coin, or a sale of property or the rendering of labor or service of any kind the price of which as carried into the contract may have been adjusted on the basis of the coin value thereof at the time of such sale or the rendering of such service or labor, shall be legal and valid, and may be enforced according to its terms.

Also amend the title so as to read "An act relating to the public debt."

The question was taken upon the motion to suspend the rules; and upon a division there were—ayes 50, noes 18; no quorum voting.

The SPEAKER. The Chair can appoint tellers under the rule, but is of opinion that there is hardly a quorum present.

Mr. SCHENCK. I move a call of the House.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I ask the gentleman to yield a moment to enable me to ask a non-concurrence in some Senate amendments.

Mr. SCHENCK. I will withdraw my motion for a call of the House and yield to the gentleman.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I am directed by the Committee on Reconstruction to ask unanimous consent for the House to non-concur in the amendments of the Senate to the bill for the removal of disabilities and ask a committee of conference.

Mr. FERRISS. I object.

Mr. SCHENCK. I withdraw the motion for a call of the House, and ask for the yeas and nays on the motion to suspend the rules.

Mr. STEVENS. I renew the motion for a call of the House, and on that motion ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 42, nays 81, not voting 99; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Archer, Delos R. Ashley, Bailey, Beatty, Benjamin, Buckley, Benjamin F. Butler, Roderick B. Butler, Calk, Cary, Sidney Clarke, Cobb, Coburn, Daws, Eckley, Eila, Thomas D. Eliot, Ferriss, French, Harding, Hotchkiss, Julian, Kellogg, Kelsey, Koontz, Lush, Loughbridge, Lynch, Mallory, Miller, Moore, Mullins, Niblack, Norris, Pile, Poland, Spalding, Stevens, Stover, Twichell, James F. Wilson, and Wood—42.

NAYS—Messrs. Allison, Arnell, James M. Ashley, Baker, Beaman, Beck, Bingham, Blackburn, Blair, Boutwell, Boyden, Bromwell, Brooks, Broomall, Burr, Callis, Churchill, Clift, Corley, Calum, Dawes, Dockery, Donnelly, Driggs, Eldridge, Farnsworth, Ferry, Fields, Garfield, Isaac, Gove, Haughey, Holman, Hooper, Hopkins, Chester D. Hubbard, Hulburd, Hunter, Jencks, Thomas L. Jones, Kerr, Ketcham, Knott, Lafin, Lincoln, Loan, Maynard, McCarthy, McCormick, McKee, Mercur, Moorhead, Morrell, O'Neill, Perham, Peters, Plants, Pomeroy, Price, Prince, Robertson, Robinson, Roots, Schenck, Scotfield, Shanks, Smith, Starkweather, Stokes, Sypher, Taber, Lawrence S. Trimble, Van Aernam, Van Auker, Burt Van Horn, Robert T. Van Horn, Ward, Henry D. Washburn, William B. Washburn, Welker, and Windom—81.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Adams, Ames, Anderson, Axtell, Baldwin, Banks, Barnes, Barnum, Benton, Blaine, Boles, Bowen, Boyer, Buckland, Chanler, Reader W. Clarke, Cook, Cornell, Covode, Delano, Dickey, Dixon, Dodge, Edwards, Eggleston, James T. Elliott, Fox, Getz, Glossbrenner, Golladay, Gravelly, Griswold, Grover, Haight, Halsey, Hamilton, Hawkins, Heaton, Higby, Hill, Asahel W. Hubbard, Richard D. Hubbard, Humphrey, Ingersoll, Johnson, Alexander H. Jones, Judd, Kelley, Kitchen, George V. Lawrence, William Lawrence, Logan, Marshall, Marvin, McCullough, Morrissey, Mungen, Myers, Newcomb, Newsam, Nicholson, Nunn, Orth, Paine, Pettis, Phelps, Pierce, Pike, Polsey, Pruyn, Randall, Raum, Ross, Sawyer, Selye, Shellabarger, Sitgreaves, Stewart, Stone, Taffe, Taylor, Thomas, Tift, John Trimble, Trowbridge, Upson, Van Trump, Van Wyck, Vidal, Cadwalader C. Washburn, Elihu B. Washburne, Whittemore, Thomas Williams, William Williams, John T. Wilson, Stephen F. Wilson, Woodbridge, Woodward, and Young—59.

So a call of the House was not ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question recurs on the motion of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SCHENCK] to suspend the rules for the purpose of non-concurring in the amendments of the Senate to the bill to strengthen the public credit, &c., and asking the appointment of a committee of conference.

Mr. SCHENCK. I withdraw the call for the yeas and nays.

Mr. STEVENS. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. I desire to know whether it is in order now to move to suspend the rules for the purpose of concurring in the amendments of the Senate.

The SPEAKER. A motion to suspend the rules is already pending, and such a motion is not amendable.

The question being taken on the motion to suspend the rules, there were—ayes 76, noes 37.

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. I call for tellers.

Mr. HOLMAN. I call for the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER. The demand for the yeas and nays takes precedence of the demand for tellers.

On ordering the yeas and nays, there were—ayes 16, noes 93.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I call for tellers on ordering the yeas and nays.

Tellers were not ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question recurs on the demand of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. LOUGHRIDGE] for tellers on the motion to suspend the rules.

Tellers were not ordered.

The SPEAKER. Two thirds having voted in the affirmative, the motion of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SCHENCK] to suspend the rules for the purpose of non-concurring in the amendments of the Senate, and asking the appointment of a committee of conference, is agreed to.

MISCELLANEOUS APPROPRIATION BILL.

The House resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 2007) making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1870, and for other purposes.

Mr. SPALDING. I call the previous question on the amendments reported from the Committee of the Whole and the amendments offered in the House.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

The SPEAKER. If the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SPALDING] desires to speak on this bill he must do so before the House proceeds to vote on the amendments.

Mr. SPALDING. I have no desire to make any speech. I want the House to act on the amendments.

The SPEAKER. The amendments will be read in their order, and if there be no objection, those on which a vote is not asked will be regarded as agreed to.

There was no objection.

The following amendment, on which a vote was called for by Mr. KELSEY, was read:

On page 9, after line two hundred and eleven, insert the following paragraph:

For reimbursing the State of Iowa for expenses incurred and payments made during the rebellion, as examined, audited, and found due the State by General Robert C. Buchanan's commission under the act of Congress approved July 25, 1866, $229,848: Provided, That an amount be appropriated from the Treasury to pay the war claims of the rebellion from all the States which have been reported upon favorably by commissioners appointed by Congress.

Mr. SCOTFIELD. Would it be in order to ask what States have had commissions appointed?

The SPEAKER. The previous question is operating, and no debate is in order.

Mr. SCOTFIELD. I ask a separate vote on that part of the amendment relating to the Iowa war claim.

The SPEAKER. The amendment must be voted on as a whole.

Mr. SCOTFIELD. But the latter part of the amendment covers we know not what.

The SPEAKER. That is a matter for the judgment of the House.

Mr. WOOD. Let the whole thing be voted down.

The SPEAKER. The presumption of law is that every citizen knows the laws which have been passed.

Mr. SCOTFIELD. Nobody knows but the gentleman from Massachusetts; and under the ruling of the Chair he cannot tell.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 52, noes 49.

Mr. SCOTFIELD demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—ayes 61, nays 78, not voting 83; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allison, Ames, James M. Ashley, Benjamin, Bingham, Boutwell, Broomall, Benjamin F. Butler, Roderick R. Butler, Callis, Sidney Clarke, Clift, Covode, Callom, Dawes, Dickey, Donnelly, Driggs, Ela, Thomas D. Trimble, Trowbridge, Upson, Van Auker, Burt Van Horn, Ward, Welker, and Wood—78.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Adams, Anderson, Arnell, Axtell, Baldwin, Banks, Barnum, Benton, Blaine, Boles, Bowen, Boyer, Brooks, Buckland, Cake, Chanler, Cook, Corley, Cornell, Delano, Dixon, Dodge, Eckley, Edwards, Eggleston, James T. Elliott, Fox, French, Getz, Glossbrenner, Gove, Gravelly, Haight, Halsey, Hamilton, Heaton, Hill, Asahel W. Hubbard, Humphrey, Hunter, Ingersoll, Kelley, Knott, George V. Lawrence, Lincoln, Logan, Loughbridge, Ketcham, Morrissey, Mungen, Myers, Nicholson, Nunn, Pettis, Pike, Poland, Polsey, Pomeroy, Prince, Pruyn, Robertson, Schenck, Selye, Stewart, Stone, Taffe, Thomas, Tift, Van Trump, Van Wyck, Vidal, Cadwalader C. Washburn, Elihu B. Washburne, Henry D. Washburn, Whittemore, Thomas Williams, William Williams, John T. Wilson, Stephen F. Wilson, Woodbridge, Woodward, and Young—83.

So the amendment was non-concurred in.

During the vote,

Mr. WOODWARD and Mr. VAN TRUMP stated that if they had been present before the last name was called they would have voted in the negative.

The vote was then announced as above recorded.

The question then recurred on Mr. FARNSWORTH's motion, to strike out the following:

For laying the foundation and commencing the building for the post office and sub-Treasury in Boston, Massachusetts, $200,000.

Mr. SPALDING. I promised to yield to the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. FARNSWORTH,] chairman of the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads for two minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman cannot yield, as he has not the floor.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. There are no plans for this work. We do not know how much the work will cost or how long it will take.

The SPEAKER. Debate is not in order.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—ayes 70, nays 81, not voting 71; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Archer, Bailey, Baker, Beatty, Benjamin, Broomall, Buckley, Burr, Callis, Cary, Sidney Clarke, Clift, Cobb, Cook, Deweese, Dockery, Donnelly, Eckley, Eldridge, Farnsworth, Ferriss, Getz, Glossbrenner, Golladay, Goss, Grover, Harding, Haughey, Hawkins, Holman, Chester D. Hubbard, Hunter, Thomas L. Jones, Judd, Kerr, Kitchen, Koontz, Lash, William Lawrence, Marshall, McCormick, McCullough, Mercier, Miller, Moore, Moorhead, Morrell, Mullins, Newcomb, Niblack, Orth, Paine, Phelps, Pierce, Plants, Ross, Sawyer, Shellabarger, Sitgreaves, Stover, Taffe, Taylor, Lawrence S. Trimble, Trowbridge, Robert T. Van Horn, Van Trump, Welker, William Williams, Stephen F. Wilson, and Woodward—70.

NAYS—Messrs. Allison, Ames, James M. Ashley, Axtell, Baldwin, Barnes, Barnum, Beaman, Bingham, Blackburn, Boutwell, Boyden, Bromwell, Brooks, Benjamin F. Butler, Roderick R. Butler, Churchill, Reader W. Clarke, Coburn, Corley, Cornell, Cullom, Dawes, Dixon, Driggs, Thomas D. Eliot, Ferry, Fields, French, Garfield, Gove, Griswold, Higby, Hooper, Hopkins, Hotchkiss, Hulburd, Jenckes, Johnson, Alexander H. Jones, Julian, Kellogg, Kelsey, Ketcham, Laffin, Loan, Lynch, Mallory, Maynard, McCarthy, Newsam, Norris, O'Neill, Perham, Peters, Poland, Pomeroy, Prince, Randall, Raum, Robinson, Roots, Scotfield, Smith, Spalding, Starkweather, Stevens, Stokes, Sypher, Taber, Twichell, Upson, Van Auker, Burt Van Horn, Cadwalader C. Washburn, William B. Washburn, Whittemore, James F. Wilson, John T. Wilson, Windom, and Wood—81.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Adams, Anderson, Arnell, Delos R. Ashley, Banks, Beck, Benton, Blaine, Blair, Boles, Bowen, Boyer, Buckland, Cake, Chanler, Covode, Delano, Dickey, Dodge, Edwards, Eggleston, Ela, James T. Elliott, Fox, Gravelly, Haight, Halsey, Hamilton, Heaton, Hill, Asahel W. Hubbard, Richard D. Hubbard, Humphrey, Ingersoll, Kelley, Knott, George V. Lawrence, Lincoln, Logan, Loughbridge, Marvin, McKee, Morrissey, Mungen, Myers, Nicholson, Nunn, Pettis, Pike, Pile, Polsey, Price, Pruyn, Robertson, Schenck, Selye, Shanks, Stewart, Stone, Thomas, Tift, John Trimble, Van Aernam, Van Wyck, Vidal, Ward, Elihu B. Washburne, Henry D. Washburn, Thomas Williams, Woodbridge, and Young—71.

So the House refused to strike out the paragraph.

The amendment upon which a vote was called for by Mr. FARNSWORTH was read, as follows:

For laying the foundation and commencing the building for the post office in New York, $200,000.

Mr. BENJAMIN. I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were refused.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I demand tellers.

Tellers were refused.

The amendment of the Committee of the Whole was concurred in.

Mr. GRISWOLD. I move to reconsider the vote by which the Iowa war claim was rejected.

The SPEAKER. Did the gentleman vote with the majority?

Mr. GRISWOLD. I did.

The SPEAKER. The motion is in order.

Mr. HARDING. I move to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The question being put on the latter motion, there were—ayes 63, noes 55.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—ayes 74, nays 70, not voting 78; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Archer, Bailey, Baker, Barnum, Beaman, Beatty, Beck, Benton, Blackburn, Blair, Boyden, Broomall, Buckland, Burr, Cary, Cobb, Coburn, Cook, Dockery, Eldridge, Farnsworth, Ferriss, Fields, Getz, Glossbrenner, Golladay, Grover, Harding, Haughey, Hawkins, Hill, Holman, Hotchkiss, Chester D. Hubbard, Richard D. Hubbard, Johnson, Alexander H. Jones, Thomas L. Jones, Kelsey, Kerr, Kitchen, Knott, Koontz, Lash, George V. Lawrence, William Lawrence, Mallory, Marshall, McCormick, McCullough, Mercier, Miller, Moore, Morrissey, Niblack, Phelps, Robinson, Ross, Scotfield, Sitgreaves, Spalding, Stevens, Taber, Taylor, Lawrence S. Trimble, Trowbridge, Upson, Van Auker, Van Trump, Ward, Cadwalader C. Washburn, Welker, Wood, and Woodward—71.

NAYS—Messrs. Allison, Ames, James M. Ashley, Baldwin, Benjamin, Bingham, Boutwell, Broomwell, Buckley, Roderick R. Butler, Callis, Reader W. Clarke, Sidney Clarke, Covode, Dawes, Donnelly, Driggs, Thomas D. Eliot, Ferry, Garfield, Hooper, Hopkins, Hulburd, Ingersoll, Jenckes, Judd, Julian, Ketcham, Lathin, Loughridge, Marvin, Maynard, McCarthy, McKee, Moorhead, Morrell, Mungen, Newcomb, Norris, O'Neill, Orth, Paine, Peters, Pettis, Pike, Plants, Poland, Pomeroy, Price, Raum, Robertson, Sawyer, Schenck, Shanks, Shellabarger, Smith, Starkweather, Stewart, Stokes, Stover, Sypher, Taffe, Twichell, Van Aernam, Robert T. Van Horn, William B. Washburn, Whittemore, William Williams, James F. Wilson, and Stephen F. Wilson—70.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Adams, Anderson, Arnell, Delos R. Ashley, Axtell, Banks, Barnes, Blaine, Boles, Bowen, Boyer, Brooks, Benjamin F. Butler, Cake, Chanler, Churchill, Clift, Corley, Cornell, Cul-lom, Delano, Deweese, Dickey, Dixon, Dodge, Eckley, Edwards, Eggleston, Ela, James T. Elliott, Fox, French, Goss, Gove, Gravely, Griswold, Haughey, Halsey, Hamilton, Heaton, Higby, Asahel W. Hubbard, Humphrey, Hunter, Kelley, Kellogg, Lincoln, Loan, Logan, Lynch, Mullins, Myers, Newsham, Nicholson, Nunn, Perham, Pierce, Pike, Polsley, Prince, Pruyn, Randall, Roots, Selye, Stone, Thomas, Tift, John Trimble, Burt Van Horn, Van Wyck, Vidal, Elihu B. Washburne, Henry D. Washburn, Thomas Williams, John T. Wilson, Windom, Wood-bridge, and Young—78.

So the motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

Mr. BENJAMIN. I move to reconsider the vote by which the amendment in regard to the New York post office was adopted.

The SPEAKER. Did the gentleman vote with the majority?

Mr. BENJAMIN. There was only a division on the vote.

Mr. BROOKS. The gentleman voted in the negative.

The SPEAKER. As the yeas and nays were not called the gentleman has a right to make the motion. The rule (page 161 of the Digest) is this:

"Where a vote is not taken by yeas and nays, and consequently no record is made of each member's vote, it is the well-settled practice to permit a member to move a reconsideration."

Mr. RANDALL. But the House refused to take the yeas and nays on the proposition. Now, can a member move to reconsider a vote where only a division was taken so as to secure a further division on the question?

The SPEAKER. The motion to reconsider is an independent proposition by itself.

Mr. BROOKS. Another point of order. There was a division upon the question. Now, if the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BENJAMIN] will say he voted with the majority I have no point of order to make. I saw him vote with the minority, and I am sure he will not contradict my statement.

Mr. BENJAMIN. I will not.

Mr. SPALDING. I move to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

Mr. BENJAMIN. I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were refused.

Mr. BENJAMIN. Tellers.

Tellers were refused.

The motion to lay the motion to reconsider on the table was agreed to.

The following amendment, upon which a vote was called for by Mr. BENJAMIN, was read:

At the end of line four hundred and fourteen add the following:

For branch mint at San Francisco, $150,000.

Mr. BENJAMIN called for tellers on agreeing to the amendment.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. AXTELL and Mr. BENJAMIN were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 64, noes 58.

Mr. BENJAMIN called for the yeas and nays. The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 78, nays 68, not voting 76; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Archer, Delos R. Ashley, James M. Ashley, Axtell, Barnum, Beck, Bingham, Boles, Boyden, Brooks, Burr, Benjamin F. Butler, Roderick R. Butler, Cary, Chanler, Sidney Clarke, Corley, Dixon, Donnelly, Thomas D. Eliot, James T. Elliott, Getz, Glossbrenner, Golladay, Gove, Grover, Haughey, Heaton, Higby, Hooper, Richard D. Hubbard, Ingersoll, Jenckes, Johnson, Alexander H. Jones, Thomas L. Jones, Kellogg, Kerr, Knott, Mal-lory, Marvin, McCarthy, McCormick, McCullough, McKee, Morrissey, Mungen, Newsham, Niblack, Orth, Paine, Peters, Poland, Pomeroy, Price, Pruyn, Robinson, Roots, Sawyer, Schenck, Spalding, Stewart, Tabor, Taffe, Thomas, Tift, Lawrence S. Trimble, Twichell, Upson, Van Auker, Robert T. Van Horn, Van Trump, Van Wyck, Whittemore, Win-dom, Wood, Woodward, and Young—78.

NAYS—Messrs. Allison, Ames, Bailey, Baker, Baldwin, Beaman, Beatty, Benjamin, Benton, Blackburn, Blair, Broomall, Buckland, Buckley, Cake, Callis, Reader W. Clarke, Cobb, Coburn, Cook, Covode, Cullom, Dockery, Eggleston, Eli, Farnsworth, Ferriss, Ferry, Fields, Hawkins, Hol-man, Hopkins, Chester D. Hubbard, Hulburd, Judd, Kelley, Ketcham, Kitchen, Koontz, Lathin, Lash, George V. Lawrence, William Lawrence, Lough-ridge, Lynch, Miller, Moore, Morrell, Mullins, Newcomb, Norris, O'Neill, Pettis, Phelps, Ross, Sco-field, Shellabarger, Sitgreaves, Smith, Stokes, Stover, Taylor, Cadwalader C. Washburn, Henry D. Washburn, William B. Washburn, Welker, Thomas Williams, and James F. Wilson—68.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Adams, Anderson, Arnell, Banks, Barnes, Blaine, Boutwell, Bowen, Boyer, Bromwell, Churchill, Clift, Cornell, Dawes, Delano, Deweese, Dickey, Dodge, Driggs, Eckley, Edwards, Eldridge, Fox, French, Garfield, Goss, Gravely, Gris-wold, Haight, Halsey, Hamilton, Harding, Hill, Hotch-kiss, Asahel W. Hubbard, Humphrey, Hunter, Julian, Kelley, Lincoln, Loan, Logan, Marshall, Maynard, Mercer, Moorhead, Myers, Nicholson, Nunn, Per-ham, Pierce, Pike, Plants, Polsley, Prince, Ran-dall, Raum, Robertson, Selye, Shanks, Starkweather, Stevens, Stone, Sypher, John Trimble, Trowbridge, Van Aernam, Burt Van Horn, Vidal, Ward, Elihu B. Washburne, William Williams, John T. Wilson, Stephen F. Wilson, and Woodbridge—76.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. AXTELL moved to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was agreed to; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

The following amendment, upon which a vote was asked by Mr. HOOPER, of Utah, was read:

Line five hundred and seventy-two, strike out "twenty-five" and insert "ten;" so that the clause will read:

For surveying the public lands in Utah Territory, at rates not exceeding fifteen dollars per mile for standard lines, twelve dollars for township, and ten dollars for section lines, $10,000.

Mr. SPALDING. That amendment was made at my instance. I find I was mistaken, and hope the amendment will not be agreed to.

The amendment was rejected.

The following amendment, on which a vote was called for by Mr. KELSEY, was read:

At the end of the following paragraph: "For light-ing the Capitol and President's House and public grounds around them and around the executive offices, $30,000," insert a proviso, as follows:

Provided, That no greater sum than $2 80 per one thousand cubic feet shall be paid for the gas for which this appropriation was made.

The amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The amendments reported from the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union having been disposed of the question recurs on the amendment offered in the House by the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. HOLMAN.]

Mr. KELSEY. I would inquire if there was not an amendment reported to strike out the following clause:

Columbia Hospital for Women and Lying-in Asy-lum:

For the support of the asylum over and above the probable amount received for pay patients, $15,000.

The SPEAKER. There was no such amend-ment reported. That clause was stricken out on a point of order.

Mr. KELSEY. I then desire to offer the following amendment:

For the support of the Columbia Hospital for Women and Lying-in Asylum, over and above the probable amount received for pay patients, $15,000.

I hope there will be no objection to that. This is the most deserving charity in the whole city, and it is the only one that has been stricken out of the bill.

Mr. WELKER. I object.

Mr. KELSEY. Would it be in order for me to move to suspend the rules so as to enable me to offer that amendment?

The SPEAKER. It is not in order while the previous question is pending. The rule will be found on page 170 of the Digest:

"It is not in order to move a suspension of the rules while the House is acting under a suspension of the rules unless connected with the business immedi-ately before the House, nor while considering a special order, it having been made under a suspension of the rules, unless connected with the consideration of such special order, nor while the previous question is operating."

Mr. KELSEY. Very well; I will try and get it in in the Senate.

The next amendment was the following, offered by Mr. HOLMAN, after the bill had been reported from the Committee of the Whole:

To increase the contingent fund of the House for the purpose of paying $2,500 each to John B. Young, John A. Wimpy, James H. Christie, and James H. Birch, contestants, $10,000; and the Clerk of the House is hereby directed to pay the said amount to the individuals named.

To which an amendment had been moved by Mr. ROSS, to strike out "$2,500" and insert "$1,500."

The question was taken on the amendment of Mr. ROSS; and on a division there were—ayes 52, noes 49; no quorum voting.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. ROSS and Mr. PETERS were appointed.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported that there were—ayes 71, noes 61.

Before the result of the vote was announced, Mr. BURR called for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 81, nays 67, not voting 74; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allison, Ames, Delos R. Ashley, Bailey, Baker, Baldwin, Beaman, Beatty, Bingham, Blair, Boles, Broomall, Buckland, Buckley, Callis, Churchill, Sidney Clarke, Cobb, Cook, Corley, Cor-nell, Cullom, Donnelly, Eckley, Ela, Ferriss, Ferry, Fields, Garfield, Getz, Goss, Griswold, Haughey, Hea-ton, Hill, Hooper, Hopkins, Chester D. Hubbard, Hulburd, Judd, Julian, Kelley, Kitchen, Koontz, Lathin, Lash, George V. Lawrence, William Lawrence, Lough-ridge, Lynch, Marvin, McKee, Mercer, Miller, Moore, Moorhead, Mullins, Myers, Newcomb, O'Neill, Orth, Pomeroy, Price, Ross, Schenck, Scofield, Shel-labarger, Smith, Stevens, Stover, Taffe, Taylor, Trow-bridge, Twichell, Burt Van Horn, Ward, Cadwalader C. Washburn, Welker, Thomas Williams, William Williams, and James F. Wilson—81.

NAYS—Messrs. James M. Ashley, Barnes, Barnum, Beck, Brooks, Burr, Benjamin F. Butler, Roderick R. Butler, Cake, Cary, Chanler, Reader W. Clarke, Clift, Coburn, Dawes, Dixon, Dockery, Dodge, Eldridge, Thomas D. Eliot, Fox, Glossbrenner, Golladay, Gro-ver, Haight, Harding, Higby, Holman, Hotchkiss, Richard D. Hubbard, Ingersoll, Jenckes, Johnson, Alexander H. Jones, Thomas L. Jones, Knott, Mal-lory, Marshall, Maynard, McCarthy, McCormick, Morrissey, Mungen, Newsham, Niblack, Norris, Per-ham, Peters, Poland, Prince, Randall, Robinson, Saw-ham, Spalding, Stewart, Stone, Tabor, Tift, Lawrence S. Trimble, Upson, Van Auker, Van Trump, Whittemore, Wood, Woodbridge, Woodward, and Young—67.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Adams, Archer, Arnell, Axtell, Banks, Benjamin, Benton, Blackburn, Blaine, Boutwell, Bowen, Boyden, Boyer, Bromwell, Covode, Delano, Deweese, Dickey, Driggs, Edwards, Eggleston, James T. Elliott, Farnsworth, French, Gove, Gravely, Halsey, Hamilton, Hawkins, Asahel W. Hubbard, Humphrey, Hunter, Kelley, Kellogg, Kerr, Ketcham, Lincoln, Loan, Logan, McCullough, Morrell, Nicholson, Nunn, Paine, Pettis, Phelps, Pierce, Pike, Plants, Polsley, Pruyn, Raum, Robertson, Roots, Selye, Shanks, Starkweather, Stark-weather, Stokes, Sypher, Thomas, John Trimble, Van Aernam, Robert T. Van Horn, Van Wyck, Vidal, Elihu B. Washburne, Henry D. Washburn, William B. Washburn, John T. Wilson, Stephen F. Wilson, and Windom—74.

So the amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

During the call of the roll,

Mr. ELIOT, of Massachusetts, said: I have been requested to say that Mr. PETTIS, who has been here all the morning, has been obliged to return to his room on account of sickness.

The question was then taken upon the amendment as amended; and on a division there were—ayes 78, noes 46.

Before the result of the vote was announced, Mr. BENJAMIN called for the yeas and nays.

The question was taken upon ordering the yeas and nays; and there were twelve in the affirmative; not one fifth of the last vote.

Before the result was announced,

Mr. BENJAMIN called for tellers on order-ing the yeas and nays.

The question was taken upon ordering tel-lers; and there were nineteen in the affirmative. So (the affirmative not being one fifth of a quorum) tellers were not ordered.

The yeas and nays were accordingly not ordered.

The amendment, as amended, was agreed to.

Mr. STEVENS moved to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was agreed to;

and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

The bill, as amended, was then ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time.

The question was upon the passage of the bill.

Mr. SPALDING. Upon that I call for the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

Mr. HARDING. I call for the yeas and nays on the passage of the bill.

The question was taken on ordering the yeas and nays; and there were thirteen in the affirmative.

So (the affirmative not being one fifth of the last vote) the yeas and nays were not ordered.

The bill was then passed.

Mr. SPALDING moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

HOOR FOR MEETING TO-NIGHT.

Mr. SCHENCK. It is known to gentlemen here that each of the two political parties represented in the next Congress has called a caucus for this evening, the one at half past six o'clock and the other at seven o'clock, to take the necessary steps for the organization of the next House. It will probably take some two or three hours to conclude their deliberations. I therefore ask unanimous consent that the recess for this afternoon be until nine o'clock.

Mr. ROSS. I object to having a session to-night. It is the last reception of the President of the United States and many of us desire to attend it.

Mr. SCHENCK. I know the gentleman is so devoted to the public interests that he will not object to coming here to-night.

Mr. ROSS. I think going to the last reception of the President is quite as important as having a caucus.

Mr. SCHENCK. I think we should have a session to-night for two or three hours.

Mr. MULLINS. I hope that gentlemen on the other side who exhibited such devotion to General Grant during the recent election will be allowed an opportunity to pay their respects to him.

A MEMBER. It is Mr. Johnson's reception that takes place to-night.

Mr. MULLINS. Well, if they are going to visit Mr. Johnson I take back all I have said. [Laughter.]

Mr. SCHENCK. I hope there will be no objection to the motion I make, that the House reassemble to-night at nine o'clock instead of half past seven.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made; but the Chair will state that it is within the power of the House to control its sessions each day.

Mr. BROOKS. If the proposition is amendable I would like to provide for a meeting at six o'clock to-morrow morning. My habit is to go to bed at night and rise in the morning.

Mr. WOOD. I think we can dispense with to-night's session and meet early to-morrow morning.

Mr. SCHENCK. I do not think that would be practicable. It has been observed that meeting at ten o'clock in the morning we have had during the first hour so thin a House as to obstruct the transaction of business. I think that if we should fix a meeting at six o'clock in the morning or any earlier hour than ten we should experience the same difficulty.

Mr. GARFIELD. I ask the Speaker to state the condition of the public business, and whether he believes it possible for us to get through with the appropriation bills and other important measures unless we sit at least one whole night.

Mr. ROSS. Cannot the bills that may go over be as well acted on in the Forty-First Congress?

The SPEAKER. In response to the inquiry of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] the Chair will state, as it is his duty to do at this stage of the session, the condition of the public business.

In regard to appropriation bills the House is now in advance of the Senate. The appropriation bills are all disposed of in the House except the amendments of the Senate to the Indian appropriation bill and the amendments which the Senate may make to the appropriation bills now in the possession of that body and not returned to the House. When the amendments of the Senate to the Indian appropriation bill shall have been disposed of the business immediately pressing upon the House will then be out of the way until the Senate return some other appropriation bills with amendments for the action of the House.

The next business of pressing importance consists of Senate bills upon the Speaker's table. Bills upon the Speaker's table have not been considered for some time, no successful motion for that purpose having been made. The bills upon the Speaker's table are now about one hundred and fifteen. Many are bills of the House with Senate amendments. Many of the amendments are verbal in their nature. Some have been concurred in this morning and others, no doubt, would be if they could be taken up. Whether the business of the Congress can be disposed of or not without a night session is for the House to determine and not for the Chair.

Mr. SCHENCK. It must be obvious to any one who has considered the condition of the business that one whole night session is absolutely necessary; and I think it is better to have that session to-night rather than the last night of the session, when confusion is apt to prevail. I hope my motion will be agreed to.

Mr. WOOD. I withdraw my objection.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I desire to give notice that I shall call up at the evening session Senate bill No. 704, to amend the judicial system of the United States.

Mr. SCHENCK. I hope that we will proceed to the consideration of the business upon the Speaker's table, and take up all the bills lying there.

The SPEAKER. The Committee on Appropriations will be entitled to the floor until its business is disposed of.

The motion was agreed to.

RESIGNATION OF THE SPEAKER.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will announce that he desires to-morrow morning to present his resignation of the office of Speaker, which he has held by the kindness of the House.

INDIAN APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I move to suspend the rules for the purpose of discharging the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union from the further consideration of the amendments of the Senate to House bill No. 1738, making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian department, and for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes for the year ending June 30, 1870; and concurring in some and non-concurring in others, as recommended by the Committee on Appropriations; and requesting a committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses.

Mr. ROSS. I ask the amendments be read.

The SPEAKER. That rule will be suspended with the others. Speaker BANKS so decided in the Thirty-Fourth Congress, and was sustained by the House; and such has been the uniform decision. The amendments are, however, in print.

Mr. CLARKE, of Kansas. Will the gentleman from Massachusetts state what are the recommendations of the Committee on Appropriations?

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I have stated it over and over again. We concur in a few unimportant items and non-concur in the others.

Mr. CLARKE, of Kansas. I ask that an order of Major General Sheridan be read in reference to these treaties.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I object.

The rules were suspended, and it was ordered accordingly.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. GORHAM, its Secretary, announced that the Senate had insisted on its amendments, disagreed to by the House, to the bill (H. R. No. 1744) to strengthen the public credit and relating to contracts for the payment of coin, had agreed to the conference asked by the House, and had appointed Mr. SHERMAN, Mr. WILLIAMS, and Mr. MORTON conferees on the part of the Senate.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed without amendment House bills of the following titles:

An act (H. R. No. 1068) for the relief of Henry Barricklow; and

An act (H. R. No. 1041) granting the right of way to the Walla-Walla and Columbia River Railroad Company, and for other purposes.

The message further announced that the Senate had passed a bill of the following title, in which the concurrence of the House was requested:

An act (S. No. 707) granting lands to the State of Wisconsin, to aid in the construction of a breakwater and harbor and ship-canal at the head of Sturgeon bay, in the county of Door, in said State, to connect the waters of Green bay and Lake Michigan, in said State.

COMMITTEE ON ACCOUNTS.

Mr. BROOMALL. The Committee on Accounts, in view of the business pressing upon them at the close of the session, ask leave to sit during the sessions of the House.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection leave will be granted.

There was no objection.

LEAVE TO PRINT.

Mr. MILLER asked and obtained leave to print in the Globe remarks on the tariff. [See Appendix.]

Mr. HAUGHEY asked and obtained leave to print in the Globe remarks on the rights of loyal citizens of Alabama. [See Appendix.]

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. BLACKBURN] asks leave to have printed in the Globe the remarks which he had intended to deliver to-day on the death of his late colleague, Mr. MANN. The announcement of that event was postponed until after the decision of the contested-election case, but owing to the pressure of business he now asks leave to print his remarks rather than consume the time of the House. If there is no objection the leave will be granted. The Chair hears no objection.

[The remarks will be published in the Appendix.]

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

On motion of Mr. DAWES leave was granted for the withdrawal from the files of the House of original papers belonging to the archives of the Territory of New Mexico, used by the Committee of Elections in the contested-election case from New Mexico.

CONSULAR, ETC., APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. ORTH. I submit the following report from the conference committee on the consular and diplomatic appropriation bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments to the bill (H. R. No. 1570) making appropriations for the consular and diplomatic expenses of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1870, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend, and do recommend to their respective Houses, as follows:

That the Senate recede from their amendments numbered 27, 30, and 31.

That the House of Representatives recede from their disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 1, 6, 7, 13, 14, 22, 27, 32, and 33, and agree to the same.

That the House recede from their disagreement to the second amendment of the Senate, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows; add the following words: "and to continue while acting as minister to Uruguay."

That the House of Representatives recede from their disagreement to the twenty-eighth amendment of the Senate, and agree to the same with the following amendment: strike out all of said amendment, being the fourth section of the bill, and insert in lieu the following:

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That the President is authorized on the recommendation of the Secretary of the Treasury to cause examinations to be made into the accounts of the consular officers of the United States, and into all matters connected with the business of their said offices, and to that end he may appoint such agent or agents as may be necessary for that purpose; and any agent, when so appointed shall, for the purpose of making said examinations, have authority to administer oaths and take testimony, and shall have access to all the books and papers of all consular officers. And any agent appointed in this behalf shall be paid for his services a just and reasonable compensation, not exceeding five dollars per day for the time necessarily employed, in addition to his actual necessary expenses, the same to be paid out of the sum appropriated for expenses of collecting the revenue, but no greater sum than $5,000 shall be expended as compensation of such agent or agents in any one year. And the President shall communicate to Congress, at the commencement of every December session, the names of the agents so appointed, and the amount paid to each, together with the reports of such agents; and agree to the same.

GODLOVE S. ORTH,
SAMUEL B. AXTELL,
Managers on the part of the House.
CHARLES SUMNER,
F. T. FREELINGHUYSEN,
W. PINKNEY WHYTE,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

Mr. ORTH. I move the previous question on the adoption of the report.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

Mr. ORTH. I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I simply desire to say that the committee of conference have agreed that there shall be a full minister to each of these small South American republics, as they are called, seven of which are destitute out of the eleven. I want to say further that I never will attempt again to cut down any offices in an outgoing Congress where the places will be so desirable as these South American missions with nothing to do and everything to get.

Mr. ORTH. There are two important amendments to this bill upon which there was a difference of opinion between the Senate and the House. The first was with reference to the South American missions. I do not desire to detain the House with reference to them in view of the votes which were taken here a few days ago sustaining the present law in reference to those missions. The conference committee were unanimous with one exception in the opinion that these missions should be retained for the present at least; that this was not the time nor was this appropriation bill the place to revise our diplomatic system. We therefore reported in favor of the law as it now stands, one member of the committee [Mr. SCOFIELD] dissenting.

The other important question was with regard to the act of July, 1866. That act provided that where the consular fees exceed the sum of $1,500 at any one consulate the surplus should be paid into the Treasury of the United States. The amendment of the Senate provided that that law should not go into operation till the 1st of January, 1867. The effect of that would be to increase the appropriations under this bill probably ten or twelve thousand dollars. The conference report is that the Senate recede from that amendment, leaving the act of July 25, 1866, to commence its operation from the date of its passage. These are the only two amendments of importance.

Mr. PRUYN. What is done with the last matter?

Mr. ORTH. Nothing. We leave the law of July, 1866, to commence its operation from the date of its passage.

Mr. PRUYN. Does not that work great hardship to consuls?

Mr. ORTH. There may be one or two instances where it will, but rather than defeat the bill we prefer that that matter should be left to be brought up in a new Congress in the shape of claims on behalf of two or three consuls whose salaries are fixed. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. SCOFIELD. As a member of the conference committee I did not concur in establishing or continuing so many South American missions. I was in favor of the House proposition as originally adopted, reducing the number of those missions, regarding them as entirely useless, for those who fill them are very seldom there to attend to their duties, but get them performed through some inferior officers. I suppose, however, rather than have the bill lost the House had better concur in the report of the majority.

Mr. ORTH. In reply to my colleague I will say that we are about entering upon a new era and hope to have better officers in these places.

The report of the committee of conference was agreed to—ayes seventy-three, noes not counted.

Mr. ORTH moved to reconsider the vote by which the report was agreed to; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

PRESSENTATION OF CREDENTIALS:

Mr. WHITTEMORE, by unanimous consent, presented the credentials of J. P. M. Epping, claiming to be a member of this Congress elected at large from South Carolina; which were referred to the Committee of Elections.

WELLS, FARGO AND COMPANY.

Mr. BROMWELL submitted a report of the views of the minority of the Committee on Public Expenditures in the case of Wells, Fargo & Co.; which was ordered to be printed with the report of the majority.

Mr. BROOMALL. I wish to enter a motion to reconsider the order to print until I can see what the minority report is.

The SPEAKER. The motion will be entered. When the order to print the majority report was made the Chair supposed the right was reserved to submit the views of the minority.

Mr. BROOMALL. There was nothing said about it.

PRINTING OF EVIDENCE.

Mr. WILSON, of Ohio. I ask unanimous consent to offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on Roads and Canals be, and they are hereby, authorized to print the testimony taken on the subject of the proper length of spans of bridges across the Ohio river.

That is the same resolution which I offered the other day, and which was objected to by the gentleman from Maryland, [Mr. ARCHER.] That objection, I understand, was made under a misapprehension. Gentlemen will remember that about a month ago a resolution passed this House directing the Committee on Roads and Canals to take testimony upon the subject of bridge-building as well as upon the question of navigation. That testimony has been taken.

Mr. KERR. It has been ordered to be printed.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is under the impression that on motion of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. KERR] the printing was ordered.

Mr. KERR. It was ordered on last Monday morning.

Mr. WILSON, of Ohio. I was not aware of that fact. I withdraw the resolution.

JAMES FOWLER KIRTLAND.

Mr. STOKES, by unanimous consent, from the Committee of Claims, submitted a report in writing on the memorial of James Fowler Kirtland, of the city of New York, praying compensation for damages resulting from the suspension of the work on the Dome of the Capitol in 1861 by order of the Secretary of War; which was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

IMPROVEMENT OF WILLAMETTE RIVER.

Mr. SCOFIELD, from the Committee on Appropriations, reported adversely on the joint resolutions of the Legislative Assembly of Oregon, asking an appropriation of $100,000 for the improvement of Willamette river; which were laid on the table.

PRESIDENT'S SALARY.

Mr. SCOFIELD, from the same committee, reported back, with the recommendation that it do not pass, joint resolution (H. R. No. 426) providing that the salary of the President of the United States be increased to the sum of $100,000 per annum.

The joint resolution was laid on the table.

EXPENSES OF RETRENCHMENT COMMITTEE.

Mr. SCOFIELD, from the same committee, reported back, with the recommendation that it do not pass, the joint resolution (H. R. No. 437) appropriating money to pay the expenses of the joint select Committee on Retrenchment.

The joint resolution was laid on the table.

IOWA WAR CLAIMS.

Mr. SCOFIELD, from the same committee, reported back, with the recommendation that it do not pass, the bill (H. R. No. 1491) fixing the amount found to be due to the State of Iowa on account of claims against the United States.

The bill was laid on the table.

HARBOR OF MICHIGAN CITY.

Mr. SCOFIELD, from the same committee, reported adversely on the joint resolutions of the Legislature of the State of Indiana relative to the harbor of Michigan City; and the same were laid on the table.

MARY A. DAVIS.

On motion of Mr. HOLMAN, by unanimous consent, the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 596) granting a pension to Mary A. Davis, widow of William P. Davis, a private in the eighteenth regiment of Indiana volunteers in the war of 1861, were taken from the Speaker's table.

The amendments were read, as follows:

Line nine strike out "first" and insert "ninth;" line nine, after the word "of," insert "September;" line ten, before "and" insert "one;" so that the bill will read:

That the Secretary of the Interior be, and is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-rolls the name of Mary A. Davis, widow of William P. Davis, deceased, a private in the eighteenth regiment of the Indiana volunteers of the war of 1861, and that she be paid a pension allowed a private during her widowhood, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, to commence on the 9th day of September, 1861, and in case of her death or marriage, then the pension to be paid to the minor children of the said William P. Davis, deceased, under sixteen years of age, subject to the provisions and limitations of the general pension laws.

Mr. HOLMAN. I understand that the Committee on Invalid Pensions are willing that the amendments of the Senate shall be concurred in with an amendment, to strike out "one" and insert "four," so as to make the pension date from the 9th of September, 1864.

Mr. PERHAM. I agree to that.

Mr. HOLMAN. I offer that amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Senate amendments, as amended, were then concurred in.

Mr. HOLMAN moved to reconsider the vote by which the amendments of the Senate were concurred in; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

JUDGE ADVOCATES OF THE ARMY.

Mr. GARFIELD. I ask unanimous consent to have taken from the Speaker's table the Senate amendments to House bill No. 1487, to declare and fix the status of the corps of judge advocates of the Army. Those amendments are merely verbal in their character, and I desire that they be concurred in.

No objection was made.

The amendments of the Senate were to strike out the preamble, and to strike out all of the enacting clause of the bill and to insert in lieu thereof the following:

That the department of judge advocates of the Army be, and the same is, fixed at ten members; and the President is hereby authorized, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to fill all vacancies which have occurred or may hereafter occur therein.

Mr. GARFIELD. I move that the amendments of the Senate be concurred in.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. GARFIELD moved to reconsider the vote by which the amendments were concurred in; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ENROLLED BILLS, ETC., SIGNED.

Mr. WILSON, of Pennsylvania, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bills and joint resolutions of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

An act (H. R. No. 1804) to establish a bridge across the East river between the cities of Brooklyn and New York, in the State of New York, a post road;

An act (S. No. 871) to authorize the transfer of lands granted to the Union Pacific Railway Company, eastern division, between Denver and the point of its connection with the Union Pacific Railroad, to the Denver Pacific Railway and Telegraph Company, and to expedite the completion of railroads to Denver, in the Territory of Colorado;

Joint resolution (S. R. No. 219) giving the assent of the United States to the construction of the Newport and Cincinnati bridge; and Joint resolution (S. R. No. 281) providing for the reporting and publication of the debates in Congress.

NORMAN WIARD.

Mr. SCHENCK, from the joint select Committee on Ordnance, reported a bill (H. R. No. 2021) for the relief of Norman Wiard; which was read a first and second time.

The question was upon ordering the bill to be engrossed and read a third time.

The bill, which was read, directs the Secretary of the Navy to pay the sum of $125,848 89 to Norman Wiard, out of any appropriation made for the support of the Navy Department, provided that sum shall be accepted by him as in full for all guns of steel made by him and delivered in 1861, and afterward sold by the Navy Department, he not having been paid for them; and in full for all expenditures incurred in making experimental guns for the Government in 1863 and 1864, under a joint agreement with the War and Navy Departments.

Mr. SCHENCK. If gentlemen will forbear asking me questions until they have heard what I have to say I think that in a very few minutes I can put them in possession of the facts of this case.

This report is made with reference to the claims of Norman Wiard under two contracts made with the Government, one in 1861 for certain steel guns, and one in 1863 for certain other experimental steel guns. Both of these claims arising under these contracts have been considered together, and they are both embraced in the bill now before the House.

In the Thirty-Ninth Congress these claims were considered separately, and two bills were reported to the House by the Committee on Military Affairs. Those bills met with the favorable consideration of the House, passed, and went to the Senate. They were not considered in the Senate for want of time. The Senator who objected was afterward so well satisfied that injustice had been done in not allowing the claim—as I am informed, and I presume that to have been his motive—that he himself introduced in the succeeding Congress a bill for the payment of the claim.

But in the Fortieth Congress a joint select committee, consisting of three Senators and three Representatives, was raised, to whom the whole subject of ordnance was referred, and as these claims of Wiard related entirely to ordnance they were referred to that joint select committee. That committee have had that subject under consideration, have given it very careful attention, and at the present session made a report, which is printed—report No. 6—and which gentlemen can see, if they wish to examine it more at length, by sending to the document-room for it.

As that report is one of some length, embodying references to all the testimony and facts of the case, I will state briefly the facts of the case, which statement will probably answer all the questions that might naturally be asked.

The joint select Committee on Ordnance, which have had the claims of Norman Wiard under consideration, find the same growing out of and based on contracts for furnishing experimental and other guns. The first contract was made between the chief of the Bureau of Ordnance of the Navy Department and W. A. Harwood and Norman Wiard, the claimant, in 1861, and was for a large number of steel guns of fifty pounds caliber. The evidence shows the contract complete in the usual form and with the proper officers of the Government. The guns were to be made in lots of five for eighty-five cents per pound, the order to be renewed for five more as soon as the first five were completed, all after the first five to be priced at eighty cents per pound.

The second part of the claim is for disbursements necessary to the production of experimental guns made under a formal contract with Gideon Welles, Secretary of the Navy, dated April 10, 1863, and an informal but expressed contract between the War Department, by acting Secretary of War P. H. Watson, esq., and Norman Wiard.

The Navy part of the contract was for twenty large guns on a new and untried plan to weigh forty-three thousand pounds each, at the price of sixteen cents per pound, provided either two or more stood the test.

The War Department part of the contract was for an unlimited number of like guns to be received of Mr. Wiard in case they stood the stipulated test. The contracts were made in a formal manner and notice given the claimant that the Department were disposed to try his plan of making guns. A joint board of Army and Navy officers especially convened, and they recommended a contract which was made and signed by the Secretary of the Navy. The frequent bursting of heavy guns and the necessity of using stronger materials having come to the attention of the Departments the contract of 1863 was by the Navy Department annulled arbitrarily, and this, with the stoppage of the disbursements in the matter of experimental guns, constitute the foundations for the claims referred to. The committee award for guns of the first lot:

Four weighing 22,300 pounds at 85 cents.....	$19,380 00
Five weighing 28,500 pounds at 80 cents.....	22,800 00

For first part of the claim.....	42,180 00
And for expenditures supported by vouchers under the second contract in 1863.....	83,668 49

Total.....	$125,848 49
------------	--------------

The report, the substance of which I have stated, is not a mere majority report of the joint select Committee on Ordnance, consisting of three Senators and three Representatives, who have considered this whole matter and taken the testimony, but it is the unanimous report of that committee. There may be mentioned two or three points of hardship in the case that do not appear in the statement I have just submitted. One is that Mr. Wiard actually paid to the Government, as has been ascertained, $11,000 of internal revenue taxes upon this work of his; and of this money the Government has had the benefit, though he has received nothing on his contract. Another point is that the guns of his manufacture were delivered to the Government, and after lying here for some time, and when the Government had arbitrarily thrown up the contract were sold, and the proceeds, whatever the amount may have been, of all those steel guns thus sold went into the public Treasury. So that although the guns were rejected, or at least claimed not properly to belong to the Government, yet the Government assumed control over them, sold them and appropriated to its own use the money received from the sale.

In short, the committee became satisfied that here was a clear, just case for compensation to be made, but as this claim had been pending for some time the committee, after reducing the amount to the lowest point which they thought just to Mr. Wiard, and after declining to allow in the computation any interest upon the amount of the claim, which might perhaps reasonably have been allowed, inserted a further provision that the payment provided for in this bill shall be the end of the matter, that Mr. Wiard is to make no further claim, but is to accept this in full compensation.

Now, sir, if there be no further inquiry to be made I will, on account of the little time we have to spare, demand the previous question.

Mr. WARD. I would like to ask the gentleman a question; that is, whether Mr. Wiard has been paid anything by the ordnance department for any of these experiments?

Mr. SCHENCK. No, sir; I understand that Mr. Wiard has had no pay for any experiment connected with these guns at all. This has all been done under contract.

Mr. WARD. My reason for asking the question was that I had been informed that this man had received considerable pay from the ordnance department and had filed with that department a receipt in full for all his claims against the Government. Besides that, I had some recollection that a claim of this man had come before the Committee of Claims and had been rejected. I ask the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SCHENCK] whether this is the same claim?

Mr. SCHENCK. That was a matter relating to the fitting out of a steamboat. The only payment that Mr. Wiard has ever received under this contract for guns is the amount he received as the price per pound of the materials used in one of the first guns that was made, and that is not a part of the amount included in the report of the committee.

Mr. WARD. The substance of this claim, as I understand, is that Mr. Wiard made these experiments in guns, incurring for that purpose a considerable expenditure. Now, I ask whether these experiments have been so valuable in their results that we should pay for them.

Mr. SCHENCK. I will answer the gentleman's inquiry. Mr. Wiard was not merely employed to produce these experimental guns, but he was employed under a contract providing that he should be paid at a certain rate per pound. The contract was complied with upon his part until his experiments were stopped by the Government. For his material furnished, his time given, his labor, his services in every way, he has received no pay. His guns were finally refused, notwithstanding the obligations of the contract. If the gentleman forces me to an opinion I will give it to him. My conviction is—and I think it is the belief of every member of the Committee on Ordnance—that Mr. Wiard was not permitted to go any further because he was an outside civilian manufacturer of steel and iron products, and his manufactures came in competition with those of gentlemen upon the inside who, it was thought, ought to have the monopoly of making guns, good or bad, for both the Navy and the Army. That is the secret of the matter.

Mr. WARD. Then, Mr. Speaker, I understand the case to be this: that Mr. Wiard had a contract; that in pursuance of that contract he made certain experiments and produced certain work which was refused by the Navy Department, and now the gentleman claims he has not been fairly treated in this refusal.

Mr. SCHENCK. The guns were delivered and received. I thought I had obviated the necessity of answering these questions by the abstract I took the pains to prepare. I demand the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time.

Mr. WARD demanded the yeas and nays on the passage of the bill.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 65, nays 57, not voting 100; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Banks, Barnes, Bingham, Blaine, Blair, Boies, Buckley, Benjamin F. Butler, Roderick R. Butler, Calkins, Reader W. Clarke, Clift, Coburn, Corley, Dixon, Dodge, Driggs, Eckley, James T. Elliott, Farnsworth, Ferry, French, Garfield, Goss, Griswold, Hooper, Hotchkiss, Ingersoll, Jenckes, Johnson, Judd, Kelsey, Koontz, Lash, Logan, Lynch, Mallory, Marvin, McCarthy, Miller, Morrill, Morrissey, Mullins, Mungen, Myers, Norris, O'Neill, Paine, Pile, Plants, Price, Prince, Prun, Randall, Robinson, Roots, Schenck, Sitgreaves, Stewart, Stover, Taffe, Taylor, Twichell, and Whittemore—65.

NAYS—Messrs. Allison, Archer, Bailey, Baker, Barnum, Beaman, Benjamin, Benton, Broomall, Chanler, Cook, Cornell, Dawes, Dickey, Thomas D. Eliot, Ferriss, Fields, Getz, Glossbrenner, Golladay, Haight, Hawkins, Hill, Holman, Hopkins, Chester D. Hubbard, Richard D. Hubbard, Hulburd, Humphrey, Hunter, Julian, Ketcham, William Lawrence, Loan, Loughridge, Mercer, Niblack, Nunn, Poland, Pomeroy, Ross, Sawyer, Scofield, Shellabarger, Stevens, Stokes, Taber, Upson, Van Aernam, Burt Van Horn, Van Wyck, Ward, Cadwalader C. Washburn, William B. Washburn, Welker, Wood, and Young—57.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Adams, Ames, Anderson, Arnell, Delos R. Ashley, James M. Ashley, Axtell, Baldwin, Beatty, Beck, Blackburn, Boutwell, Bowen, Boyden, Boyer, Bromwell, Brooks, Buckland, Burr, Cary, Churchill, Sidney Clarke, Cobb, Covode, Cullom, Delano, Deweese, Dockery, Donnelly, Edwards, Eggleston, Ela, Eldridge, Fox, Gove, Gravely, Grover, Halsey, Hamilton, Harding, Haughey, Heaton, Higby, Asahel W. Hubbard, Alexander H. Jones, Thomas L. Jones, Kelley, Kellogg, Kerr, Kitchen, Knott, Labin, George V. Lawrence, Lincoln, Marshall, Maynard, McCormick, McCullough, McKee, Moore, Moorhead, Newcomb, Newsham, Nicholson, Orth, Perham, Peters, Pettis, Phelps, Pierce, Pike, Polsley, Raum, Robertson, Selye, Shanks, Smith, Spalding, Starkweather, Stone, Sypher, Thomas, Tift, John Trimble, Lawrence S. Trimble, Trowbridge, Van Auker, Robert T. Van Horn, Van Trump, Vidal, Elihu B. Washburne, Henry D. Washburn, Thomas Williams, William Williams, James F. Wilson, John T. Wilson, Stephen F. Wilson, Windom, Woodbridge, and Woodward—100.

So the bill was passed.

Mr. SCHENCK moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

WILLIAM B. LOONEY.

The SPEAKER stated that the Senate requested a committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on Senate bill No. 900, granting a pension to William B. Looney.

There was no objection, and the request was reciprocated.

MILITARY TESTIMONY.

Mr. GARFIELD submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and, under the law, referred to the Committee on Printing:

Resolved, That there be printed for the use of the House three thousand extra copies of the testimony of officers of the Army taken before the members of the Committee on Military Affairs and the report of the committee accompanying the same.

REMOVAL OF POLITICAL DISABILITIES.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of War, transmitting applications for removal of political disabilities from R. Richardson, H. D. Foote, J. A. P. Campbell, A. Clayton, R. V. Booth, and A. J. Conklin; which was referred to the Committee on Reconstruction.

RECONSTRUCTION.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of War, transmitting reports of commanders of military departments South relative to persons turned over for trial to civil authorities; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

JOHN DUMPLIN.

Mr. ORTH, by unanimous consent, withdrew from the files of the House the petition and papers in the case of John Dimplin, to be referred to the next Congress, without leaving copies.

REMOVAL OF DISABILITIES.

Mr. FARNSWORTH, from the Committee on Reconstruction, reported back the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 1746) for the removal of certain disabilities from the persons therein named, and moved that the House disagree to the same.

Mr. ROSS. I move that the House concur.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I demand the previous question. The Senate has inserted about twice as many more names. The amendment is in the nature of a substitute.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

The question being taken on the motion to concur, it was disagreed to.

The motion to non-concur was agreed to.

Mr. BECK. I move that the House ask for a conference.

Mr. PAINE. I hope not.

The question being put on the motion of Mr. BECK, there were—ayes 52, noes 58; no quorum voting.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. BECK and PAINE were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 74, noes 50.

So the motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER appointed as conferees on the part of the House Messrs. BECK, FARNSWORTH, and PAINE.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Leave of absence was granted to Mr. HAMMON, on account of sickness confining him to his room.

RELEASE OF AMERICAN CITIZENS.

Mr. SCHENCK. I move that the House proceed to the consideration of business on the Speaker's table.

The motion was agreed to.

The first business on the Speaker's table was the following message of the President of the United States, which had been laid on the table when the Chair asked unanimous consent to lay it before the House, because Mr. ROBINSON desired to make some remarks on the subject:

To the House of Representatives:

I transmit an additional report from the Secretary of State, representing that Messrs. Costello and Warren, citizens of the United States imprisoned in Ireland, have been released.

ANDREW JOHNSON.

Mr. ROBINSON addressed the House. [His speech will be published in the Appendix.]

The message was ordered to be printed, and referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

FIFTEENTH CONSTITUTIONAL AMENDMENT.

The next business on the Speaker's table was the following resolution of the Senate:

Resolved by the Senate, (the House of Representatives concurring,) that the President be requested to transmit forthwith to the Executives of the several States of the United States copies of the article of amendment proposed by Congress to said Legislatures to amend the Constitution of the United States, passed February 26, 1869, respecting the exercise of the elective franchise, to the end that the said States may proceed to act upon the said article of amendment; and that he request the Executive of each of the States that may ratify said amendment to transmit to the Secretary of State a certified copy of said ratification.

Mr. CULLOM. I move that the House concur; and on that I demand the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the resolution was concurred in.

Mr. CULLOM moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was concurred in; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

NATIONAL CURRENCY.

The next business on the Speaker's table was the following resolution of the Senate, passed February 20, 1869:

Resolved, That the Senate disagree to the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. No. 440) supplementary to an act entitled "An act to provide a national currency secured by a pledge of national bonds and to provide for the circulation and redemption thereof," approved January 3, 1864, and ask a conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

Ordered, That Messrs. SHERMAN, MORGAN, and CAMERON be the conferees on the part of the Senate.

Mr. COBURN. I move that the House accede to the request of the Senate for a conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the House to that bill; and on that motion I demand the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

Mr. SCOTFIELD. I move to lay the resolution of the Senate on the table.

The question was put; and there were—ayes 56, noes 62.

Mr. BROOKS called for tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. COBURN, and Mr. TRIMBLE of Kentucky, were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 73, noes 75.

Mr. BROOKS called for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 70, nays 108, not voting 44; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bailey, Baldwin, Banks, Barnum, Benton, Boutwell, Brooks, Broomall, Calkins, Chanler, Churchill, Cook, Cornell, Covode, Dawes, Dixon, Thomas D. Eliot, Ferriss, Fields, Fox, Getz, Griswold, Hotchkiss, Richard D. Hubbard, Hulburd, Humphrey, Jenckes, Kelsey, Ketcham, Koontz, Laffin, Marvin, McCarthy, Mercer, Miller, Moore, Moorhead, Morrill, Morrissey, Myers, O'Neill, Perham, Pike, Poland, Pomeroy, Prun, Randall, Robertson, Robinson, Scofield, Selye, Sitgreaves, Smith, Spalding, Starkweather, Stevens, Stewart, Taber, Taylor, Twichell, Upson, Van Aernam, Burt Van Horn, Van Wyck, Ward, William B. Washburn, Thomas Williams, Stephen F. Wilson, Wood, and Woodbridge—70.

NAYS—Messrs. Allison, Delos R. Ashley, James M. Ashley, Axtell, Baker, Barnes, Beaman, Beatty, Beck, Benjamin, Bingham, Blackburn, Blaine, Blair, Boies, Boyden, Bromwell, Buckland, Buckley, Burr, Callis, Cary, Reader W. Clarke, Cobb, Coburn, Corley, Cullom, Delano, Dockery, Donnelly, Driggs, Eckley, Eggleston, Eldridge, James T. Elliott, Ferry, French, Garfield, Glossbrenner, Golladay, Goss, Gove, Grover, Harding, Haughey, Hawkins, Heaton, Holman, Hopkins, Hunter, Ingersoll, Johnson, Alexander H. Jones, Thomas L. Jones, Judd, Julian, Kellogg, Kerr, Kitchen, Knott, Lash, William Lawrence, Loan, Loughridge, Mallory, Marshall, Maynard, McCormick, McKee, Mullins, Mungen, Newsham, Niblack, Nicholson, Norris, Orth, Paine, Pierce, Pile, Plants, Prince, Raum, Roots, Ross, Sawyer, Schenck, Shanks, Shellabarger, Stokes, Stone, Stover, Sypher, Taffe, Tift, Lawrence S. Trimble, Trowbridge, Van Auker, Robert T. Van Horn, Van Trump, Cadwalader C. Washburn, Henry D. Washburn, Welker, Whittemore, William Williams, James F. Wilson, John T. Wilson, Woodward, and Young—108.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Adams, Ames, Anderson, Archer, Arnell, Bowen, Boyer, Benjamin F. Butler, Roderick R. Butler, Sidney Clarke, Clift, Deweese, Dickey, Dodge, Edwards, Ela, Farnsworth, Gravely, Haight, Halsey, Hamilton, Higby, Hill, Hooper, Asahel W. Hubbard, Chester D. Hubbard, Kelley, George V. Lawrence, Lincoln, Logan, Lynch, McCullough, Newcomb, Nunn, Peters, Pettis, Phelps, Polsley, Price, Thomas, John Trimble, Vidal, Elihu B. Washburne, and Windom—44.

So the House refused to lay the resolution of the Senate on the table.

Mr. COBURN's motion was then agreed to.

Mr. COBURN moved to reconsider the vote by which the motion was agreed to; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER appointed Mr. COBURN, Mr. JUDD, and Mr. HOOPER of Massachusetts, managers of the conference on the part of the House.

LAND CLAIMS IN NEW MEXICO.

The next business on the Speaker's table was the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 1344) to confirm certain private land claims in the Territory of New Mexico.

The amendment of the Senate was to insert after the word "land," in line eleven, the words "not improved by or in behalf of the United States and not including any military or other reservation."

The amendment was concurred in.

OFFICERS AND CREW OF THE KEARSARGE.

The next business upon the Speaker's table was the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 1967) to compensate the officers and crew of the United States steamer Kearsarge for the destruction of the rebel piratical vessel Alabama.

Mr. PIKE. I move that the amendments of the Senate to that bill be non-concurred in and a conference asked on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER appointed Mr. PIKE, Mr. TWICHELL, and Mr. HAIGHT managers of the conference on the part of the House.

NAVAL CAPTURES ON THE MISSISSIPPI.

The next business on the Speaker's table was the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 112) relating to captures made by Admiral Farragut's fleet in the Mississippi river in May, 1862.

The amendments of the Senate were read.

Mr. SCOFIELD. I move that the amendments of the Senate be concurred in.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. SCOFIELD moved to reconsider the vote by which the amendments of the Senate were concurred in; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

PURCHASES BY INTERIOR DEPARTMENT.

The next business on the Speaker's table was the amendment of the Senate to House joint resolution No. 438, relative to certain purchases by the Interior Department.

The amendment of the Senate was to insert after the word "goods," in line thirteen, the words "in such unpaid bills."

Mr. LAFLIN. I move that the amendment of the Senate be concurred in.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. LAFLIN moved to reconsider the vote by which the amendment of the Senate was concurred in; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

FINES, PENALTIES, AND FORFEITURES.

The next business on the Speaker's table was the consideration of amendments of the Senate to House bill No. 375, to repeal an act to regulate the disposition of fines, penalties, and forfeitures received under the laws relating to the customs, and for other purposes, and to amend certain acts for the prevention and punishment of frauds on the revenue and for the prevention of smuggling.

The amendments of the Senate were: in line eighteen, after the word "the," to insert the words "second, third, and fourth sections of the;" also to amend the title by inserting after the word "repeal" the words "certain sections of the."

Mr. ELIOT, of Massachusetts. I move that the House disagree to the amendments of the Senate, and ask a committee of conference.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. ELIOT, of Massachusetts, moved to reconsider the vote last taken; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ADDITIONAL BOUNTIES.

The next business on the Speaker's table was the consideration of the amendments of the Senate to House bill No. 1279, in relation to additional bounties, and for other purposes.

The first amendment of the Senate was to strike out the second section, which declares that the prohibition of bounty in the fourteenth section of the act of July 28, 1866, to any soldier "who shall have bartered, sold, assigned, transferred, loaned, exchanged, or given away his final discharge papers, or any interest in the bounty provided by this or any act of Congress," shall not apply in cases when the full amount of bounty has been advanced by States, counties, or towns to the soldiers or to their families, but the State, county, or town advancing the same shall be entitled to it.

The second amendment of the Senate was in line twenty-one, page 1, strike out "or" and insert "all."

The third amendment was to add to the bill the following:

SEC. — And be it further enacted, That all claims for the additional bounties granted in sections twelve and thirteen of the act of July 28, 1866, shall after the 1st day of May next be adjusted and settled by the accounting officers of the Treasury under the provisions of said act; and all such claims as may on the said 1st day of May be remaining in the office of the Paymaster General unsettled shall be transferred to the Second Auditor of the Treasury for settlement.

SEC. — And be it further enacted, That all claims for bounty under the provisions of the act cited in the foregoing section shall be void unless presented in due form prior to the 1st day of December, 1869.

Mr. GARFIELD. I move to concur in the amendments of the Senate. They have struck out one section which we would like to have in the bill. But it is now too late in the session to insist upon retaining it. They have also added a section which is of importance. I call the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the amendments of the Senate were concurred in.

Mr. GARFIELD moved to reconsider the vote by which the amendments of the Senate were concurred in; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

TAX ON MANUFACTURES.

The next business on the Speaker's table was the consideration of the amendments of the Senate to House bill No. 1327, to amend an act entitled "An act to exempt certain manufactures from internal taxes, and for other purposes," approved March 31, 1868.

The amendments of the Senate were read.

Mr. SCHENCK. These amendments are merely verbal. Probably the Senate may suppose that they have improved the language of the bill, whatever may be the opinion of the Committee of Ways and Means of this House. I move that the amendments of the Senate be concurred in.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. SCHENCK moved to reconsider the vote by which the amendments of the Senate were concurred in; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

MARY A. FILLER.

The next business on the Speaker's table was the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 425) for the relief of Mary A. Filler.

Mr. KOONTZ. The amendment of the Senate is simply to strike out of the bill that portion which proposes to confer upon Mrs. Filler the same rights and benefits as if she were the natural mother of the deceased soldier. I move that the amendment be concurred in.

The amendment was read, as follows:

Strike out after "law," in line five, to the end of the bill, the following:

And in these and in all other respects shall have the same rights and benefits as if she were the natural and lawful mother of said Henry Drenning.

Mr. PERHAM. I hope the amendment will be concurred in.

The amendment was concurred in.

Mr. MILLER moved to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was concurred in; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

LEMUËL BARTHALOW.

The next business on the Speaker's table was the Senate amendment to the bill (H. R. No. 128) granting a pension to Lemuel Barthalow.

The SPEAKER. In this case the amendment of the Senate is simply to correct the name in the title and in the body of the bill by changing "n" to "w," so as to read "Barthallow." If there be no objection the amendment will be regarded as concurred in.

There was no objection.

M. J. AND R. B. GUTHRIE.

The next business on the Speaker's table was the Senate amendments to the bill (H. R. No. 1930) granting a pension to Madge J. Guthrie and Robert B. Guthrie.

The amendments of the Senate were read, as follows:

In line six, insert after "them" the words "or their authorized guardian or guardians."

In line eight, after "1867" insert "and continuing until November 11, 1868, and afterward to the said Robert or his guardian or guardians until October 23, 1871, when he will attain the age of sixteen years."

Mr. PERHAM. I move that the House concur in the amendments of the Senate.

The amendments were concurred in.

Mr. PERHAM moved to reconsider the vote by which the amendments were concurred in; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

RELIEF OF POSTMASTERS.

The next business on the Speaker's table was the amendments of the Senate to the joint resolution (H. R. No. 211) for the relief of Henry S. Gibbons, late postmaster at St. Johns, Michigan.

The amendments of the Senate were read, as follows:

Add at the end of the joint resolution the following: Provided, It shall be proven satisfactorily to the Postmaster General that funds belonging to the Post Office Department to the amount of $500 was stolen by burglars, and that said Gibbons was not guilty of neglect in the custody thereof.

SEC. 2. And be it further resolved, That Luther McNeal be paid the sum of $175.46 for money and postage stamps belonging to the United States, and which were stolen from the post office at the town of Lancaster, Erie county, New York, while he was postmaster, and which sum he has paid to the Government on settlement with the Post Office Department as such postmaster, and that such sum be paid out of the Post Office fund by the Postmaster General upon the said McNeal making proof to his satisfaction that said money and stamps were stolen without any fault of said McNeal.

SEC. 3. And be it further resolved, That in the settlement of the accounts of Seth M. Gates, postmaster at Warsaw, New York, with the Post Office Department, the Postmaster General be, and he is hereby, authorized to allow a credit to the said Seth M. Gates of $726.73, the amount in value of postage stamps belonging to the United States stolen from the post office on the 16th of July, 1867, while the said Gates was postmaster: Provided, That it shall satisfactorily appear to the Postmaster General that the said Gates was guilty of no negligence in the custody of the said stamps.

Amend the title so as to read: "A joint resolution for the relief of Henry S. Gibbons, Luther McNeal, and Seth M. Gates."

Mr. SCOFIELD. I believe I will move to lay that joint resolution on the table.

Mr. FERRY. This bill, after being considered by the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, and receiving the unanimous assent of that committee, was reported to this House, and after pretty full discussion was passed and sent to the Senate. The Senate has attached to it an amendment embracing two cases similar to that provided for in the original bill, accompanied with a proviso that none of the claims shall be paid unless sufficient evidence be presented to the Postmaster General to satisfy him that they ought to be paid. I move concurrence in the amendments.

Mr. SCOFIELD. I do not wish to interpose any objection at this stage to the bill as passed by the House, that question having already been determined; but the Senate amendment embraces two claims which we know nothing about. I hope the House will non-concur.

Mr. FERRY. The bill is properly guarded by a provision directing the Postmaster General not to pay the claims unless in his judgment there should be sufficient evidence that the money and stamps were stolen and that the respective postmasters were not guilty of any neglect.

I yield to the gentleman from New York, [Mr. VAN HORN.]

Mr. VAN HORN, of New York. The gentleman from Maine [Mr. LYNN] had charge of the matter in reference to Mr. Gates, but owing to his absence it was not reported and the amendment was put on in the Senate at my suggestion. The case has been examined with great care and has been found to be all right. I know that the burglary was committed, and the special agent who was sent to the place reported that Mr. Gates had used all due diligence in the discharge of his duty and taking care of the Government property.

Mr. LYNCH. That case was referred to me as sub-committee of the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads. I went to the Post Office Department and investigated the case and found it to be all right. The committee were unanimously in its favor. It would have been reported if I had not been called away, and there has been no opportunity since to report it.

Mr. FERRY demanded the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the amendment was concurred in.

Mr. FERRY moved to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was concurred in; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

CERTIFYING CHECKS BY NATIONAL BANKS.

The next business on the Speaker's table was the amendment of the Senate to House bill No. 1973, in reference to certifying checks by national banks.

The amendment of the Senate was read, as follows:

Strike out in lines eight, nine, ten, and eleven the words:

And it shall be the duty of the officers of any national bank certifying any check to enter the same to the account against which it is drawn as if the amount of such check had been paid in money.

And insert in lieu thereof the words:

And any check so certified by duly authorized officers shall be a good and valid obligation against such bank.

Mr. PRICE. How would the bill then read?

The Clerk read the bill as it would be if amended, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That it shall be unlawful for any officer, clerk, or agent of any national bank to certify any check drawn upon said bank unless the person or company drawing said check shall have on deposit in said bank at the time such check is certified an amount of money equal to the amount specified in such check; and any check so certified by duly authorized officers shall be a good and valid obligation against such bank; and any officer, clerk, or agent of any national bank violating the provisions of this act shall subject such bank to the liabilities and proceedings on the part of the Comptroller as provided for in section fifty of the national banking law, approved June 3, 1864.

Mr. HOOPER, of Massachusetts, moved that the amendment be concurred in.

The amendment was concurred in.

Mr. HOOPER, of Massachusetts, moved to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was concurred in; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

REPORTS OF NATIONAL BANKS.

The next business on the Speaker's table was the substitute of the Senate for House bill No. 1881, regulating the reports of national banking associations.

The amendment of the Senate was read, as follows:

Strike out all of the original bill after the enacting clause and insert:

That in lieu of all reports required by section thirty-four of the national currency act every association shall make to the Comptroller of the Currency not less than five reports during each and every year, according to the form which may be prescribed by him, verified by the oath or affirmation of the president or cashier of such association and attested by the signature of at least three of the directors; which report shall exhibit in detail and under appropriate heads the resources and liabilities of the association at the close of business on any past day to be by him specified, and shall transmit such report to the Comptroller within five days after the receipt of a request or requisition therefor from him; and the report of each association, in the same form in which it is made to the Comptroller, shall be published in a newspaper published in the place where such association is established, or if there be no newspaper in the place, then in the one published nearest thereto in the same county, at the expense of the association; and such proof of publication shall be furnished as may be required by the Comptroller. And the Comptroller shall have power to call for special reports from any particular association whenever in his judgment the same shall be necessary in order to a full and complete knowledge of its condition. Any association failing to make and transmit any such report shall be subject to a penalty of $100 for each day after five days that such bank shall delay to make and transmit any report as aforesaid and in case any association shall delay or refuse to pay the penalty herein imposed, when the same shall be assessed by the Comptroller of the Currency, the amount of such penalty may be retained by the Treasurer of the United States, upon the order of the Comptroller of the Currency; out of the interest, as it may become due to the association, on the bonds deposited with him to secure circulation; and all sums of money collected for penalties under this section shall be paid into the Treasury of the United States.

Mr. HOOPER, of Massachusetts. I move a concurrence.

Mr. LYNCH. I move to lay the amendment of the Senate on the table.

Mr. RANDALL. I move a non-concurrence, and that the House ask for a conference.

Mr. HOOPER, of Massachusetts. If the House will listen to me—

The SPEAKER. The motion to lay on the table is not debatable.

The motion was disagreed to—ayes 35, noes 78.

Mr. HOOPER, of Massachusetts. I withdraw my motion to concur, and call the previous question on the motion to non-concur.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the motion to non-concur and ask a conference was agreed to.

Mr. RANDALL moved to reconsider the vote by which the motion was agreed to; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER appointed as conferees on the part of the House Messrs. RANDALL, POMEROY, and LYNCH.

HOT SPRINGS RESERVATION.

The next business on the Speaker's table was the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 1276) for the sale of the Hot Springs reservation in Arkansas.

Mr. JULIAN. I move the reference of the amendments to the Committee on the Public Lands.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. JULIAN moved to reconsider the vote just taken; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

RELIEF OF SCOUTS AND GUIDES.

The next business on the Speaker's table was the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 1879) for the relief of certain companies of scouts and guides organized in Alabama.

The first amendment was to strike out "Gordon" and insert "R. S.," so as to read "General R. S. Granger."

The next amendment was to add the following section:

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That all other companies or parts of companies of scouts and guides organized or employed by General R. S. Granger under the authority or by the approval of Major General George H. Thomas, commanding the department of the Cumberland, be entitled to the same relief as provided for the companies named in the first section of this act: Provided, That before such payment satisfactory evidence of service shall be furnished by claimants as approved by the Secretary of War.

Mr. RAUM. I am directed by the Committee on Military Affairs to move a concurrence in the amendments.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. RAUM moved to reconsider the vote by which the amendments were concurred in; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ILLINOIS IRON AND BOLT COMPANY.

The next business on the Speaker's table was the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 1867) for the relief of the Illinois Iron and Bolt Company.

The amendment was to insert in line eleven the words "not exceeding $2,750."

The amendment was agreed to.

PETER M'GOUGH.

The next business on the Speaker's table was the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 1989) for the relief of Peter McGough, collector of internal revenue and disbursing agent of the twentieth district of Pennsylvania.

The amendment was to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

That the proper accounting officers of the Treasury be, and they are hereby, authorized to allow to Peter McGough, collector and disbursing agent of the twentieth internal revenue district of Pennsylvania, a credit for the sum of $4,750 64, public money deposited in pursuance of law in the Venango National Bank, late a United States designated depository, and lost by the failure of said bank without fault or neglect of the said collector and disbursing agent.

Mr. BINGHAM. I move that the House concur in the amendment of the Senate.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. BINGHAM moved to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was concurred in; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

PROOF OF WILLS.

The next business on the Speaker's table was a bill (S. No. 612) relating to the proof of wills in the District of Columbia; which was read a first and second time.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I ask that that bill be put upon its passage.

The bill provides that whenever a will or codicil shall be exhibited for probate to the orphans' court of the District of Columbia, if any witness to the same shall reside out of the District or be temporarily absent therefrom at the time when the said will or codicil shall be so exhibited for probate, it shall be lawful for the court to issue, upon personal notice of not less than twenty days to all the parties in interest, a commission to one or more competent persons to take the deposition of such absent witness or witnesses, in such form as the court may prescribe, touching the execution of such will or codicil and the competency of the testator or testatrix at the time of the execution thereof, and that such deposition when returned to said court shall be received as competent testimony and have the same force and effect as if the said witness or witnesses were personally present and testifying; provided that in all such cases the original will or codicil shall accompany the commission to be exhibited to the witness.

Mr. INGERSOLL. The bill explains itself and requires no explanation from me. There can be no objection to it from any source. I move the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

The bill was ordered to a third reading, and was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. INGERSOLL moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

MILITIA IN SOUTHERN STATES.

The next business on the Speaker's table was a bill (S. No. 665) respecting the organization of militia in the States of North Carolina, South Carolina, Florida, Louisiana, and Arkansas; which was read a first and second time.

The bill proposes to repeal so much of the Army appropriation bill approved March 2, 1867, as prohibits the organization, arming, or calling into service of the militia forces in the States of North Carolina, South Carolina, Florida, Alabama, Louisiana, and Arkansas.

Mr. PAINE. I move that the bill be referred to the Committee on the Militia.

Mr. SCOTFIELD. I hope we shall put it upon its passage.

Mr. PAINE. If there is no objection to the bill I withdraw my motion.

Mr. ROSS. I move that the bill be referred to the Committee on the Militia.

Mr. PAINE. I had examined the bill carefully and saw that there was nothing objectionable in it. I desire that it shall pass. I only moved its reference because I thought there might be some objection.

Mr. SCOFIELD. If I understand the bill it only authorizes these States to organize militia the same as the other States.

Mr. PAINE. That is all.

Mr. SCOFIELD. I think it is right. We had a law which prohibited them from organizing their militia. This simply proposes to repeal that law.

Mr. ROSS. I think the bill had better go to a committee.

Mr. PAINE. I move the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

The motion to refer the bill was disagreed to.

The bill was ordered to a third reading; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. PAINE moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

SPAIN AND CUBA.

The next business on the Speaker's table was a joint resolution (S. R. No. 178) tendering sympathy to the people of Spain; which was read a first and second time.

The joint resolution was read, as follows:

Be it resolved, &c., That the people of the United States, sympathizing with the people of Spain in their effort to establish a more liberal form of government, express the confident hope that it will be conducted to the end in such way as to promote the triumph of liberal institutions, and they earnestly appeal to the people of Spain not to allow the present opportunity to pass without securing the immediate emancipation of slaves and the final abolition of slavery throughout the Spanish dominions.

Be it further resolved, That the President of the United States is charged with the duty of communicating this resolution to the Government of Spain.

Mr. BANKS. I am authorized by a unanimous vote of the Committee on Foreign Affairs to move a substitute for the resolution which I hope will be adopted by the unanimous vote of the House.

The Clerk read the substitute, as follows:

Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert in lieu thereof the following:

That the people of the United States sympathize with the patriotic people of Spain in their efforts to reestablish the liberties of the Spanish nation.

Resolved, &c., That the people of the United States sympathize with the people of Cuba in their efforts to secure political independence, and that they will welcome to the family of independent nations any Government that guarantees the liberty of all men and represents the principle of the absolute sovereignty of the people.

Resolved further, That the President is hereby authorized to recognize the independence of Cuba whenever in his opinion a republican form of government shall have been established.

Mr. BANKS. Of course I do not propose to detain the House with any remarks at this late hour of the session. I will only say that the unanimous consent of the members of the Committee on Foreign Affairs has been given to the substitute which has been read, and I hope it may be approved by the unanimous vote of the House.

Mr. BROOKS. If I understand this proposition it is to sympathize with Spain, which is all very well. Then we profoundly sympathize with Cuba, that is in a state of revolution against Spain. It strikes me that is a very absurd contradiction.

Mr. BANKS. I will say that there is no inconsistency in the resolutions. The first one is an expression of the sympathy of the people of the United States with the efforts of the Spanish people to reestablish the liberties of the Spanish nation. That resolution is based upon the recognized principle of the absolute sovereignty of the people. Then we express the same sympathy for the people of Cuba. The people of Cuba have the same right to their liberties that the people of Spain have to theirs, and we express our sympathy with both in their efforts to obtain their liberties.

Mr. BROOKS. If I understand the substitute—I am not sure that I do—we sympathize with Spain, who is pouring forth her troops for the overthrow of Cuban independence, and we also sympathize profoundly with Cuba. Well, I think I am in favor of the whole substitute.

Mr. ROSS. Would it not be as well to amend the substitute by striking out the word "reestablish" and inserting the word "establish"?

Mr. BANKS. I have no objection to that; but the resolution now recognizes a former republican government in Spain.

The amendment of Mr. Ross was then agreed to.

The substitute, as amended, was then agreed to.

Mr. BANKS. I now call the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the joint resolution, as amended, was read the third time, and passed unanimously.

Mr. BANKS moved to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. PRUYN. I think the title of this joint resolution should be amended. It now reads "a joint resolution tendering sympathy to the people of Spain."

Mr. ORTH. Amend it by adding: "and for other purposes." [Laughter.]

Mr. BANKS. I move to amend it by adding the words "and to the people of Cuba."

The amendment was agreed to; and the title, as amended, was then agreed to.

METROPOLITAN RAILROAD COMPANY.

The next business on the Speaker's table was Senate bill No. 711, relating to the Metropolitan Railroad Company; which was taken up and read a first and second time.

The question was upon ordering the bill to be read a third time.

The bill, which was read, provides for extending the time for five years for the completion of the line of street railway of the Metropolitan Railroad Company.

Mr. KOONTZ. This bill merely provides for the completion of the line of the Metropolitan Railroad Company. I ask that it be now put upon its passage; and on that I call the previous question.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I desire to have this bill referred to the Committee for the District of Columbia.

The SPEAKER. That motion will be in order if the previous question shall not be seconded.

Mr. KOONTZ. If this bill is now referred to the Committee for the District of Columbia it will be lost.

Mr. INGERSOLL. If it is passed it will gridiron this whole city with street railways.

Mr. KOONTZ. I insist upon the previous question.

The question was taken upon seconding the previous question; and upon a division there were—ayes 24, noes 78.

Before the result of the vote was announced, Mr. KOONTZ called for tellers.

The question was taken on ordering tellers; and there were seventeen in the affirmative.

So (the affirmative not being one fifth of a quorum) tellers were not ordered.

The previous question was accordingly not seconded.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I move that the bill be referred to the Committee for the District of Columbia.

The motion was agreed to; there being on a division—ayes eighty-six, noes not counted.

Mr. INGERSOLL moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was referred; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

FEES OF RECORDER OF DEEDS, ETC.

The next business on the Speaker's table was Senate bill No. 712, to define the fees of recorder of deeds and to provide for the appointment of warden of the jail in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes; which was taken up and read a first and second time.

The question was upon the third reading of the bill.

Mr. WELKER. I hope this bill will be now passed; and I call the previous question on its passage.

Mr. POLAND. I hope it will be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. WELKER. This bill authorizes the appointment of the warden of the jail by the supreme court of the District of Columbia. It also regulates the fees of the recorder of deeds for the District of Columbia. I am informed by the chairman of the Committee on the District of Columbia of the Senate that it does not increase the compensation of that officer, but merely reduces to dollars and cents the fees of the recorder of deeds, which are now computed in pounds of tobacco under the old rule establishing the fees. That is the substance of the bill. I will yield to the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. POLAND] if he desires to make any remarks on this bill.

Mr. POLAND. Mr. Speaker, my objection to this bill is that it vests the power of political appointment in a court, a thing which ought never to be done. The other day a gentleman made application to me to aid in the passage of this bill, because he said he had already secured the appointment if this bill should be passed. Although I have a very good opinion of courts and judges I think they never should have any power of political appointment. The business of courts is to try cases. They never should have any opportunity to reward friends or punish enemies by the distribution of patronage.

Mr. WELKER. The gentleman who made the application to my friend from Vermont [Mr. POLAND] must have been, I think, a rather "green" politician. I believe that in vesting this power of appointment in the supreme court of the District we place it just where it ought to be. The warden of the jail is the executive officer of that court. The Supreme Court of the United States appoints its own marshal; and it is right that the supreme court of the District should have the control of this warden.

Mr. SCOFIELD. I wish to ask the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. POLAND] whether his only objection to this bill is that under it the supreme court of the District of Columbia will appoint the warden of the jail?

Mr. POLAND. I have no objection to the other sections of the bill; but I do object to this provision, and I object to it upon principle.

Mr. SCOFIELD. I guess that provision is not very mischievous.

Mr. ROSS. I wish to know whether this bill is intended to take away patronage from General Grant? [Laughter.]

Mr. WELKER. Of course it takes from the President the appointing power with respect to this officer and places it in the court whose officer the warden is. I think this a proper provision.

Mr. ROSS. I think we had better stand by the incoming President. [Laughter.]

Mr. WELKER. I call the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

The question being taken on the motion of Mr. POLAND, to refer the bill to the Committee on the Judiciary, there were—ayes 65, noes 63.

Mr. WELKER. I call for tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. WELKER and Mr. POLAND were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 53, noes 66.

So the motion to refer was not agreed to.

The bill was ordered to a third reading; and it was accordingly read the third time.

The question being taken on the passage of the bill, there were—ayes eighty-seven, noes not counted.

Mr. ROSS. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

So the bill was passed.

Mr. WELKER moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

NATIONAL CURRENCY FRAUDS.

The next business on the Speaker's table was the bill (S. No. 722) to amend an act entitled "An act to provide a national currency secured by a pledge of United States bonds, and to provide for the circulation and redemption thereof," by extending certain penalties to accessories; which was read a first and second time.

The bill provides that every person who shall aid or abet any officer or agent of any association in doing any of the acts enumerated in section fifty-five of an act entitled "An act to provide a national currency secured by a pledge of United States bonds, and to provide for the circulation and redemption thereof," with intent to defraud or deceive, shall be liable to the same punishment therein provided for the principal.

Mr. HOOPER, of Massachusetts. I demand the previous question upon the passage of this bill.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the bill was ordered to be read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. HOOPER, of Massachusetts, moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. HOLMAN, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the committee had examined and found truly enrolled bills of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

An act (H. R. No. 1041) granting the right of way to the Walla-Walla and Columbia River Railroad Company, and for other purposes; and

An act (H. R. No. 1063) for the relief of Henry Barricklow.

WAGON-ROAD IN OREGON.

The next business on the Speaker's table was Senate bill No. 167, granting lands to the State of Oregon to aid in the construction of a military wagon-road from the navigable waters of Coos bay to Roseburg, in said State; which was read a first and second time.

The bill was read. The first section provides that there shall be granted to the State of Oregon, to aid in the construction of a military wagon-road from the navigable waters of Coos bay to Roseburg alternate sections of public lands, designated by odd numbers, to the extent of three sections in width on each side of said road; provided that the lands hereby granted shall be exclusively applied to the construction of said road and to no other purpose, and shall be disposed of only as the work progresses; and provided further that any and all lands heretofore reserved to the United States, or otherwise appropriated by act of Congress or other competent authority, are reserved from the operation of this act, except so far as it may be necessary to locate the route of said road through the same, in which case the right of way to the width of one hundred feet is granted; and provided further that the grant hereby made shall not embrace any mineral lands of the United States or any lands to which homestead or preemption rights have attached.

The second section provides that the lands hereby granted to said State shall be disposed of by the Legislature thereof for the purpose aforesaid, and for no other; and the said road shall be and remain a public highway for the use of the Government of the United States, free from tolls or other charges upon the transportation of any property, troops, or mails of the United States.

The third section provides that said road shall be constructed with such width, gradation, and bridges as to permit of its regular use as a wagon-road, and in such other special manner as the State of Oregon may prescribe.

The fourth section provides that the State of Oregon is authorized to locate and use in the construction of said road an additional amount of public lands not previously reserved to the United States nor otherwise disposed of, and not exceeding six miles in distance from it, equal to the amount reserved from the operation of this act in the first section of the same, to be selected in alternate odd sections, as provided in section one of this act.

The fifth section provides that lands hereby granted to said State shall be disposed of only in the following manner, that is to say, when the Governor of said State shall certify to the Secretary of the Interior that ten continuous miles of said road are completed, then a quantity of the land hereby granted, not to exceed thirty sections, may be sold, and so on from time to time until said road shall be completed; and if said road is not completed within five years no further sales shall be made, and the lands remaining unsold shall revert to the United States.

The sixth and last section provides that the United States surveyor general for the district of Oregon shall cause said lands, so granted, to be surveyed at the earliest practicable period after said State shall have enacted the necessary legislation to carry this act into effect.

Mr. JULIAN. I move to add the following to the first section:

Provided, That the grant of lands hereby made shall be upon the condition that the lands shall be sold to actual settlers only in quantities not greater than one quarter section and for a price not exceeding $2 50 per acre.

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Ohio. Has this bill been considered by the Committee on the Public Lands?

Mr. JULIAN. It has not been before the committee. This is an irregular way to dispose of the bill; but with that amendment I shall not oppose its passage.

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Ohio. What amount of lands does the bill grant?

Mr. JULIAN. Alternate sections for three miles on each side of the road.

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Ohio. I hope the bill will be referred.

Mr. MALLORY. Mr. Speaker, I am sure that if the House understood this bill there would be no objection to it. Those who are acquainted with the geography of the State of Oregon know that along the line of the coast there is a high range of mountains known as the Coast range. Between that range of mountains and the Cascade mountains there is a succession of valleys. In one of these, known as the Umpqua valley, is situated the town of Roseburg, a point of some considerable importance on account of the country which surrounds it. This is to enable the people there to build a road over the summit of the coast range of mountains so as to get to the coast by that means. A large portion of the land proposed to be granted is not worth anything. Most of it lies on this range of mountains and could not be sold for one cent an acre. Some of it may be valuable in the construction of this road.

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Ohio. Does the bill define the kind of road to be built? It ought to be understood that it is not a railroad. Is it to be a macadamized road?

Mr. MALLORY. It is merely a wagon-road; and the gentleman ought to know that to build a wagon-road over the mountains requires a great outlay of money. A macadamized road would cost $1,000 a mile. This road is to enable wagons to get from the Umpqua valley over the mountains to the coast. The only possible means they have for communication is on the backs of mules and horses. The object of this bill is to enable men to build a wagon-road so that they can transport their produce and goods across the mountains with less trouble and expense.

Mr. HIGBY. To what extent is the country settled?

Mr. MALLORY. In the valley of the Umpqua there is a considerable settlement, and at the Coos river, on the coast, there is another settlement; but along the line extending about sixty miles it is an unbroken wilderness. I think this House cannot refuse to render this assistance. To refer the bill to the Committee on the Public Lands is to defeat it. It is simply an indirect blow to destroy the bill. Justice to the people of Oregon demands that this little grant should be made.

Mr. BROMWELL. Has there been any survey made?

Mr. MALLORY. I presume not; and I will state why: it would require a considerable outlay of money such as is necessary to locate a railroad. But the frontiersmen have gone on and located the route, as such men do, and this is found to be the only line practicable.

Mr. BROMWELL. To whom or for whose benefit does this grant inure; to what company?

Mr. MALLORY. The grant is made to the State of Oregon, and it is to be controlled by the Legislature. I have no objection to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. JULIAN. I will yield to the gentleman from Minnesota to offer an amendment, and then I will renew the demand for the previous question.

Mr. DONNELLY. I find the fifth section is rather obscurely worded; therefore, to relieve the bill of all doubt as to the quantity of land granted, I offer the following amendment, to come in at the end of the section:

Provided, however, That the entire amount of public land granted by this act shall not exceed three sections per mile for each mile actually constructed.

Mr. JULIAN. I demand the previous question.

Mr. MALLORY. Mr. Speaker, when this bill was read at the Clerk's desk I moved that it be put on its passage. I would inquire how the gentleman from Indiana takes possession of the floor?

The SPEAKER. The Chair heard the gentleman from Oregon say "Mr. Speaker," and that was all.

Mr. MALLORY. Not being accustomed to making speeches, I suppose I did not speak loud enough to make myself heard.

The SPEAKER. Upon the gentleman's statement, with the consent of the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. JULIAN,] the Chair will recognize the former as having moved the previous question.

Mr. JULIAN. I waive my right.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

The first question was on the amendment of Mr. JULIAN.

Mr. JULIAN. I will modify my amendment by inserting after the words "quarter section" the words "to each person."

The amendment, as modified, was agreed to.

The question recurred on the amendment of Mr. DONNELLY.

Mr. MALLORY. If the floor had been under my control I should not have allowed that amendment.

The SPEAKER. If the gentleman should insist upon it the Chair would be compelled to rule that the floor belonged by right to the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. JULIAN.]

Mr. MALLORY. I hope the amendment will not be adopted.

The question being put, there were—ayes 53, noes 50; no quorum voting.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. DONNELLY and MALLORY were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 75, noes 45.

So the amendment of Mr. DONNELLY was agreed to.

The bill, as amended, was ordered to be read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time.

Mr. MALLORY. I demand the previous question on the passage.

Mr. HOLMAN. I move to lay the bill on the table.

The motion was disagreed to.

The previous question was then seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the bill was passed.

Mr. MALLORY moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

INDICTMENTS IN THE REBEL STATES.

The next business on the Speaker's table was the bill (S. No. 544) relating to the time for finding indictments in the courts of the United States in the late rebel States; which was read a first and second time.

The bill provides that the time for finding indictments in the courts of the United States in the late rebel States for offenses cognizable by said courts and which may have been committed since said States went into rebellion should be extended for the period of two years from and after said States are or may be restored to representation in Congress, provided that this provision shall not apply to treason or other political offenses.

Mr. BINGHAM. I ask that that bill be put on its passage.

Mr. KERR. I desire to inquire of the gentleman whether this bill has been considered by the appropriate committee in this House; and if not, I ask him to explain it?

Mr. BINGHAM. I answer the gentleman that the bill passed the Judiciary Committee of the Senate, as I am informed, unanimously, and I understand that a majority of the Judiciary Committee of this House have examined it and are satisfied with it. I beg leave further to say to the gentleman that the principle involved in the bill is sustained by every writer upon law accepted as authority in America and sustained by the precedents, so far as I know, of every State in this Union. Those who have noticed the reading of the bill will have discovered that it excepts from its operation treason and other political offenses. The result is that the bill simply extends in the States lately in insurrection, where the laws were silent and the courts closed, the time heretofore limited by law for the presentation of indictments for offenses against person and property. It is the exercise of legislative power simply over the law of the forum, and on that question there is not a division of opinion among the jurists of America. When your courts were not open indictments were impossible. The learned gentleman knows right well that the sanctions of the criminal law are at last the highest security known to the law for person and property. If these persons are not liable to indictment by reason of the courts being closed on account of insurrection, the result is that they snap their fingers in the face of the men they have outraged and wronged. To refuse to pass the bill, in short, in my judgment, would be to refuse to do justice to the people and so to give colorable license to crime. I move the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

The bill was ordered to a third reading; and was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. BINGHAM moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

REGENT OF THE SMITHSONIAN INSTITUTION.

The next business on the Speaker's table was a joint resolution (S. R. No. 200) reappointing Louis Agassiz a regent of the Smithsonian Institution; which was read a first and second time.

Mr. GARFIELD. I move the previous question on the passage of the joint resolution.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

The joint resolution was ordered to a third reading; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. GARFIELD moved to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed;

and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

LINCOLN MONUMENT.

The next business on the Speaker's table was a joint resolution (S. R. No. 203) donating cannon for a monument to the memory of the late President Lincoln.

Mr. CULLOM. I ask that that resolution be laid aside, as the House has already passed a similar resolution.

The joint resolution was passed over informally.

MILITARY ROAD IN OREGON.

The next business on the Speaker's table was Senate bill No. 679, to amend an act entitled "An act granting lands to the State of Oregon to aid in the construction of a military road from Eugene City to the eastern boundary of said State;" which was taken up and read a first and second time.

The question was on the third reading of the bill.

The preamble of the bill states that an act was passed July 2, 1864, granting lands to the State of Oregon to aid in the construction of a military road from Eugene City to the eastern boundary of the State, and that the time designated for the completion of the road expires on the 2d of July, 1869.

The bill provides for extending the time for the completion of the road to July 2, 1872.

Mr. MALLORY. I ask that this bill be now put on its passage.

Mr. JULIAN. Will the gentleman allow me to offer an amendment to the bill?

Mr. MALLORY. I will hear the amendment read.

Mr. JULIAN. I desire to move to amend the bill by adding to it the following:

Provided, That the grant of lands hereby renewed and continued shall be upon the condition that the lands shall be sold to actual settlers only, in quantities not greater than a quarter section, and for a price not exceeding $2 50 per acre.

Mr. MALLORY. While I do not object to the principle contained in that amendment I am very well aware that to adopt it at this stage of the session would endanger the passage of this bill.

I desire to state, so that the House may understand, the circumstances under which this legislation is asked. In July, 1864, a bill was passed through Congress giving to the State of Oregon six sections of land to the mile for the construction of a military wagon-road from Eugene City to the eastern boundary of the State of Oregon. The provisions of the bill required that the road should be completed within five years from the passage of the act. The citizens in that vicinity donated money for the purpose of constructing the road in order to enable them to open communication with the gold and silver mining regions of Idaho, so that they might have the benefit of that country as a market for their productions. The work was continued until the road was completed to the summit of the Cascade range of mountains and to the plains on the east side of that range; at a cost of something over two hundred thousand dollars in gold, which was paid by the people for that purpose.

On arriving at that point they found themselves in the vicinity of the Indian troubles, where General Crook was then engaged in operating against the Indians. The hostile character of the Indians prevented them from proceeding further with their work. But for the presence of the hostile Indians in that vicinity at that time this legislation would not now be asked. The only reason why the road has not been completed to the eastern boundary of the State of Oregon within the time limited by the original act is the fact that the hostile Indians precluded the company from proceeding with their work.

The time limited by the act will expire on the 2d of July next; and unless this bill pass at this session of Congress these lands, by the condition of the grant, will lapse to the United States, and the people of that region instead of having a road completed through to the eastern boundary of the State will simply have a road terminating at the top of the Cascade range of mountains, which will be of no value whatever to the people there, and the expense of constructing which will be an almost total loss to those who have invested their money in the construction of this road.

The House will understand that this bill does not propose to make an original grant of land for this purpose. The grant has already been made; and all that is now asked is simply a little further extension of time for the completion of the road. It seems to me that there can be no objection to this bill. Any limitations upon the grant incorporated into this bill at this time will have no other effect than to defeat the bill, and a defeat of this bill now is to deprive the people who have gone to work in good faith and expended their money in the construction of this road of the advantage of this grant, which will then revert to the United States. I think this bill ought to pass without amendment. The only reason why I object to the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. JULIAN] is that I believe the adoption of it, requiring the bill to be sent back to the Senate at this late stage of the session, will in all probability defeat it.

Mr. JULIAN. Mr. Speaker, the amendment which has been read by the Clerk is a provision which ought to be applied to every future grant of land and to every dead grant that seeks a revival at our hands. If the gentleman from Oregon will not permit that amendment to be offered and voted upon I hope the House will refuse to second the previous question and will allow me to submit a motion to refer the bill to the appropriate committee. The adoption of the amendment will not defeat the passage of the bill, for the Senate, like the House, has repeatedly approved of the very condition prescribed in the amendment, and it will take but a moment for that body to concur in it if it be attached to this bill.

Mr. MALLORY. I yield for a moment to the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. INGERSOLL.]

Mr. INGERSOLL. I desire the gentleman from Oregon [Mr. MALLORY] to inform the House whether this bill proposes any enlargement of the original grant or simply its revival.

Mr. MALLORY. It is simply a proposition to extend the time for the completion of the road. I have already stated emphatically to the House that this legislation is asked for now not by reason of any fault or neglect on the part of the company, but because the presence of hostile Indians prevented the company from going on with the work. If upon this statement the House is not willing to extend the grant, then the bill must be voted down.

Mr. RAUM. Will the gentleman yield to me for a question?

Mr. MALLORY. Yes, sir.

Mr. RAUM. I wish to ask whether the road, so far as it has been constructed, has been constructed by a company and is now a toll-road?

Mr. MALLORY. It is a toll-road for all purposes except for the use of the United States. Under a provision of the bill making the grant the company has no right whatever to charge the United States Government for any use the latter may make of the road, not even for the transportation of troops or the carrying of the mails.

I now insist upon the demand for the previous question.

On seconding the previous question there were—ayes 69, noes 49.

Mr. JULIAN. I call for tellers.

Tellers were not ordered.

So the previous question was seconded.

Mr. JULIAN. I move that the bill be laid on the table; and on that motion I demand the yeas and nays.

On ordering the yeas and nays there were—ayes 28, noes 99.

Mr. JULIAN. I call for tellers on ordering the yeas and nays.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. JULIAN and Mr. MALLORY were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 81, noes 91.

So (one fifth voting in favor thereof) the yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 35, nays 98, not voting 89; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Archer, Arnell, Baker, Banks, Beatty, Benton, Boutwell, Broomall, Benjamin F. Butler, Calk, Churchill, Cobb, Cook, Dawes, Dickey, Dockery, Ela, Fields, Garfield, Getz, Haight, Holman, Julian, Kelsey, William Lawrence, McCarthy, McKee, Newsham, Randall, Scofield, Shanks, Shelbarger, Sitgreaves, Stevens, and Taylor—35.

NAYS—Messrs. Adams, Delos R. Ashley, Axtell, Barnes, Barnum, Beck, Blair, Boyden, Buckland, Buckley, Cary, Chanler, Coburn, Corley, Covode, Culom, Deweese, Dixon, Dodge, Driggs, Eckley, Thomas D. Eliot, James T. Elliott, Ferriss, Ferry, Glossbrenner, Golladay, Goss, Gove, Grover, Haughey, Hawkins, Heaton, Higby, Hill, Hooper, Hopkins, Hotchkiss, Chester D. Hubbard, Ingersoll, Jenckes, Johnson, Alexander H. Jones, Thomas L. Jones, Judd, Kellogg, Kerr, Knott, Laflin, Lash, George V. Lawrence, Lincoln, Logan, Mallory, Marshall, Maynard, McCormick, Meurer, Miller, Moorhead, Morrill, Mullins, Mungen, Myers, Newcomb, Nicholson, Norris, O'Neill, Orth, Phelps, Pile, Poland, Price, Robertson, Root, Sawyer, Smith, Spaulding, Starkweather, Stewart, Stone, Stover, Taber, Tift, Trowbridge, Twichell, Burt Van Horn, Robert T. Van Horn, Ward, Henry D. Washburn, William B. Washburn, Welker, Whittemore, Thomas Williams, William Williams, Windom, Wood, and Young—98.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Allison, Ames, Anderson, James M. Ashley, Bailey, Baldwin, Beaman, Benjamin, Bingham, Blackburn, Blaine, Boies, Bowen, Boyer, Bromwell, Brooks, Burr, Rodrick R. Butler, Callis, Reader W. Clarke, Sidney Clarke, Clift, Cornell, Delano, Donnelly, Edwards, Eggleston, Eldridge, Farnsworth, Fox, French, Gravelly, Griswold, Halsey, Hamilton, Harding, Asabel W. Hubbard, Richard D. Hubbard, Hulburd, Humphrey, Hunter, Kelley, Ketcham, Kitchen, Kootz, Loan, Loughridge, Lyach, Marvin, McCullough, Moore, Morrissey, Niblack, Nunn, Paine, Perham, Peters, Pettis, Pierce, Pike, Plants, Polsley, Pomeroy, Prince, Pruyn, Raum, Robinson, Ross, Schenck, Selye, Stokes, Sypher, Taffe, Thomas, John Trimble, Lawrence S. Trimble, Upson, Van Aernam, Van Auken, Van Trump, Van Wyck, Vidal, Cadwalader C. Washburn, Elihu B. Washburne, James F. Wilson, John T. Wilson, Stephen F. Wilson, Woodbridge, and Woodward—89.

So the bill was not laid on the table.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message was received from the Senate, by Mr. HAMLIN, one of its clerks, notifying the House that that body had adopted the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on House bill No. 1570, making appropriations for the consular and diplomatic expenses of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1870, and for other purposes.

It further announced that the Senate had agreed to the conference asked for on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on House bill No. 1746, for the removal of certain disabilities from the persons therein named, and had appointed as managers on its part Mr. STEWART, Mr. TRUMBULL, and Mr. HENDRICKS.

The hour of half past four having arrived the House took a recess till nine o'clock p. m.

EVENING SESSION.

The House reassembled at nine o'clock p. m. Mr. LOGAN moved that the House adjourn until to-morrow at ten o'clock a. m.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 48, noes 67.

So the motion was disagreed to.

ALLEGED NEW YORK ELECTION FRAUDS.

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Ohio, from the select Committee on Alleged Election Frauds in New York, submitted a supplemental report; which was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

MILITARY ROAD IN OREGON.

The SPEAKER. The first business in order is the consideration of Senate bill No. 679, to amend an act entitled "An act granting lands to the State of Oregon to aid in the construction of a military road from Eugene City to the eastern boundary of said State." At the taking of the recess the House refused to lay the bill on the table. The previous question was seconded, and the question now is "Shall the main question be now ordered to be put?"

The main question was ordered.

The bill was ordered to a third reading; and it was accordingly read the third time.

Mr. MALLORY demanded the previous question on the passage of the bill.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the bill was passed.

Mr. MALLORY moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

CAPTAIN CHARLES HUNTER.

The next business on the Speaker's table was Senate bill No. 844, for the relief of Captain Charles Hunter; which was read the first and second time.

The bill directs the Secretary of the Treasury to pay Captain Charles Hunter, United States Navy, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, pay as commander in the Navy on leave from the 22d of June, 1863, to the 21st of June, 1866.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I should like to hear some explanation of the bill.

Mr. BENJAMIN. I make the point of order that that makes an appropriation, and under the rule must have its first consideration in the Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. The Chair sustains the point of order, as the bill does make an appropriation.

Mr. SCHENCK. I ask the gentleman from Missouri to withdraw his point of order until he hears what this bill is.

Mr. BENJAMIN. I withdraw the point of order for the present. Has the bill ever been considered by any committee of this House?

Mr. PIKE. The facts about this case, Mr. Speaker, are that Captain Hunter, while in charge of one of our naval vessels during the war pursued a blockader, and in following it with great diligence went into Cuban waters. When within three miles of the shore the people on board the blockader became alarmed and burnt it. Therefore, Captain Hunter was court-martialed, as our foreign relations were in a very delicate condition and it was necessary to conciliate foreign nations. He was court-martialed and dismissed from service. Subsequently he was restored. This bill gives him his pay for the time he was out of service. Under these circumstances I know no gentleman will object.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Wisconsin. Under the statement of the chairman of the committee there is no question that this bill ought to pass.

Mr. BENJAMIN. I withdraw the objection.

The bill was ordered to a third reading; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. PIKE moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ALPHEUS C. GALLAHUE.

The next business on the Speaker's table was the bill (S. No. 781) for the relief of Alpheus C. Gallahue; which was read a first and second time.

It grants leave to the petitioner to make application to the Commissioner of Patents for an extension of a patent granted to him on the 16th day of August, 1853, for pegging boots and shoes, antedated the 18th of February, 1853, for fourteen years from the latter date, in the same manner as if the petition for said extension had been filed at least ninety days before the expiration of the patent.

Mr. JENCKES. I am instructed by the Committee on Patents to move to concur in that bill. It simply proposes to relieve the party against the consequence of a mistake, and it gives him no right except to apply to the Commissioner of Patents in the same manner as he might have done if he had not made the mistake which is set forth in the bill.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Will the gentleman state why the patent was not applied for?

Mr. JENCKES. The petitioner explains it in this way: his patent was antedated six months and he indorsed it as of that date. On making his application he discovered the fact which he had forgotten, and he did not make it within the ninety days required by law. I demand the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the bill was read a third time.

Mr. SCOFIELD. I move to lay the bill on the table.

The motion was disagreed to—ayes twenty-one, noes not counted.

The bill was passed.

Mr. JENCKES moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

REDUCTION OF MILITARY FORCES.

The next business on the Speaker's table was the bill (S. No. 811) to provide for the reduction of the military forces, and for other purposes; which was read a first and second time.

Mr. GARFIELD. I ask that this bill be informally laid aside until we get the Army appropriation bill from the Senate. We do not know what may come in that direction.

By unanimous consent the bill was laid aside.

JOHN W. DAVIDSON.

The next business on the Speaker's table was the bill (S. No. 661) for the relief of Lieutenant Colonel John W. Davidson, of the United States Army; which was read a first and second time. It directs the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to the petitioner $218 25, being the amount of public money stolen from him while in his possession at Los Angeles, California, in August, 1847.

Mr. PILE. I ask it to be put on its passage. In explanation I send to the desk the report of the Senate committee who examined this matter. I will also state that I examined the matter myself at the Treasury and War Departments, and the statements in this report are verified by the official papers in those Departments.

The report was read.

The bill was ordered to a third reading; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. PILE moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

REV. D. HILLHOUSE BUEL.

The next business on the Speaker's table was the bill (S. No. 760) for the relief of Rev. D. Hillhouse Buel; which was read a first and second time.

Mr. GRISWOLD. I ask that that bill be put upon its passage now.

The bill was read. It directs the Secretary of the Treasury to cause to be issued to the Rev. D. Hillhouse Buel, of Cooperstown, New York, proper certificates of registered stock of the United States consolidated debt under the act of March 3, 1865, to the amount of $7,000, in lieu and stead of certificates of said debt numbered 16331 and 16332 for $1,000 each, and certificate numbered 4987 for $5,000, belonging to him and lost while passing through the mails; provided that the said Buel shall give bonds with surety to the satisfaction of the Secretary of the Treasury conditioned to indemnify the United States against all claims upon or in respect to the first-mentioned certificates.

Mr. GRISWOLD. The circumstances attending the loss of these bonds are simply these: Rev. Mr. Buel sent coupon bonds to the Treasury to be exchanged for registered bonds. In transmitting them by mail they were lost more than a year since. By the usage of the Treasury Department they are of no value to a third party, as they have to go to the Treasury Department to be registered again in the event of their being transferred to a third party. In addition to that, the Government is amply indemnified against loss, and there is no possible objection to the passage of the bill.

Mr. SCOFIELD. Do I understand the gentleman from New York to say that the bonds lost were registered bonds?

Mr. GRISWOLD. Yes, sir.

Mr. SCOFIELD. Then this bill is entirely unnecessary. The registry of the Treasury Department shows that fact, and the simple losing of the certificate of registry amounts to nothing. The party can go to the Treasury and get his interest and pay when the bonds are due the same as if he had not lost his certificate.

Mr. GRISWOLD. He will want some evidence when the bonds are due. He has no evidence of indebtedness unless he has the bonds.

Mr. SCOFIELD. If I understand the bill, it was seven-thirties that were sent to the Treasury for conversion, or coupon bonds.

Mr. GRISWOLD. It was coupon bonds that were sent to be exchanged for registered bonds.

Mr. SCOFIELD. That is what I understand.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Wisconsin. As I understand the case, coupon bonds were sent to the Treasury to be exchanged, and they were exchanged for registered bonds, and the registered bonds were lost in the mails.

Mr. GRISWOLD. Yes, sir.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Wisconsin. And he now wants duplicate bonds.

Mr. GRISWOLD. Yes; there can be no possible objection to it.

Mr. SCOFIELD. There could be no objection to the bill on the statement of the gentleman from New York, but I think he is mistaken as to the character of the transaction. If there is a report made by the Senate committee I would like to have it read.

The SPEAKER. There is no report, but the bill will be read again, as there seems to be some misunderstanding in regard to the facts.

The bill was again read.

Mr. GRISWOLD. Unless some gentleman desires to ask further questions I will move the previous question.

Mr. WOOD. I desire to ask my colleague whether there is any precedent for a bill of this character? Has Congress ever indemnified parties under these circumstances?

Mr. GRISWOLD. Yes; plenty of them.

Mr. WOOD. Will my colleague state one?

Mr. GRISWOLD. I cannot give the gentleman names and dates, but I say to him from my own knowledge that bills of this character have been passed.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Wisconsin. I think I recollect a case which passed this very Congress reported from the Committee of Claims by the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. WASHBURN.]

Mr. PETERS. We have passed two or three such bills.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Wisconsin. As I understand the bill, there can be no objection to it.

Mr. MAYNARD. What evidence is there that the bonds are lost? Where is the proof?

Mr. INGERSOLL. They make their proof to the proper officers of the Treasury.

Mr. GRISWOLD. The Government can lose nothing by this bill. I call the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the bill was read the third time, and passed.

Mr. GRISWOLD moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

BUILDING FOR INTERIOR DEPARTMENT, ETC.

The next business on the Speaker's table was Senate joint resolution No. 204, relating to the Department of the Interior; which was taken up, and read a first and second time.

The question was upon ordering the joint resolution to be read a third time.

The joint resolution was read. The first section authorizes the Secretary of the Interior to lease, for a period not exceeding one year, with the privilege of continuing the same from year to year for five years, at a yearly rent not exceeding $10,000, the fire-proof building on G street, owned by Mr. White, for the use of the Department of the Interior; and the sum of $10,000 is appropriated for that purpose. The second section authorizes the Secretary of the Interior to remove from the floor of the said Department building now occupied for the storage and exhibition of models, whenever in his judgment the accumulation of such models may render the same expedient, all such models as relate to applications for patents not granted, and to dispose of the same as he may think best.

Mr. JENCKES. If this bill is to be passed I move to amend it by striking out the second section.

Mr. KELSEY. This is an appropriation bill, and I make the point of order that it must receive its first consideration in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. The Chair sustains the point of order, and the bill will be referred to the Committee of the Whole unless a motion is made to suspend the rules to consider it in the House.

Mr. JENCKES. I have no objection to the first section of the bill; but the second section involves one of the worst jobs ever attempted to be put through Congress.

Mr. SCOFIELD. This subject was before the Committee on Appropriations, and they gave it some consideration. It was proposed to put it on one of the appropriation bills, but the proposition did not secure the sanction of that committee.

Mr. JENCKES. I will make no objection to this bill going to the Committee of the Whole.

The bill was accordingly referred, under the rule, to the Committee of the Whole.

HEIRS OF THOMAS LAWSON.

The next business on the Speaker's table was the bill of the Senate, No. 647, for the relief of the heirs of the late Thomas Lawson, deceased; which was taken up, and read a first and second time.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Massachusetts. I move that this bill be referred to the Committee of Claims.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Massachusetts, moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was referred; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

EXTRADITION OF CRIMINALS.

The next business on the Speaker's table was Senate bill No. 705, further to provide for giving effect to treaty stipulations between this and foreign Governments for the extradition of criminals; which was taken up, and read a first and second time.

The question was upon ordering the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read. The first section provides that whenever any person shall have been delivered by any foreign Government to an agent or agents of the United States, for the purpose of being brought within the United States and tried for any crime of which he is duly accused, the President shall have power to take all necessary measures for the transportation and safe-keeping of such accused person and for his security against lawless violence until the final conclusion of his trial for the crimes or offenses specified in the warrant of extradition, and until his final discharge from custody or imprisonment for or on account of such crimes or offenses, and for a reasonable time thereafter. And it shall be lawful for the President, or such person as he may empower for that purpose, to employ such portion of the land or naval forces of the United States, or of the militia thereof, as may be necessary for the safe-keeping and protection of the accused as aforesaid.

The second section provides that any person duly appointed as agent to receive in behalf of the United States the delivery by a foreign Government of any person accused of crime committed within the jurisdiction of the United States and to convey him to the place of his trial shall be, and hereby is, vested with all the powers of a marshal of the United States in the several districts through which it may be necessary for him to pass with such prisoner, so far as such power is requisite for his safe-keeping.

The third section provides that if any person or persons shall knowingly and willfully obstruct, resist, or oppose such agent in the execution of his duties, or shall rescue, or attempt to rescue, such prisoner, whether in the custody of the agent aforesaid, or of any marshal, sheriff, jailor, or other officer or person to whom his custody may have lawfully been committed, every person so knowingly and willfully offending in the premises, shall, on conviction thereof before the district or circuit court of the United States for the district in which the offense was committed, be fined not exceeding $1,000 and imprisoned not exceeding one year.

Mr. BANKS. This bill is rendered necessary by events of recent occurrence which, doubtless, are familiar to all members here. It has been examined by the chairman and I think other members of the Judiciary Committee, and they recommend its passage. I call the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the bill was ordered to a third reading, and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. BANKS moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

PAVEMENT OF PENNSYLVANIA AVENUE.

The next business on the Speaker's table was Senate bill No. 786, for the pavement of Pennsylvania avenue; which was taken up, and read a first and second time.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I ask that the bill be read; and if members will give attention there will be no objection to it. We all know that Pennsylvania avenue is in a poor condition. If any gentleman should make a point of order on the bill I shall move to suspend the rules.

The bill was read in extenso.

Mr. PILE. I made the point of order that that bill makes an appropriation and must be referred.

The SPEAKER. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I move that the rules be suspended for the purpose of considering the bill in the House.

Mr. TABER. The bill ought to be referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

The House refused to suspend the rules.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I move that the bill be referred to the Committee for the District of Columbia.

The motion was agreed to.

ENROLLED BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Mr. WILSON, of Pennsylvania, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the committee had examined and found truly enrolled bills and joint resolutions of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

An act (H. R. No. 112) relating to captures made by Admiral Farragut's fleet in the Mississippi river in May, 1862;

An act (H. R. No. 425) for the relief of Mary A. Filler;

An act (H. R. No. 1279) in relation to additional bounties, and for other purposes;

An act (H. R. No. 1344) to confirm certain private land claims in the Territory of New Mexico;

An act (H. R. No. 1827) to amend an act entitled "An act to exempt certain manufacturers from internal tax, and for other purposes," approved March 31, 1868;

An act (H. R. No. 1487) to declare and fix the status of judge advocates;

An act (H. R. No. 1867) for the relief of the Illinois Iron and Bolt Company;

An act (H. R. No. 1879) for the relief of certain companies of scouts and guides organized in Alabama;

An act (H. R. No. 1928) granting a pension to Lemuel Barthallow;

An act (H. R. No. 1930) granting a pension to Madge K. Guthrie and Robert B. Guthrie;

An act (H. R. No. 1973) in reference to certifying checks by national banks;

An act (H. R. No. 1989) for the relief of Peter McGough, collector of internal revenue and disbursing agent of the twentieth district, Pennsylvania;

Joint resolution (H. R. No. 438) relative to certain purchases by the Interior Department; and Joint resolution (H. R. No. 211) for the relief of Henry S. Gibbons, Luther McNeal, and Seth M. Gates.

SALE OF ST. LOUIS ARSENAL GROUNDS.

The next business on the Speaker's table was Senate bill No. 862, amendatory of the act providing for the sale of the arsenal grounds at St. Louis and Liberty, Missouri, and for other purposes, approved July 25, 1868; which was taken up, and read a first and second time.

The bill provides that so much of the third section of the act providing for the sale of the arsenal grounds at St. Louis and Liberty, Missouri, and for other purposes, approved July 21, 1868, as grants to the city of St. Louis the westernmost six acres of the tract of ground occupied by the St. Louis arsenal be repealed so far as it designates the part of said tract so granted; and in lieu of said westernmost six acres there shall be granted to said city, for the purposes and upon the conditions expressed in said act, other six acres of said tract, to be designated by the Secretary of War; and that the period limited in said act for the erection of the monument therein contemplated to be erected shall be considered as commencing at the time when the Secretary of War shall have designated the six acres of said tract to be granted to said city; provided, however, that no part of the said six acres shall be selected east of the western line of the ground occupied by the St. Louis and Iron Mountain railroad for its road.

Mr. PILE. Mr. Speaker, this bill makes three changes in the law providing for the sale of the St. Louis arsenal. First, the law now donates the western six acres to the city of St. Louis for a park on which to erect a statue of General Lyon. The lines of the arsenal tract not running east and west, the western six acres would be a triangular tract not suitable for a park. This bill provides that the Secretary of War shall designate the six acres for the park. Second, this bill provides that the three years during which this monument of General Lyon is to be erected shall date from the time of the designation of the six acres to be so used by the Secretary of War; and third, that no part of this six acres shall be east of the Iron Mountain railroad tract. I think there can be no objection to the passage of this bill. I call for the previous question.

The bill was ordered to a third reading; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. PILE moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

HENRY C. NOYES.

The next business on the Speaker's table was Senate bill No. 264, for the relief of Henry C. Noyes; which was taken up, and read the first and second time.

The bill directs the Secretary of the Treasury to issue a new bond for $1,000, with coupons from and including that of July 1, 1867, to Henry C. Noyes, of Claremont, New Hampshire, in place of his coupon bond for a like amount, No. 55337, act of March 3, 1865, July issue, 1865, destroyed; provided, that before issuing a new bond the Secretary of the Treasury shall require a sufficient bond of indemnity securing the Government against the presentation of the bond alleged to be lost.

Mr. BENTON. I know Mr. Noyes very well by reputation. He has sustained an excellent character as a man of integrity. The testimony, as I am informed by the Senate committee, was full and explicit to show the destruction of this bond, which occurred in consequence of its being kept in a cellar. This bill provides for the issue of a new bond upon the condition that there shall be filed an indemnity bond acceptable to the Secretary of the Treasury securing the Government against any possible loss. It has been now some two or three years since this bond was lost, and no bond or coupon of the same number has been presented. From the Senate committee, which I understand was unanimous in reporting in favor of this bill, I learn that the testimony was ample as to the fact of the loss and the propriety of affording relief as proposed in the bill.

Mr. MAYNARD. I do not understand that the gentleman from New Hampshire [Mr. BENTON] in presenting this case to the House speaks from his personal knowledge or from his own examination and estimate of the testimony. His information is from the committee of the Senate who examined the case. Now, this is altogether too loose a mode of legislation. A coupon bond passes by delivery, and in whosoever hand it is it constitutes a valid claim against the Government.

This bill, before we act upon it, ought to be referred to a suitable committee of this House, that the testimony may be analyzed and that we may have a written report presenting to us the evidence in such a form that we can act intelligently on the case.

This case is unlike that upon which we passed a few moments ago. That was the case of a registered bond; and there seemed to be some little plausibility in the measure from the fact that the bond in the hands of a third party might not very conveniently be used to the prejudice of the Government. But here the case is different. I move, therefore, that this bill be referred to the Committee of Claims.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from New Hampshire [Mr. BENTON] yield to allow the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MAYNARD] to make the motion to refer the bill to the Committee of Claims?

Mr. BENTON. I do not yield for that purpose.

Mr. Speaker, I have myself seen the testimony in this case, and I regard it as proving conclusively the destruction of this bond. It was a bond for $1,000, constituting all the property that this poor man had in the world. He undertook to keep it in his cellar—the most secret place that was at his command. The bond went to pieces. A portion of it was produced before the committee.

The gentleman from Tennessee says this is unlike the case of a registered bond. Now, I understand that a registered bond might be assigned, and there is just as much chance of the Government being called upon to pay a registered as a coupon bond. The security the Government has under this bill is that an indemnity bond is required to be filed.

Mr. MAYNARD. In the case of a registered bond the assignment would be shown on the books of the Treasury.

Mr. WARD. I desire to ask the gentleman from New Hampshire [Mr. BENTON] whether the date and number of this lost bond are known and proved?

Mr. BENTON. They are both proved, both the number and date of the bond.

Mr. WARD. Then it perhaps cannot do any harm to grant the relief.

Mr. SCOTFIELD. I understand the gentleman to say that enough of the bond was preserved to identify it.

Mr. BENTON. I said there were pieces shown to the committee.

Mr. SCOTFIELD. Under the practice of the Treasury whenever a bond can be identified they reissue a new one under general legislation, and they employ experts in the Treasury for that purpose.

Mr. BENTON. I understand there was not sufficient of the bond presented. The case was before the Department for a considerable time, and it was recommended that application should be made to Congress for this act. The matter has been fully considered by the Senate committee and unanimously reported upon. It seems to me there can be no risk at all about it. I move the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

Mr. SCOTFIELD. Unless the gentleman will allow this to go to a committee I shall move to lay it on the table.

Mr. INGERSOLL. To send it to a committee would be the death of it.

The question being put on laying the bill on the table, there were—ayes 22, noes 54; no quorum voting.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. SCOTFIELD and BENTON were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 38, noes 78.

So the House refused to lay the bill on the table.

The question recurred upon the passage of the bill; and being put, there were—ayes 45, noes 26; no quorum voting.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Wisconsin. This is establishing an important precedent; and I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 77, nays 37, not voting 108; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anderson, Delos R. Ashley, Barnes, Beaman, Benton, Bingham, Blair, Benjamin F. Butler, Cary, Sidney Clarke, Clift, Coburn, Corley, Dodge, Driggs, Eggleston, Ela, Thomas D. Eliot, James T. Elliott, Ferriss, Ferry, Fields, Garfield, Getz, Goss, Gove, Gravelly, Grover, Harding, Heaton, Higby, Hopkins, Hotchkiss, Ingersoll, Jencks, Johnson, Alexander H. Jones, Judd, Kellogg, Kitchen, Ladin, George V. Lawrence, Lynch, Mallory, Marvin, McCarthy, Moore, Moorhead, Morrell, Myers, Niblack, Norris, O'Neill, Orth, Perham, Peters, Pile, Poland, Robertson, Roots, Sawyer, Smith, Starkweather, Stevens, Stewart, Stokes, Taylor, Tift, Twichell, Upson, Van Aernam, Burt Van Horn, Robert T. Van Horn, Ward, Whittemore, William Williams, and Woodward—77.

NAYS—Messrs. Arnell, Beatty, Bromwell, Broomall, Buckland, Buckley, Calkins, Cobb, Cook, Dixon, Donnelly, Eckley, Golladay, Hawkins, Holman, Chester D. Hubbard, Hulburd, Hunter, Knott, Maynard, McCormick, McKee, Mercer, Miller, Mullins, Paine, Pomeroy, Price, Scofield, Sitgreaves, Stone, Thomas, Van Wyck, Cadwalader C. Washburn, Henry D. Washburn, William B. Washburn, and Stephen F. Wilson—37.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Adams, Allison, Ames, Archer, James M. Ashley, Axtell, Bailey, Baker, Baldwin, Banks, Barnum, Beck, Benjamin, Blackburn, Blaine, Boies, Boutwell, Bowen, Boyden, Boyer, Brooks, Burr, Roderick R. Butler, Callis, Chanler, Churchill, Reader W. Clarke, Cornell, Covey, Culom, Dawes, Delano, Dewees, Dickey, Dockery, Edwards, Eldridge, Farnsworth, Fox, French, Glessbrenner, Griswold, Haight, Halsey, Hamilton, Haughey, Hill, Hooper, Asahel H. Hubbard, Richard D. Hubbard, Humphrey, Thomas L. Jones, Julian, Kelley, Kelsey, Kerr, Ketcham, Koontz, Lash, William Lawrence, Lincoln, Loan, Logan, Loughridge, Marshall, McCullough, Morrissey, Mungen, Newcomb, Newsham, Nicholson, Nunn, Pettis, Phelps, Pierce, Pike, Plants, Polsey, Prince, Bruyn, Randall, Staam, Robinson, Ross, Schenck, Selye, Shaaks, Schellabarger, Spalding, Stover, Sypher, Taber, Taffe, John Trimble, Lawrence S. Trimble, Trowbridge, Van Auker, Van Trump, Vidal, Elihu B. Washburn, Welker, Thomas Williams, James F. Wilson, John T. Wilson, Windom, Wood, Woodbridge, and Young—108.

So the bill was passed.

Mr. BENTON moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

JUDGMENTS IN CAPITAL CASES.

The next business on the Speaker's table was the bill (S. No. 753) to provide for the execution of judgments in capital cases; which was read a first and second time.

Mr. McKEE (at ten o'clock and thirty minutes p. m.) moved that the House adjourn.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has information from the Senate that the legislative and executive appropriation bill is nearly completed, with a very few amendments.

Mr. SCOTFIELD. The House cannot possibly act upon it to-night. It may be well enough to have it referred to the committee.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I hope the House will hold on till we can get the bill over here and have it referred to the committee.

Mr. McKEE. I withdraw the motion.

The bill was read. It enacts that wherever a judgment of death has been or shall hereafter be rendered in any court of the United States, and the case has been or shall hereafter be carried to the Supreme Court of the United States by appeal or writ of error in pursuance of law, it shall be the duty of the court rendering such judgment by order of court to postpone the execution thereof from time to time and from term to term until the mandate of the Supreme Court in such case shall have been received and entered upon the records of the lower court, and in case such judgment is affirmed by the Supreme Court it shall be the duty of the court rendering the original judgment to appoint a day for the execution thereof; and in case of a reversal by the Supreme Court such further proceeding shall be had in the lower court as the Supreme Court may direct.

Mr. SCOTFIELD. I move to refer that bill to the Committee on Revision of Laws of the United States with leave to report at any time.

Mr. WOODWARD. I think that bill ought to be referred to some committee.

Mr. MAYNARD. It seems to me that we might as well act upon it now as at any other time. There is not a lawyer in the House who does not understand it, I imagine.

Mr. MILLER. It is perfectly plain upon its face.

Mr. HOLMAN. I hope the bill will be put upon its passage.

The SPEAKER. The motion to refer with leave to the committee to report at any time requires a two-thirds vote. It requires a suspension of the rules.

The question was put on Mr. SCOTFIELD's motion; and (two-thirds not voting in favor thereof) the motion was rejected.

Mr. MAYNARD. It seems to me there ought to be no trouble about this bill. I understand that a case has arisen, perhaps more than one, which has given the Attorney General's office a great deal of trouble arising out of the present state of the law. This bill proposes that when a writ of error is prosecuted in the Supreme Court in a capital case the party shall not be executed pending the examination of his writ of error. It seems to me that we might pass the bill.

Mr. WOODWARD. It struck me, in hearing the bill read, that it is objectionable in this respect: the execution of a capital judgment is an executive duty, under the control of the executive department, and with which the judiciary has nothing to do and ought to have nothing to do. My objection to this bill, if I heard it correctly, is that it vests in the judiciary the execution of an executive trust.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will again report the bill, as that may possibly settle the doubt upon the subject.

The bill was again read.

Mr. WOODWARD. When a court renders a judgment of death the executive authorities carry that judgment into execution. The judgment is executed under the authority of the executive department and not the judicial department.

Mr. HOLMAN. I would ask the gentleman if the court does not fix the day of execution?

Mr. WOODWARD. I do not know how it is in the Federal courts; in the State of Pennsylvania the court never fixes the time, but the Governor of the Commonwealth fixes the time. The court pronounces judgment of death, and then the duty of executing that judgment attaches to the executive department of the Government. That is the legitimate and constitutional mode in all constitutional Governments. The only objection to this bill is that it makes the postponement of the execution a judicial duty instead of an executive duty. If the bill provided that the President should postpone the execution I should have no objection to it, but it provides that the court shall do it.

Mr. JENCKES. It seems to me that the bill ought to pass. The law of the courts of the United States is different from the law of Pennsylvania. I remember a case where a court in Georgia sentenced a man to death, and although a writ of error was sustained in the Supreme Court of the United States it did not save the man's life. It is to prevent the recurrence of any such case as that that this bill is proposed. It may not do it in the best manner, but it is a thing that ought to be done. If a writ of error is granted by the court which tries a case in which a citizen is sentenced to death it ought to be obligatory upon the judge to postpone the execution of the sentence until after the writ of error shall have been heard and determined by the tribunal of last resort.

Mr. WOODWARD. Then provide that the President shall postpone the execution of the sentence.

Mr. JENCKES. The President has nothing to do with it under the laws of the United States. It is the judge who pronounces the sentence and fixes the day for the execution. It is for him to postpone it in case of a writ of error, and this bill requires him to do it. I hope the bill will pass, and I move the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

The bill was ordered to a third reading; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. JENCKES moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

GEORGE FOWLER ET AL.

The next business on the Speaker's table was Senate bill No. 891, for the relief of George Fowler and the estate of De Grasse Fowler, deceased, or their assigns; which was taken up, and read a first and second time.

The question was on ordering the bill to be read a third time.

The bill, which was read, provides that George Fowler and the administrators of the estate of De Grasse Fowler, or their assigns, have leave to make application to the Commissioner of Patents for an extension of the letters-patent for improvement in machine for punching metal, issued to the said George Fowler and De Grasse Fowler for the term of fourteen years from the 17th day of April, 1855, in the same manner as if the petition for said extension had been filed at least ninety days prior to the expiration of said patent, and that the Commissioner he authorized to consider and determine said application in the same manner as if it had been filed ninety days before the expiration of the said patent.

Mr. JENCKES. I am instructed by the Committee on Patents, who have had this case under consideration, to ask that this bill be now put upon its passage. I will yield to the gentleman from Connecticut, [Mr. STARKWEATHER,] to explain the circumstances of this case.

Mr. STARKWEATHER. The facts in the case are these: the time required by the law at present for applications for renewals of patents is at least ninety days before the expiration of the original patent. Under the old law the time was sixty days. These parties are living in the country; one is a widow who cannot be expected to be very well acquainted with the law. They did make application within the time allowed by the law, and lacked but one day even under the present law. The Committees on Patents of the Senate and of the House have examined this bill, and are of the opinion that there can be no objection to it. The parties are poor, and this is merely to reimburse them for their expenses in perfecting this patent.

Mr. WARD. I would inquire how many accidents of this kind are there? This is the third or fourth one for to-night. There seems to be a great many accidents in these patent cases.

Mr. JENCKES. I will answer the gentleman. Out of each thousand cases which come before the Patent Office probably there are ten in which there are these accidents. In some cases relief should be granted and in some it should not be. The Committee on Patents think this is a case where relief should be granted.

This is a pure accident, one which I think the Commissioner of Patents might himself have relieved if he had chosen to exercise the power given to him by the law as it now stands. But he did not act, and a sufficient time has run against these parties to take from the Commissioner the power to waive the delay. There is no way to remedy this difficulty except by the passage of some such bill as this. The Committee on Patents think this bill can be passed without injury to any one. I call the previous question on the bill.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the bill was read the third time.

The question was on the passage of the bill; and on a division there were—ayes 81, noes 81.

So the bill was passed.

Mr. JENCKES moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ELECTIONS IN WASHINGTON AND IDAHO.

The next business on the Speaker's table was Senate bill No. 810, to regulate elections in Washington and Idaho Territories; which was taken up, and read a first and second time.

The question was on ordering the bill to be read a third time.

The bill, which was read, provides that elections in the Territories of Washington and Idaho for Delegates to the House of Representatives of the Forty-Second Congress shall be held on the first Monday of June, A. D. 1870, and afterward biennially on the first Monday of June; and such officers in said Territories as are now elected at the same time with their Delegates shall be elected for offices thereafter to be filled at the times herein specified unless otherwise provided by the laws of said Territories.

The bill was ordered to a third reading; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. HIGBY moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

EQUAL RIGHTS IN THE DISTRICT.

The next business on the Speaker's table was a bill (S. No. 228) for the further security of equal rights in the District of Columbia; which was read a first and second time.

The bill provides that the word "white," wherever it occurs in the laws relating to the District of Columbia or in the charter or ordinances of the cities of Washington or Georgetown and operates as a limitation on the right of any elector of said District or of either of said cities to hold any office or to be selected and to serve as a juror, be repealed; and it is declared unlawful for any person or officer to enforce or attempt to enforce such limitation after the passage of this act.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I desire to have this bill put upon its passage, and I demand the previous question.

Mr. HOLMAN. I move that the bill be laid on the table.

The motion was not agreed to.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the bill was ordered to a third reading, and was accordingly read the third time.

The question being on the passage of the bill, Mr. HOLMAN called for the yeas and nays. On ordering the yeas and nays there were—ayes 17, noes 81.

Mr. GETZ. I call for tellers on ordering the yeas and nays.

Tellers were not ordered; and the yeas and nays were not ordered.

Mr. TRIMBLE, of Kentucky. I call for tellers on the passage of the bill.

Tellers were not ordered.

The bill was passed.

Mr. GARFIELD moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

CELESTIA P. HARTT.

The next business on the Speaker's table was the bill (S. No. 836) for the relief of Celestia P. Hartt; which was read a first and second time.

The bill authorizes and directs the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to Celestia P. Hartt, widow of the late naval constructor Samuel T. Hartt, the sum of $3,000 out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the same to be in full and complete compensation and satisfaction for the use of a gun-elevating screw invented by said Samuel T. Hartt, and which has been used on the iron gun-carriages of the United States Navy.

Mr. HOLMAN. I raise the point of order that this bill contains an appropriation and must receive its first consideration in the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. LYNCH. I ask the gentleman to withdraw that objection until he hears the report of the Committee on Naval Affairs of the Senate.

Mr. HOLMAN. I will reserve the point of order till the Clerk has read the report.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 836) for the relief of Celestia P. Hartt, have had the same under consideration; and after examining the papers connected therewith, beg leave to report:

It appears by the papers that Celestia P. Hartt is the widow of Samuel T. Hartt, deceased, late a naval constructor at the Norfolk navy-yard. That in 1854 the said Samuel T. Hartt invented a gun-screw elevator, known as "Hartt's screw elevator," which was and still is adopted and used by the Government. That during his lifetime Mr. Hartt, being in the Government employ, forebore to ask any compensation for the use of his invention or to apply for a patent therefor; that he died leaving his said widow and four children with very limited means of support; and she asks from the Government some compensation for the use by the Government of her husband's invention.

The value of that invention to the Government is shown very clearly in the papers submitted to the committee.

Naval Constructor J. Hanscom, at the Norfolk navy-yard, says:

"The invention, I can say from personal knowledge, is of great value to the Government, and is now used on all large naval ordnance; and rather than be deprived of its use I have no doubt the Government would not hesitate to recommend its purchase for $10,000 or even $20,000."

Admiral Farragut says:

"I am thoroughly acquainted with the invention of the elevating screw for great guns by Samuel Hartt, and have had ample opportunities of testing its merits. I consider it the best elevating screw for certain guns we have in the service."

The late Rear Admiral A. H. Foote says, in a letter to Mrs. Hartt:

"This screw was placed on board the United States ship Portsmouth during my cruise in the East Indies and the China sea. I am happy to be able to state, as a matter of simple justice, that the Hartt screw elevator answered the purpose intended most admirably during our cruise. It had the severest tests, in the discharge of seven hundred guns loaded with shells, in our fight with the Canton 'Barrier Forts,' and I was so much pleased with it, as a substitute for the old and awkward quoin, that I referred specially to it in my official report of the engagement in these words: 'I am happy to add that the new elevating screws of Constructor Hartt, with which her guns are fitted, stood the severest test of the heavy firing during the several actions to my entire satisfaction.' I trust that you may soon succeed in obtaining some material aid from the Government for the valuable screw introduced into the service by you, a noble-hearted and highly-gifted husband."

The chief of the Bureau of Ordnance of the Navy Department, in a letter addressed to the Secretary of the Navy, said:

"The bureau believes that Mr. Hartt never received any compensation whatever for this invention; and as the screw has been and is now being used by the Government it recommends the claim of Mr. Hartt to the favorable consideration of the Department."

In view of these evidences the committee are of opinion that simple justice requires that the Government should not avail itself of the benefits flowing from the use of this invention without making compensation therefor, particularly as the death of the inventor prevented his resorting to the only method—the obtaining of a patent—whereby he could have made the invention valuable to himself. They therefore ask leave to report back the bill without amendment, and recommend its passage.

Mr. LYNCH. I yield to the chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs, [Mr. PIKE.]

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] waive his point of order?

Mr. HOLMAN. I will reserve it till the chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs has explained the bill.

Mr. PIKE. I merely wish to state to the House that this claim was examined during the last Congress by the Committee on Naval Affairs of this House, and after a full consideration was reported upon favorably, was passed by the House, and sent to the Senate. It failed in the Senate for want of time for its consideration. The Senate has now passed a bill to pay this claim and sent it to us for concurrence.

Mr. HOLMAN. I waive the point of order.

The bill was ordered to a third reading; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. LYNCH moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. HAMLIN, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had agreed to the amendments of the House to the bill (S. No. 167) granting lands to the State of Oregon to aid in the construction of a military wagon-road from the navigable waters of Coos bay to Roseburg, in said State.

The message also announced that the Senate had insisted upon its amendments to the bill (H. R. No. 1831) regulating the reports of national banking associations; had agreed to the conference asked by the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses; and had appointed Mr. CATTELL, Mr. WILLIAMS, and Mr. CONNESS the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The message further announced that the Senate had agreed to the amendments of the House to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 596) granting a pension to Mary A. Davis, widow of William P. Davis, a private in the eighteenth regiment of Indiana volunteers in the war of 1861.

The message further announced that the Senate had passed House bills of the following titles, with amendments, in which the concurrence of the House was requested:

An act (H. R. No. 2006) to establish certain post roads; and

An act (H. R. No. 2009) to authorize the Secretary of War to place at the disposal of the National Lincoln Monument Association, at Springfield, Illinois, damaged and captured ordnance.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed without amendment a joint resolution (H. R. No. 468) authorizing the Union Pacific Railway Company, eastern division, to change its name to the Kansas Pacific Railway Company.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed a bill and a joint resolution of the following titles, in which the concurrence of the House was requested:

An act (S. No. 863) relating to telegraphic communication between the United States and foreign countries; and Joint resolution (S. No. 339) more efficiently to protect the fur trade in Alaska.

TREATMENT OF UNION PRISONERS.

Mr. SHANKS, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the report and accompanying evidence of the special committee of the House appointed under resolution of July 10, 1867, touching the treatment of prisoners of war and Union citizens held by the confederate authorities during the recent rebellion, be printed.

SURGICAL HISTORY OF THE REBELLION.

The next business on the Speaker's table was Senate joint resolution No. 217, for printing the Medical and Surgical History of the Rebellion; which was taken up, and read a first and second time.

The joint resolution directs that there be printed at the Government Printing Office five thousand copies of the first part of the Medical and Surgical History of the Rebellion, compiled by the Surgeon General, under the direction of the Secretary of War; and five thousand copies of the medical statistics of the Provost Marshal's Bureau, compiled and to be completed by Surgeon J. H. Baxter, as authorized by an act of Congress approved July 28, 1866, which also provides that the editions of both publications thus ordered shall be disposed of as Congress may see fit to direct.

Mr. LAFLIN. This is an old acquaintance. The proposition to print this report was brought into this House originally by an appropriation introduced out of order in an appropriation bill.

Mr. KERR. I see that this is described as the first volume. How many volumes are there to be?

Mr. LAFLIN. At the time this matter was introduced I warned the House that before this work was completed it would cost at least $500,000; and I say here, on my responsibility as chairman of the Committee on Printing, after having made a full investigation of the whole subject, that I repeat that statement. And, Mr. Speaker, I wish to say right here that in spite of the efforts our committee have been able to give in reducing the expenditures for public printing at this session of Congress, as I am informed by the Public Printer, there has been ordered more printing than at any previous session. I do think, and I believe the House will agree with me, that a matter which promises to involve such a large expenditure, before it is decided upon, should be referred to a committee, the Committee on Printing or the Committee on Military Affairs, as the House may determine. I will say this much, that it was referred to the Committee on Printing in the Senate, and I am sure that I am not guilty of any breach of etiquette in asking its reference to that committee in this House.

Mr. MAYNARD. How many volumes are to be printed?

Mr. LAFLIN. It will be impossible to tell how many volumes will be printed. The gentleman from Maine asks how much it will cost? I received an estimate from the Surgeon General at the time.

Mr. MAYNARD. How much?

Mr. LAFLIN. I forget now. I know that at the time I made a close calculation, and I satisfied myself that it would cost $500,000. I wish the House to bear in mind that the next Congress will meet on the 4th of March.

Mr. MAYNARD. Has the Surgeon General anything to do with the preparation of this work?

Mr. LAFLIN. He has.

Mr. MAYNARD. I thought we took it out of his hands and put it under the charge of Dr. Baxter.

Mr. LAFLIN. We did not.

Mr. CLARKE, of Kansas. Is it to be printed in the same style with the copies already printed?

Mr. LAFLIN. I do not know how that is.

Mr. CLARKE, of Kansas. How did you make the calculation?

Mr. LAFLIN. I took the calculation from the Surgeon General himself. I wish to say that this matter which involves so large an expenditure should be referred to a committee of the House and thoroughly investigated. It has never been regularly before any committee.

Mr. HOLMAN. We have not yet heard how many volumes there are to be.

Mr. LAFLIN. I have endeavored to answer that question. I do not know how many volumes there are to be. It is to be an extended work, and I wish to say that the members of the Fortieth Congress cannot get this work, as it cannot be printed in time. I hope that every single member of this House who desires economy and care in the public expenses will think twice before he votes to pass this bill.

Mr. MAYNARD. I desire to ask the gentleman a question. I find this joint resolution provides for publishing "five thousand copies of the first part of the Medical and Surgical History of the Rebellion, compiled by the Surgeon General under the direction of the Secretary of War; and also five thousand copies of the Medical Statistics of the Provost Marshal's Bureau, compiled and to be completed by Surgeon J. H. Baxter, as authorized by act of Congress." Does the Surgeon General know anything about it?

Mr. LAFLIN. I do not know; but he has the care of the compilation of the first part as provided in the resolution and Dr. Baxter has the care of the latter part.

Mr. MAYNARD. I may be wrong about the matter, but my information is that the whole will not cost exceeding $20,000, all told.

Mr. GARFIELD. I yield two or three minutes to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. LOGAN. Mr. Speaker, I do not know how much this work is going to cost, as I am not a practical printer; nor do I think the chairman of the Committee on Printing knows very much about it, judging at least from his statement to the House. Now, if the gentleman will examine this work he will not antagonize it, in my judgment, as he does. I believe it is one of the most valuable works that can be published. It is a history of the surgery of the late war. We have a sort of history of it exhibited in the medical museum. I have examined the advance sheets of this work to some extent. It is a history furnished by every soldier in the Army, giving the character of wounds and diseases incident to soldiers and their treatment. It has been pronounced by the most eminent surgeons and medical men of Europe and elsewhere wherever it has been examined the finest surgical work the world has ever seen. If the chairman of the Committee on Printing will examine it for himself and the notices that have been given of it he will find what a valuable work it is. It is looked for by all the surgical and medical colleges of Europe with a great deal of interest. If we should ever have another war it will be worth many times more to the sick and wounded in the field than all the money that can possibly be spent in its publication. I have not examined it recently, but I do know something about it. It will not make more than three or four volumes, and if we print five thousand copies its cost will not possibly amount to the sum that the gentleman says it will. But, sir, to me it makes no difference what it is going to cost. Knowing the value of it I shall vote to print it.

Mr. GARFIELD. I desire to occupy the floor for a few moments, and then I will yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. BURLER.] I hope no mere consideration of the question as to what committee this bill ought to go to in this House will divert the minds of members from the merits of the bill itself. I am quite as willing that my friend the chairman of the Committee on Printing [Mr. LAFLIN] should have charge of it as any other gentleman, only I want the House to act upon the bill, and I took charge of it only because it is so directly related to the war and the Army as to come properly into the hands of the Committee on Military Affairs.

As to the cost of the printing I have here a communication from the Public Printer, as reported in the debate in the Senate, in which he says:

"The medical and surgical history of the war will be composed of three parts. The first part contains two volumes of nine hundred pages each and is now ready for the printer. The engravings for it have been obtained under an appropriation made by Congress and are now in the Surgeon General's Office ready to be placed in the books when the text is printed. It is the first part alone (that is the first of the three parts) which the Surgeon General wishes to have printed. The cost of the printing will be as follows: Printing five thousand copies, two volumes, nine hundred pages each, $24,625; binding the same in cloth covers, $2,800 more. Total, $27,425."

We have there a definite statement of the actual cost as estimated by the Public Printer of the publication of two volumes, being the first third of the whole set of the Medical History of the War.

And now, Mr. Speaker, I desire to say that in the annals of medical history there is not anything more creditable to a nation than the record of our medical operations during the war. Everywhere where a knowledge of the work of our surgeons has gone it has received the most flattering commendations of professional and scientific men. In the course of an inquiry before the Committee on Military Affairs it was ascertained that during the whole war, notwithstanding the great number of sick and wounded and the enormous preparations for their care, our comparatively new ambulance system and our vast outlay for medical supplies, the average cost of medical attendance upon our soldiers was but ten dollars a year; and that, I venture to say, is less than the cost of medical attendance for any other army in modern times.

This has resulted from the fact that we have a most admirable medical organization. And, sir, from the beginning of the war to its close the scientific gentlemen who had charge of the medical department of our Army have preserved all the most remarkable medical and surgical results of the war. We have to-day in this city, filling the old Ford's theatre, probably the most perfect and valuable medical museum in the world. Professional men and representatives of learned societies at home and abroad concur in pronouncing it the most valuable medical museum ever yet collected. But the materials now ready for publication are even more valuable than the museum.

I hold in my hand a report of a recent meeting of a leading medical association in Paris in which the medical results of the two great wars in modern times are discussed, the Crimean war, as seen in both the French and English Army, and similar results of our war. The rate of mortality resulting from capital operations is exhibited in the following table:

"The ratio in the three armies are:

	English Army.	American Army.	French Army.
Mortality.	Mortality.	Mortality.	Mortality.
Disarticulations at the shoulder.....	33.3	39.2	61.7
Amputations of the arm.....	24.5	21.2	55.5
Amputations of the forearm.....	5.0	16.5	45.2
Disarticulations at the hip.....	100.0	85.7	100.0
Amputations of the thigh.....	64.0	64.4	91.8
Disarticulations at the knee.....	57.1	55.1	91.3
Amputations of the leg.....	35.6	25.0	71.9
	40.2	33.9	72.8

"In thigh amputations, then, while the American and the British lose 64 in 100, the French lose 91.8. The former lose but 25 per cent. in leg amputations, and we lose 71.9. Such a result is heartrending; it is essential to discuss the cause of such a state of things, for the welfare of French soldiers and the honor of French surgery demand imperiously that they be removed."

It will be seen from this that while the average mortality in the British Army was 40.2 per cent., and in the French Army it was 72.8 per cent., yet in our Army it was only 33.9 per cent.—vastly less than in either of the armies of those two great nations.

Mr. ELA. I wish to know if this is the work that was printed at an expense of about thirty-seven thousand dollars, and of which a great number of copies were required to be printed on the ground that it would be in great demand, but of which only two or three hundred dollars' worth were sold. It was so full of inaccuracies that almost every line of it had to be altered.

Mr. GARFIELD. I do not know what work the gentleman is speaking of. He cannot be speaking of this, which has not yet been printed.

Mr. ELA. I saw a portion of it, and it was the greatest abortion in the shape of a preparation for the press that I ever met with.

Mr. GARFIELD. I was going on to say that in this report of the Surgical Society of Paris, with the whole record of the Crimean war before them as reported by the medical authorities of Great Britain and France, and with only this preliminary report bearing the modest title of a "circular" from the medical department of the Army of the United States, I find the following testimony to the value of the "circular":

"One might be astonished to see these 'circulars' of the Surgeon General referred to in comparison with the voluminous and formal reports of the British and French armies, since they were printed simply as a preface to the general medical and surgical history of our war, and are modestly entitled by the Surgeon General 'reports on the extent and nature of the materials available for the preparation of a medical and surgical history of the rebellion.' Yet M. Lefort only concurs with other leading European reviewers in his estimate of these well-known documents, of which the chief medical quarterly, the British and Foreign Medico-Chirurgical Review, declares that, 'professedly only a preliminary survey, it will itself long form an authentic book of reference, both to the military and civil surgeon.'"

Even a mere résumé of the materials in our possession is looked upon as of more value than the completed record, both French and English, of the medical results of the Crimean war. I cannot leave this report without quoting one other passage, in which the comparison is still further carried out:

"The English surgeons kept their wounded at their field hospitals, at Balaklava, at the monastery of St. George, and only sent them to their hospitals on the Dardanelles when they were able to be moved. Why were our wounded so little cared for? M. Chenn replies that the French army had six times the effective force of the English. Then the necessities of the former were six times greater. It is a culpable want of foresight to send a numerous army far from the mother country with inadequate supplies. The question reduces itself to this: now, who was responsible? Was it our army surgeons? Surely not. Eighty-two officers of the French medical staff laid down their lives in consequence of epidemics brought about by maladministration and the neglect of hygienic precautions—dangers encountered by the entire medical staff with that courage and abnegation which everywhere characterize the true physician. But, alas! in France the medical service of the army is not directed by medical men, and such men as M. M. Levy, Larre, Serice, and Legouest have no voice in the arrangements indispensable to the physical well-being of our soldiers. When the medical director of the army of the East wished to erect a few pavilion field-hospitals, he had for weeks to exhaust his patience in demonstrating their necessity to intelligent, well-meaning men, who were quite incapable of comprehending his reasoning, and who followed his advice or not according to their personal prejudices or predilections."

"Happier than the French army, the Americans have no system of military 'intendants'; and though their medical officers had to grapple with difficulties very far greater than those we encountered in the Crimea; although their theater of war embraced a territory larger than the whole of France; although in the first two years only of the war the enormous aggregate of 143,318 wounded was one of the problems with which they had to deal, the American military surgeons, left to themselves, free to display all their energy, to avail of all opportunities, to profit by their special training, found means to open to the sick and wounded soldiers two hundred and five general hospitals containing 133,894 beds; to tend these so that they lost but thirty-three per cent. of those operated on; whereas the French surgeons under the tutelage of the military administrative offices had at their command in the Crimea inadequate hospitals and supplies which were a mockery, and lost seventy-two per cent. of the patients operated on."

"And yet France was supposed to possess before the campaign began a complete medical organization and sufficient supplies, while in America it was necessary to organize everything."

Now, Mr. Speaker, I desire to say that when our nation occupies so proud a position, when we have in our hands the most priceless materials that the history of science has ever afforded on this subject; when we are in a condition to exhibit what will be of more value to the world and of more credit to the American medical profession than any other document ever possessed by any nation in the world, it seems to me a small business for us to chaffer about the matter of a few hundred dollars of expenditure. Were the cost of publication all that gentlemen suppose, I should be in favor of printing this work. Even far-sighted economy demands this expenditure. We have already, by the authority given by Congress, ordered the plates; they are engraved and paid for, ready to be set up with the type. The materials are all here, and a little over twenty-seven thousand dollars will give us five thousand copies of one third of the whole of this magnificent work. I should regret it more than I can express if this Congress should omit the opportunity to give this work the publicity which it deserves and take to our country the credit which we have so justly earned.

I now yield for a few moments to the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. BUTLER.]

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Whenever it is possible for me to say anything which shall give credit to the operations of the Army I am always very glad to do so. And I am glad to say in connection with this subject that I think the operations of the medical staff of the Army during the late war, assisted by the thousands of helping hands of our sanitary and Christian commissions—the scientific part of their duties being substantially done by the Army with the aid of the contract surgeons—show an equal efficiency with any other portion of the staff department, however high the rank they may justly take; and the results of their labors show that there was very much greater efficiency in the operations of the medical staff of our Army than of the medical staff of any other army in the world. It is a well-known fact that where one dies by bullets in actual battle eighty and a fraction die of disease. Yet in this very city this most remarkable fact took place: ninety thousand men within a certain time passed through the Army hospitals here with every kind of disease and every character of wound, and there were but six per cent. of deaths among that number.

And in this connection let me again call the attention of this House to a fact stated by the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, [Mr. GARFIELD.] I refer to the success of the capital operations; that is to say, all that class of operations like amputating the thigh, and in some cases amputating both thighs. With the best surgical skill of the French army, and under the best conditions, not over thirty per cent. of such operations are successful. But of the like operations performed by the surgeons of our Army sixty-six per cent. were successful.

Now, all the means by which this extraordinary success was attained, all the appliances which gave this efficiency to our service, all the accumulated learning and experience of this great work are to be preserved in this history. The manner and character of these operations are compiled and fully illustrated for the first time in the history of the world. The aid of photography has been brought to show the exact conditions of the wounds and the character of the surgical operations performed. We have now what never before could be obtained—a perfect history of every disease that afflicts an Army and its manner of treatment; a perfect history of every kind of wound to which a soldier is liable and its manner of treatment. And we have the comparative results of all the different methods of treatment.

I should consider it a great loss to the world, to say nothing of the loss to this country alone, if this history should not be preserved in such a manner that it will be of use to us hereafter. In the event of any war in the future, however little we in this country may be afflicted by it, we should save over and over and over again in a single year the whole of the cost of printing this work, even should it be so great as my friend, the chairman of the Committee on Printing, [Mr. LAFLIN,] seems to suppose it will be. And the benefits of this work will be not only for this country and for this age, but it will be for the whole world and for all time. Let me state a single instance of the great request in which are held even the circulars of the Surgeon General, which are a mere epitome, mere specimens of what this work will be when completed. A while since I received a request for one of these circulars to be placed in the hands of the first surgeon of Greece. He had heard of it, perhaps had seen it, and desired to obtain it. He desired a copy, and it was to be obtained at whatever cost and forwarded to him. I was happy to have it in my power to send it to him as some token of his kind treatment of one who had formerly been an officer of my staff, and had received in Crete fighting for freedom one of the most serious wounds which a man can receive, and who had recovered under the skillful treatment of this surgeon.

Not only is this work of the most valuable assistance in time of war, but because it describes the treatment of diseases, not only the ordinary diseases which afflict mankind, but also the extraordinary—for we had them all in our armies of millions of men—all this will make the work of great value to civilians; and the medical and surgical establishments of this country and of the world will make it a text work for all coming time. I trust it will not be considered that we are throwing away money uselessly by appropriating a few dollars to print this valuable document.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. Speaker, if I am correctly informed, no publication hitherto made by the Congress of the United States has equaled in importance to the people of our country and the people of the civilized world the proposed publication of the medical register of the treatment of disease in our armies, and the surgical operations arising out of the casualties of war. After what has been so well said by the honorable gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BUTLER] it is not needful that I should do more than make a single statement. Toward the close of our late war one of the first surgeons of Europe came to this capital and passed in cogo, through our hospitals. He finally presented himself to the Surgeon General of the United States and made the statement that, having visited all the principal hospitals of Europe, having acted, I believe, as assistant surgeon general in India under appointment from the British Government, he felt himself justified in saying that such suitability of medical arrangements combined with such surgical skill as he had seen in America during the progress of the war, had no parallel in the history of the world.

The achievements of science in connection with the medical and surgical history of the rebellion form a record honorable to the country, and one that ought to be preserved. Gentlemen say, "Let this measure be referred." For what purpose? The simple result would be to kill the bill, and thereby delay the publication of this very valuable information. I believe, Mr. Speaker, that education after all is the cheapest defense of nations; and that education which constitutes the art of preserving life and ameliorating the misfortunes and sufferings of humanity is among the highest of all the forms of education. I am for this bill; and I trust that my colleague [Mr. GARFIELD] will call the previous question on it and let us have a vote.

Mr. GARFIELD. I should be quite willing to prolong this debate if my friends around me were not so anxious to vote. I will, therefore, call the previous question on the passage of the bill.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

The House divided on the passage of the joint resolution; and there were—ayes 70, noes 24.

Mr. LAFLIN demanded tellers.

Tellers were ordered.

And then, on motion of Mr. SCOTFIELD, (at twenty minutes past eleven o'clock p. m.,) the House adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following petitions, &c., were presented under the rule, and referred to the appropriate committees:

By Mr. CORLEY: The petition of M. C. Welch, a citizen of South Carolina, for removal of political disabilities.

By Mr. ELIOT, of Massachusetts: The petition of Charles Alvery and others, of New Bedford, Massachusetts, praying for legislation to prevent frauds in naturalization.

By Mr. GOSS: The petition of Elias Wall, of Spartanburg county, South Carolina, for removal of political disabilities.

By Mr. SYPHER: A memorial from the Chamber of Commerce of New Orleans, protesting against the further extension of the bankrupt law, and especially the "fifty-per-cent. provision."

IN SENATE.

WEDNESDAY, March 3, 1869.

Prayer by Rev. Dr. Osgood, of New York city.

On motion of Mr. HARLAN, and by unanimous consent, the reading of the Journal of yesterday was dispensed with.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. CONKLING presented a petition of the German Republican central committee of New York, praying for an amendment of the naturalization laws; which was ordered to lie on the table.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. CATTELL, from the Committee on Finance, to whom was referred the petition of F. P. Salas, praying a return of certain duties on merchandise imported per Spanish brig Castilla, in August, 1865, reported it adversely.

Mr. ANTHONY, from the Committee on Printing, to whom was referred the motion submitted by Mr. BUCKALEW on the 2d instant, to print two thousand additional copies of the report of the Select Committee on Representative Reform, reported in favor of printing the same; and the motion was agreed to.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine, from the Committee on Appropriations, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 2007) making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1870, reported it with amendments.

SYMPATHY WITH SPAIN.

Mr. SUMNER. The Committee on Foreign Relations, to whom was referred the amendment of the House of Representatives to the joint resolution (S. R. No. 178) tendering sympathy to the people of Spain, have had the same under consideration, and have directed me to report it back to the Senate with a recommendation that the Senate non-concur in the amendment of the House. I ask for action now.

Mr. POMEROY. I hope the amendment of the House will be read.

Mr. SUMNER. I hope there will be no question about it. It has been considered by the committee. It will only take time.

Mr. POMEROY. I want to hear it.

The CHIEF CLERK. The amendment is to strike out all after the resolving clause of the resolution and to insert:

That the people of the United States sympathize with the patriotic people of Spain in their efforts to establish the liberties of the Spanish nation.

SEC. 2. And be it further resolved, That the people of the United States sympathize with the people of Cuba in their efforts to secure political independence, and that they will welcome to the family of independent nations any Government that guarantees the liberty of all men and represents the principle of the absolute sovereignty of the people.

SEC. 3. And be it further resolved, That the President is hereby authorized to recognize the independence of Cuba, whenever in his opinion a republican form of government shall have been established.

The House also proposed to amend the title by adding thereto the words "and Cuba."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the report of the committee to non-concur in the amendment.

The report was agreed to.

W. W. CORCORAN.

Mr. HARLAN. The Committee on the District of Columbia, to whom was referred the joint resolution (H. R. No. 418) in relation to lands and other property of W. W. Corcoran, in the District of Columbia, used by the United States Government during and since the war of the rebellion, have instructed me to report it back with an amendment. I ask the unanimous consent of the Senate to consider the bill at this time.

By unanimous consent, the joint resolution (H. R. No. 413) in relation to lands and other property of W. W. Corcoran in the District of Columbia used by the United States Government during and since the war of the rebellion was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It is an instruction to the Secretary of the Treasury to withhold any and all payments of money to W. W. Corcoran for the use of lands and buildings in the District of Columbia, supposed to belong to him and taken possession of by the War Department during and since the rebellion for national purposes, until the further action of Congress.

The Committee on the District of Columbia proposed to amend the resolution by striking out the words "all further action of Congress" and inserting:

"Until the said W. W. Corcoran shall have taken and subscribed before some person duly authorized to administer oaths the following oath: I, William W. Corcoran, do solemnly swear that I have never voluntarily borne arms against the United States since I have been a citizen thereof; that I have voluntarily given no aid, countenance, counsel, or encouragement, either personally or by agent, to persons engaged in armed hostility thereto; that I have neither sought nor accepted nor attempted to exercise the functions of any office whatever under any authority or pretended authority in hostility to the United States; that I have not yielded a voluntary support to any pretended government, authority, power, or constitution within the United States hostile or inimical thereto; and I do further swear that to the best of my knowledge and ability I will support and defend the Constitution of the United States against all enemies, foreign and domestic; that I will render true faith and allegiance to the same; that I take this obligation freely, without any mental reservation or purpose of evasion. So help me God. And that said oath so taken and subscribed shall be filed with the Secretary of the Treasury in connection with all payments of money for the purposes above mentioned."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BAYARD. I shall ask for the yeas and nays on the passage of that bill.

Mr. HOWARD. I wish to put an inquiry to the honorable Senator from Iowa respecting this matter. I understand that Mr. Corcoran, a man of large property in this District, quit it, abandoned it at the commencement of the war, and went off to reside in a foreign country, remaining abroad until the close of the war and a considerable time afterward, and he has always been reputed, so far as I have heard, as, if not a direct rebel, one who sympathized fully with the cause of the rebellion. I should like to have more explanation of this resolution from the honorable Senator who introduces it.

Mr. STEWART. Inasmuch as this is going to take time, I move to lay it on the table and to take up House bill No. 1880, the disability bill.

Mr. SUMNER. I hope not. It is a question whether certain money shall be paid to this gentleman.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in. The amendment was ordered to be engrossed, and the joint resolution to be read a third time. The joint resolution was read the third time.

Messrs. BAYARD and HOWARD called for the yeas and nays on the passage of the bill; and they were ordered.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President—

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House had elected Hon. THEODORE M. POMEROY, one of the Representatives from the State of New York, Speaker, in the place of Hon. SCHUYLER COLFAX, resigned.

The message further announced that the House had appointed Mr. E. C. INGERSOLL, of Illinois, one of the managers on the part of the House of Representatives at the conference on the bill (H. R. No. 1881) regulating the reports of national banking associations, in place of Mr. T. M. POMEROY, elected Speaker.

The message also announced that the House requested of the Senate a duplicate copy of the bill (S. No. 588) for the relief of the Mount Vernon Ladies' Association of the Union, passed in the Senate July 10, 1868, the original having been mislaid.

The message further announced that the House had passed the joint resolution (S. R. No. 217) for printing the Medical and Surgical History of the Rebellion, with an amendment in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

The message also announced that the House had disagreed to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 1808) making appropriations for the service of the Post Office Department during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1870, asked a conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. F. C. BEAMAN of Michigan, Mr. J. G. BLAINE of Maine, and Mr. J. A. NICHOLSON of Delaware, managers at the conference on its part.

The message further announced that the House had disagreed to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 1672) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1870, asked a conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. B. F. BUTLER of Massachusetts, Mr. WILLIAM H. KELSEY of New York, and Mr. C. E. PHELPS of Maryland, managers at the same on its part.

DUPLICATE COPY OF A BILL.

Mr. SUMNER. I move that the Senate send a duplicate copy to the House of the bill (S. No. 588) for the relief of the Mount Vernon Ladies' Association, according to the request just received.

Mr. DAVIS. I believe I have the floor.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. These are incidental motions, and are almost always entertained at this period of the session; and the question is on returning the bill according to the request of the House.

The motion was agreed to.

MEDICAL AND SURGICAL HISTORY.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Kentucky has the floor.

Mr. ANTHONY. Will the Senator from Kentucky allow me to move to concur in a verbal amendment of the House?

Mr. DAVIS. I shall vote against this joint resolution for the benefit of Mr. Corcoran for this reason: I believe he is entitled to his property without any oath or condition, and I will not vote for a bill that imposes such an oath upon him.

Mr. ANTHONY. A joint resolution has just been returned from the House with the correction of a clerical error, to strike out the word "surveyor" and insert "surgeon." I move that the Senate concur with the House. It is Senate joint resolution No. 217, for printing the Medical and Surgical History of the Rebellion.

Mr. CONKLING. What is the amendment?

Mr. ANTHONY. "Surgeon General" was engrossed "surveyor general." The amendment is to strike out the word "surveyor" and put in "surgeon."

The amendment was concurred in.

POST OFFICE APPROPRIATION BILL.

The Senate proceeded to consider its amendments to the bill (H. R. No. 1808) making appropriations for the service of the Post Office Department during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1870, disagreed to by the House of Representatives; and

On motion by Mr. TRUMBULL, it was

Resolved, That the Senate insist on its amendments to said bill disagreed to by the House of Representatives, and agree to the conference asked by the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

Ordered, That the conferees on the part of the Senate be appointed by the President pro tempore.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore appointed Mr. CONKLING, Mr. RAMSEY, and Mr. DAVIS.

LEGISLATIVE ETC., APPROPRIATION BILL.

The Senate proceeded to consider its amendments to the bill (H. R. No. 1672) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1870, disagreed to by the House of Representatives; and

On motion by Mr. MORRILL, of Maine, it was

Resolved, That the Senate insist on its amendments, disagreed to by the House of Representatives, and agree to the conference asked by the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

Ordered, That the conferees on the part of the Senate be appointed by the President pro tempore.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore appointed Mr. MORRILL, of Maine, Mr. HOWE, and Mr. WYTHE.

REVENUE FRAUDS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore appointed Messrs. CHANDLER, KELLOGG, and MORGAN the committee of conference on the part of the Senate on the bill (H. R. No. 375) to repeal an act approved March 2, 1867, entitled "An act to regulate the disposition of fines, penalties, and forfeitures received under the laws relating to the customs, and for other purposes," and to amend certain acts for the prevention and punishment of frauds on the revenue, and for the prevention of smuggling.

THE PUBLIC CREDIT.

Mr. SHERMAN. I ask consent to make a report from a committee of conference.

The report was read, as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses to the bill (H. R. No. 1744) to strengthen the public credit, and relating to contracts for the payment of coin, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend, and do recommend, to their respective Houses as follows:

They recommend that the House recede from its disagreement to the first amendment of the Senate, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: insert in lieu of the words stricken out the words: "obligations of the United States not bearing interest known as United States notes, and of all the interest-bearing."

They recommend that the House recede from its disagreement to the second amendment of the Senate, and agree to the same with an amendment, as follows: insert in lieu of the words stricken out the words: "but none of said interest-bearing obligations not already due shall be redeemed or paid before maturity unless at such time United States notes shall be convertible into coin at the option of the holder, or unless at such time bonds of the United States bearing a lower rate of interest than the bonds to be redeemed can be sold at par in coin. And the United States also solemnly pledges its faith to make provisions at the earliest practicable period for the redemption of the United States notes in coin."

They recommend that the Senate recede from their third and fourth amendments to the bill of the House.

JOHN SHERMAN,
GEORGE H. WILLIAMS,
Managers on the part of the Senate.
ROBERT C. SCHENCK,
WILLIAM B. ALLISON,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. BAYARD. I am necessarily opposed to the adoption of this report; and though I am reluctant to detain the Senate it will take me some time to state my objections to it. I am very loth at this period of the session, with the pressure of business, to do so, but the act is one of public importance, and as I view the second section, which is restored by this committee of conference to the form in which the House of Representatives originally passed it, it is far more dangerous than will any result to be derived from the first section be beneficial. I must therefore necessarily oppose the bill, though to the first section I have no objection.

Mr. TRUMBULL. It is impossible to hear a word that is said by the Senator from Delaware, there is so much confusion in the galleries.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There must be less noise in the galleries.

Mr. BAYARD. The first section I have no specific objection to except one, and that is that it is declaratory law, and I hold that within the terms of the Federal Constitution declaratory laws by Congress, if not absolutely unconstitutional, are certainly unwise and improper. This Congress has no more authority to declare what was the intent and meaning of a law passed by a previous Congress, or give a pledge of faith to the country without any new consideration connected with the bonds in reference to which the first section relates than a subsequent Congress would have a right to undo it. My own opinions on the technical question are very plain. When under their former laws the United States authorized the issue of six per cent. bonds with interest payable in coin, redeemable at their option after five years or absolutely payable at the end of twenty years, without specifying that the principal should be paid in coin, I have never doubted that the United States could not in good faith, pay a promise to pay, and on which they were to pay interest until it was paid by money, with another promise to pay which they chose to call money. In other words, I never doubted that the United States were to pay value, if they wanted to retain their good faith, in a currency of value and not in a currency of mere credit. There are no circumstances but one under which any Government would be justified in what is called repudiation of a debt. There perhaps is one, founded upon the principle of bankruptcy as regards individuals. Where an individual, be it even from his own extravagance, from want of care, from want of intellect or business capacity, becomes involved in debt the laws of your own and other countries permit him to be discharged from the obligations of his debts on surrendering his property; and the principle of that is very apparent to me—his future labors are left to himself. In the case of a Government having authority as trustees for the people at large to contract loans the case might arise—I do not pretend to say it has arisen here—in which a Government might contract such a debt that the interest upon the debt would amount to more than the net earnings of the aggregate people during each year, and in such an event as that there would be an inability to pay consistent with the welfare or even the organization of the society, and in such an event as that Government would be compelled, just as the individual would be, to refuse to pay such an amount. I do not say that that applies to the present case. On the contrary, I think that with a growing country like ours, with so enterprising a population, the remedy is not declaratory legislation by Congress, but the reduction of expenditure, economy in public expenditure, reduction of useless organizations, of a portion of the Army, the abandonment of your Freedmen's Bureau, and a thousand other things not necessary to specify. Economy in the conduct of public affairs, a revision of your entire revenue laws, internal and external, for the purpose of making them as little oppressive as possible to the people, while they raise the greatest amount of revenue, is the mode in which the good faith of this country is to be preserved. This Congress may pass what resolution it pleases on the subject of the payment of the debt in coin, that debt will ultimately be repudiated if what I mention is not resorted to, a proper revision of the revenue system of the country, external and internal, and a reduction of expenditures, because otherwise the burden will press so heavily on the people that they will throw it off their shoulders.

To the second section, however, I have a distinct objection that it really in my judgment is intended to prevent a return to the normal currency in this country which it professes to be intended to effect. Nearly a year ago, when the question was still what the lawyers would call a moot question, a doubtful question, as to whether a contract made specifically payable in gold could under the legal-tender act, as it is called, be paid in paper, the Senate agreed to pass a proposition giving validity without regard to any existing law to all contracts of that kind hereafter made. It went to the House of Representatives. It lay there during the rest of the session. They would not act upon it. They would not pass it. During the present session, within the last three weeks, the Supreme Court of the United States have made a decision that governs entirely the whole question; that is, they have decided virtually in principle that all contracts, whether made before or after the passage of that law, if made specifically payable in coin, can be enforced according to their terms and the party so contracting may be made to pay in a currency of value and not in a currency of credit.

There is, therefore, no necessity for this second section. It makes a profession of providing that a contract hereafter made specifically payable in coin may be enforced; but it couples it with a system of inquiry into the consideration that would utterly destroy all confidence, promote litigation, and prevent contracts of that kind being made. Where a party gives his promissory note on the purchase of property payable in coin the right is given under this section to question the consideration on this ground: whether the value of the article which he purchased was adjusted on a gold basis or a paper basis. Any one can see at once that with such a provision in the law it entirely destroys the effect of the decision of the Supreme Court in the confidence it would impart to the community in making contracts payable in coin. It prevents in the higher branches of trade a return to the normal currency. It subjects men to the danger of a want of good faith on the part of the individuals with whom they contract.

Let me give an instance. Suppose a man sells a horse for $600 or a house for $10,000; he gives his note payable in coin in either case. When that note is called upon for payment he says, "No; I shall pay it in legal tenders." If he is sued upon it this provision which professes to authorize contracts of this kind gives him liberty to go into a court of justice and dispute whether the price of that horse or the price of that house was adjusted on the gold basis or the currency basis. It will lead to innumerable law suits. I do not know what extent of evidence the courts might require in the case of a horse. They might bring forward jockies to prove that the value of the horse at $600 was its paper value and not its coin value, and the jury would have to weigh the facts. In other words, the result of the second section is simply to destroy the effect upon the country of the decision of the Supreme Court giving validity to contracts of that kind. It is an encouragement to bad faith on the part of parties making contracts payable in coin. It is intended to discourage payments in money, although it professes to authorize them. It has duplicity on its very face. Its object is to keep up in this country a currency of credit as contradistinguished from a currency of value, for the purpose of aiding speculators to plunder the people; or it may be, for aught I know, that the object in now retaining it is some personal speculation of individuals and their influence.

But, sir, it is very probable that that which the House refused to do at the last session before the decision of the Supreme Court, or to touch now when that decision has been made, rendering any legislation on that subject unnecessary, they now seek to emasculate the decision of the court by coupling it with a provision which will give rise to ceaseless law suits, which will encourage perfidy on the part of individuals where contracts have been made on the gold basis, which will prevent a return at the earliest practical period to the normal currency of the country; and unless you return to it before any great length of time all the declarations you make in the first section as to the intentions of Congress to pay their debts, principal and interest, in coin will be vain.

I do not wish to detain the Senate longer in reference to this bill, but I trust if this report of the committee of conference should pass the Senate at least the Executive will not permit it to pass without his veto; and as he has the power to prevent such pernicious legislation that he will exercise that power in the present instance for the good of the country.

Mr. CONKLING. I ask that the bill be read as it will stand if we agree to the report of the conference committee. That the Secretary is able to do with the papers before him.

The Secretary read as follows:

That in order to remove any doubt as to the purpose of the Government to discharge all just obligations to the public creditors and to settle conflicting questions and interpretations of the laws by virtue of which obligations have been contracted it is hereby provided and declared that the faith of the United States is solemnly pledged to the payment in coin or its equivalent of all obligations of the United States not bearing interest, known as United States notes, and of all the interest-bearing obligations of the United States, except in cases where the law authorizing the issue of any such obligation has expressly provided that the same may be paid in lawful money or other currency than gold and silver. But none of said interest-bearing obligations not already due shall be redeemed or paid before maturity, unless at such time United States notes shall be convertible into coin at the option of the holder, or unless at such time bonds of the United States bearing a lower rate of interest than the bonds to be redeemed can be sold at par in coin. And the United States also solemnly pledges its faith to make provision at the earliest practicable period for the redemption of the United States notes in coin.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That any contract hereafter made specifically payable in coin, and the consideration of which may be a loan of coin, or a sale of property or the rendering of labor or service of any kind the price of which as carried into the contract may have been adjusted on the basis of the coin value thereof at the time of such sale or the rendering of such service or labor, shall be legal and valid, and may be enforced according to its terms; and on the trial of a suit brought for the enforcement of any such contract proof of the real consideration may be given.

Mr. SHERMAN. If the Secretary will send the report and the bill to me I will explain in a very few words the result of the conference. The Senate made four amendments to this short bill. The first amendment was designed to extend the pledge of the first section to the United States notes as well as the bonds. In the House bill the obligations were described as "all interest-bearing obligations," but there was no pledge to pay in coin United States notes. The Senate by striking out the words "interest-bearing" intended to extend the pledge to all obligations of the United States; but the House conferees feared that this would include obligations not intended to be embraced by this claim. In order to avoid all ambiguity we now say that the pledge shall extend to the payment of all United States notes in coin and all interest-bearing obligations except those where other provision was made, so as to prevent including other obligations not intended to be reached by this measure; and in that respect I think the report of the conferees is decidedly an improvement because it is more specific.

The second amendment of the Senate was to strike out the proviso to the first section. The objections made in the Senate to the proviso were these: that it tied up the power of the Government to pay the debt or do anything toward reducing the rate of interest until after the return of specie payments. This provision is stricken out, and instead of it we have inserted a provision that we will not attempt to pay the principal of this debt until either we resume specie payments or we can sell a bond bearing a lower rate of interest than the bonds to be redeemed at par in coin. Then we are at liberty to proceed to pay off the outstanding bonds even if specie payments have not been resumed.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Please read that.

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes, sir.

But none of said interest-bearing obligations—
Five-twenties—

not already due shall be redeemed or paid before maturity, unless at such time United States notes shall be convertible into coin at the option of the holder, or unless at such time bonds of the United States bearing a lower rate of interest than the bonds to be redeemed can be sold at par in coin.

Then there is this clause:

And the United States also solemnly pledges its faith to make provision at the earliest practicable period for the redemption of the United States notes in coin.

I think that this is a great improvement. The United States postpones payment of this debt until we can pay it at par in coin, either by the sale of bonds or by the resumption of specie payments, and we also announce to the country that we will take steps as early as practicable to specie payment of the notes.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. Would the last provision prevent the United States notes from being funded?

Mr. SHERMAN. Not at all. I will state in regard to the third amendment that I did not agree to the conclusion in regard to it. The third amendment of the Senate was made on motion of the honorable Senator from New Jersey, [Mr. FRELINCHUYSEN,] to strike out the last clause of the second section. That clause allowed, by implication at least, the consideration of a negotiable note to be inquired into between others than the original parties. In order to avoid that construction the Senate struck out that last clause, leaving the question of inquiring into the consideration to depend upon the general and local law in each State. That is the way it ought to be; but the House conferees were not willing to agree to this report unless this provision was retained. I myself was not disposed to yield that, but a majority of the Senate conferees thought it was better to yield in order to secure the passage of the bill. The words which are retained and which the Senate struck out are these:

And on the trial of a suit brought for the enforcement of any such contract proof of the real consideration may be given.

That would seem to imply that this proof could be given in a suit brought by a bona fide holder on a note where there was usury between the original parties; but as this clause does not state the effect of the evidence on the real consideration we thought it better, or at least a majority of the conferees against my opinion thought it best, to leave that clause in rather than endanger the passage of the bill.

Mr. SPRAGUE. Mr. President, I desire in one word, in behalf of the industries, so far as I know them, of this country to enter my solemn protest against the passage of this act, a measure calculated, in my judgment, more to repudiate the national debt than any measure that has yet been enacted, and as certain to result in that direction if the people are true to themselves. It seems, sir, that the industries of this country, crushed to the very earth in the past three years, are not crushed sufficiently, but they must have this staggering, this most outrageous blow dealt upon them. If there is any measure calculated to prostrate whatever there is in the present profitable occupation of this country this is it. I affirm to this Senate and to this country, and I shall be borne out in it, that there is no industry, commencing three years ago, that is at all in a profitable condition except those who are receiving to-day the pap of Government appropriations. Why tamper with this most sacred and most delicate instrument? Sir, I have not words to express the feeling of outrage that is in me at this constant manipulation of the finances, first of the Government and then of the people, for what purpose? You have contracted your currency nearly four hundred million dollars in three years for the purpose of enhancing its value. What has been the result of it? Have you enhanced the value of the nation's credit? Not one cent. You have prostrated every interest and every industry in consequence of that most suicidal and most damnable policy. I protest, therefore, in the name of the industries of this country and in their behalf, representing them as I do, and as I know they at present exist, against the additional load that will be put on them by this most unholy and most inconsiderate legislation.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Mr. President, I do not intend again to discuss this question, but to ask of the Senate whether this body is now prepared to change the contract between the Government and its creditors as is proposed by this report? In my judgment the measure has not been improved by the action of the committee of conference. By this proposition we now undertake to waive permanently the right to redeem the five-twenty bonds during the period of twenty years allowed by the original law to the discretion of the Government, and to provide that the Government shall not redeem at all unless Treasury notes are equal with gold in value.

This, sir, is now the distinct proposition; and as far as we can in the absence of a new consideration we undertake to bind the Government to a material modification of the contract to the benefit of the creditor and to the prejudice of the people. After the contract has been made by the law and by the language of the bonds, and before the maturity of the bonds, why shall we undertake to change the nature and extent of that contract? Why not leave it as it stood at the time the Government made the contract? There were some merits in the funding bill urged by the Senator from Ohio last year and urged by the Committee on Finance in its elaborate report of December, 1867. There was some compensation in that measure. In that bill it was proposed as a compensation to the tax-payers that there should be a reduction of the interest, that the six per cent. bonds should fall to four and four and a half per cent., making a large saving annually to the people in interest and a very great relief to the burdened interests of the country; but, as I thought, not sufficient to justify then a change of the contract.

But now, Mr. President, abandoning the idea of compensation, it is proposed, without consideration, as far as we now can do it to change the contract and to make obligations which may be redeemed within a specified period in the legal-tender notes of the Government gold obligations. Where is the return? The present proposed policy is in strange contrast with the policy that was adopted at the time this debt was contracted. As I read to the Senate the other evening from the report of the Committee on Finance, the policy of Congress in 1862 and 1863 was to reduce the value of the paper currency issued by the Government so as that there should be an inducement on the part of the persons holding that currency to invest it in the bonds. Depreciation was then the policy of the Government—a depreciated currency made necessary, in the language of the committee, by the fact that the bonds would not sell under the act of February 25, 1862. The depreciated currency was the consideration the Government received for its bonds, and that depreciation was brought about upon a purpose and a policy. To secure a sale of bonds then the currency was purposely depreciated; but when the Government comes to assume and to provide for its payment, then the opposite policy is to be adopted and the currency is to be by special legislation appreciated, or if it cannot be appreciated, then that the bonds shall not be paid until the Government can pay in gold. Why this reversal of policy? If it was right that the Government should be paid for these bonds in a currency purposely depreciated, why is there an obligation that we shall provide for an appreciation of the currency when the Government comes to redeem the bonds? I desire that there shall be an appreciation of the currency; but as I said the other evening, I look to that only through a restored prosperity in the business of the country.

I sympathize with the sentiment of the Senator from Rhode Island, [Mr. SPRAGUE.] We want stability, that business may prosper, that productions may increase, that the current of gold may settle in again to our own shores instead of running from our shores, and when we have an appreciation of the currency brought about by such influences there is no injustice done to any persons or to any interest in the country. But when Congress by artificial means proposes to give a value to a currency simply with a view to pay a particular class of obligations that the Government owes, then, as the Senator from Rhode Island has so earnestly expressed it, there is injustice done to many of the interests of the country. Why not leave this contract, covering such large interests, so many hundreds of millions of dollars, where it was left when it was made? And if the business of the country shall bring the currency up to a par value, then all will participate in the benefits of that appreciation, not the bondholder alone, but all the men of the country engaged in industrial pursuits will be blessed by that result; but an artificial value given by legislation for the benefit of a particular class is not just to the other classes of society. In my judgment this is a very unjust measure. It is unjust to the people to bind the Government as far as we now can by a voluntary resolution to a mode of payment not contemplated when the contract was made.

I do not expect that any discussion of this measure will change the views of the Senate. To my judgment the measure is not improved by the action of the committee of conference. If possible it is made more objectionable. Does it add anything to the obligation of the Government that we now say that we will give if possible a par value to the legal-tender notes? When the legal-tender notes were used in the purchase of the bonds they were not worth so much as they are now as compared with gold; and the parties who paid for the bonds in legal tenders when they were worth forty, fifty, sixty, or seventy cents on the dollar have made a large gain in the appreciation of that currency already, a profit and a speculation almost unknown in the moneyed transactions of the world. Why, then, shall we interfere to give an artificial and stimulated value simply for the purpose of accommodating one class of business men? I shall be very glad if the paper currency of the country shall come to par as compared with gold. I shall be glad if that is brought about by the influences of business, of trade, and of commerce, for then I will know that every interest of the country has participated in the advantage. But I feel that if it be brought about for a special purpose, for the benefit of a particular class in our society, for foreign moneyed men, it is not just.

Mr. President, I shall not continue the discussion, for I feel that the vote the other evening was so decidedly in favor of this measure that discussion is not likely to change it; and I do not wish by anything I may say to interfere with the passage of any of the important bills, but I have felt it to be my duty to say thus much against the proposition.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Mr. President, we have less than twenty-four hours to the end of the session when this report of the committee of conference comes here. It has not been printed. It contains new provisions which have not been discussed, and very important provisions bearing upon the subject under consideration. I think it exceedingly unwise, under these circumstances, to attempt to press this matter to a vote in the Senate. As all your appropriation bills are yet unsigned, have not gone to the President for examination, and some of them are not yet passed, and the President can hardly have time to read the bills that are to go before him, there can be no reasonable expectation that a measure like this, if it passes, can be examined by the President and receive his signature. It is, therefore, a waste of the time of the Senate, in my judgment, to undertake to press this matter to a vote upon the report of the committee of conference.

Sir, it introduces new provisions, entirely new provisions, which have not been discussed in the Senate in connection with this bill, and this report has not been printed. No Senators, except those who have been upon the committee of conference, have had a fair opportunity to examine and understand the precise bearing of this bill as it comes to us now, and for this reason it seems to me unreasonable that it should be pressed.

I shall not open the discussion of those questions which were discussed the other evening when the bill passed the Senate. I have no desire to repeat the argument then made or discuss the questions which were then discussed before the Senate. But here is a new bill at this late hour which, upon the first reading as it seems to me, pledges us to the redemption of all the obligations of the United States in coin as they fall due. There is a provision that you shall not pay them before they become due unless a bond bearing a lower rate of interest can be sold at par in coin, or unless the notes of the United States shall then be convertible into coin; but the first pledge, as it strikes me, pledges the good faith of the Government at once to redeem these obligations in coin; all that are due. Are these Treasury notes due? Mr. SHERMAN. No bonds are due and payable until 1882.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. But are not Treasury notes payable on demand?

Mr. SHERMAN. There are no Treasury notes on demand now.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Are not the legal tenders payable on demand?

Mr. SHERMAN. The pledge is to pay them in coin.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I may be mistaken, as I have not had opportunity to examine it, but as I heard the report read, it seems to me there is a provision there very much like pledging the good faith of the Government to pay those notes in coin if they are due. They are obligations of the Government certainly. It pledges the payment of all obligations in coin; true; it contains a proviso that you shall not pay them before they are due, unless a bond bearing a lower rate of interest shall command par in coin or unless specie payments shall have been resumed.

Mr. President, whatever may have been the purpose or the policy intended, the fact was that when we sold the bonds we depreciated the currency in order to sell them; and now the substance of this proposition is that we shall contract the currency and appreciate the currency when we come to pay them. We depreciate the currency to make bonds cheap when we sell them; we appreciate the currency to make bonds dear when you come to pay them. And in whose interest is this? In the interest of the bondholder; in their interest when we sold our bonds, and now again to be in their interest when we come to pay them.

Mr. President, as I said the other night, Congress is no party to these bonds, although it may be there are many members of Congress who are bondholders. It seems to me if I had $100,000 in bonds of the United States in my pocket and were called upon to vote on this question I should feel that I was voting in my interest, I should feel that I was voting to put money in my pocket, and I do not see how any person can look upon the effect of this measure in any other light than that it is to increase the value of the five-twenty bonds.

Mr. POMEROY. I agree with what the Senator says, but how is it with the greenbacks? The Senator has some greenbacks, if he votes for this bill now he votes to make the greenback equal to a gold dollar.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I hold that Congress is to act, not as a party to this contract nor as having any interest in it, but Congress is to act in the position of a judge to decide between the bondholders and the bondpayers, between those who pay the taxes and those who receive them; for Congress represents both and should look to the rights of both and not legislate in the interest of one at the expense of the other.

I shall not take another moment of the time of the Senate, but I hope that the majority here who control the business will not press to a vote this measure, when, as it seems to me, it can in no human probability result in any practical legislation; for, as I suggested, there is not time to present this bill with the appropriation bills to the President and give the President an opportunity so much as to read it, much less to form a judgment upon it and approve it.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. The Senator from Wisconsin has announced, as by authority, that this measure will not receive the signature of the President. I desire to say that it is of no sort of consequence; I do not think it will add anything to the credit of the measure either in the Senate or with the American people whether his signature is obtained to it or not.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. The honorable Senator in stating that I have announced by authority that this bill will not receive the signature of the President is entirely mistaken. I have not made any such announcement by authority, nor am I authorized to make it. What I stated was that with the appropriation bills all yet behind there will be no opportunity given to the President to examine this measure to give to it his approval.

Mr. CORBETT. It has been said that this measure is in the interest of foreign bondholders. There were two kinds of bonds in this country, Mr. President, during the rebellion. There were the southern bonds, bonds issued by the confederate government, and those issued by the Union. They were both pledged to be paid in gold coin of the United States, and were introduced into the foreign markets, principally at Frankfort. The confederate bonds were being sold under a pledge to be paid in coin. Our agents went to Frankfort and pledged the faith of our Government that our bonds should be paid in coin. Those who purchased took the chances. The friends of the Union took the bonds of the United States Government. The question is whether we shall stand by those people and pay them as we agreed to pay. Those who took the chances of the confederate bonds bought bonds which are worth nothing. The friends of the Union will be sustained; the friends of the rebel government will not be sustained. That is the question.

Mr. MORTON. Mr. President, I was a member of the committee of conference, but I could not sign this report for the reason that it would commit me to a construction of the law and the contract in regard to the five-twenty bonds from which I have always dissented. I believe that under the law the Government had as much right to pay those bonds in legal-tender notes as it has to pay any other debt, and that this declaration is substantially a change of the contract, and it is committing the Government to a payment in coin which is not required by the original contract. Therefore I cannot and will not vote for it.

But, Mr. President, this report contains one important statement which I would be very glad to vote for if I could do so without voting for the rest of it. It is, "and the United States also solemnly pledges its faith to make provision at the earliest practicable period for the redemption of the United States notes in coin." This I regard as a very important statement upon the part of the conference committee. It prescribes the way by which the Government shall return to specie payments, and the Government solemnly pledges its faith that it will make provision at the earliest practicable period for the redemption of the greenback currency in coin. The Senator from Vermont a little while ago asked a question of the chairman of the committee whether this would interfere with the funding of these notes. I say unquestionably it will. If these notes can be funded and disposed of in that way after the passage of this bill it would be a direct violation of the solemn pledge that is here given. What is the pledge that is given? It is a pledge given to the whole country that the Government will make provision at the earliest practicable moment not to fund these notes, not to return to the old policy of contraction, which has been condemned most solemnly by Congress, but that it will make provision to redeem these notes in coin. If this pledge is treated as a nullity before it has even been passed we need not place much importance upon it hereafter.

But, sir, here is the faith of the Government pledged to take immediate steps at the earliest practicable moment to redeem these notes in coin. That is a principle that I have had much at heart, and I shall be glad to see it incorporated in this report, although it contains other things that I cannot agree to. If this part of the report shall be carried out in good faith it will go far to relieve the evil consequences of the rest of it; but if it is to be trampled upon from the beginning, to be treated as a nullity before it is passed, then, of course, it amounts to nothing; it is a mere delusion. The chairman of the committee says that it would not be a violation if the holders of the notes consent to the funding. That is not the question. The holders of the bonds are not alone interested. It is the policy of the country that we are talking about. Of course, if we allow men to fund these notes in ten-forty bonds or five-twenty bonds they will do it. We can make it their interest to do so, so that the last one of them will be funded, resulting in contraction, resulting in almost the destruction of the interests of this country. But let it be understood that this commits the Government to a different policy, not to return to specie payments by funding the notes, not to return to specie payments by contraction, but to return to specie payments by preparing to redeem these notes in coin according to the contract. Sir, that is the starting point, and this pledge, if carried out in good faith, will do more to strengthen the credit of the Government, in the language of the original title of this bill, than all the rest of it. That is valuable. I regard the rest of it as pernicious and false in its principle as in the fact. I should be glad to vote for that if I could take it by itself; but as I cannot I must vote against the entire report, because it commits me to a construction of the law that I believe to be violent, that cannot be sustained by the ordinary rules of construction. It is in substance making a new contract, for which there is no necessity and, in my humble judgment, there is no excuse.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, notwithstanding this bill has been denounced as a piece of damnable legislation I suppose I am particularly responsible for this report, for it was only by agreeing with one member of the committee as to one part and with another member as to another part of the bill that we were able to agree at all and make this report. In my judgment it is a necessary and desirable piece of legislation; and if I have not misjudged the expression of public opinion it is a piece of legislation that is demanded by the people of this country, and they would be grievously disappointed if this Congress should adjourn without some such legislation; and I was unwilling because the other members of the committee could not agree with me as to details to defeat this great and salutary measure.

Now, it is said by the Senator from Indiana—and his objection goes upon that ground—that it changes the contract the Government made with the bondholder at the time the bonds were issued. I have misunderstood the honorable Senator heretofore if his position at this time is altogether correct on that subject. I have understood the Senator to hold to the doctrine that it was the duty of the Government to resume specie payments and make the Treasury notes equal in value to gold before these bonds should be paid, because in his judgment the spirit of the contract, at any rate required the resumption of specie payments before the bonds could be rightfully paid.

Now, the simple question is as to this part of the bill, did the people of the country expect when these bonds were issued, did those who supported the Government during the rebellion and the men who gave their money to the Government and took these bonds—did they expect that they would be paid in depreciated paper? Was it the general expectation of the country that these bonds would be canceled by promises of the Government depreciated in value, or was it the general understanding that they would be paid in gold or its equivalent? Suppose you admit, for the sake of the argument, that they are payable in Treasury notes, then the other conclusion necessarily follows that these notes, when payment was to be made, were to be worth their face in gold. That was the general opinion on the subject at the time the bonds were issued, and it is for the purpose of carrying out that understanding in good faith that this bill is enacted, and I do not understand that in any respect it changes the nature or even the form of the contract.

It is simply a pledge on the part of the Government that these bonds when they are paid shall be paid in gold or its equivalent, and that pledge is accompanied by another that the Treasury notes shall also be paid in gold; so that all the obligations of the Government, without any distinction, shall be so paid. No preference is given to the bondholders by this bill, none given to those who hold Treasury notes of the Government; but here is a solemn pledge of this nation made at this time, to be noticed by the whole world, that the Government of the United States will redeem all its promises without distinction in the money that is recognized as such by the world. This is the promise that is made, and this is all there is of it.

Now, sir, as to the second section, it is not precisely in the form that I should desire to have it, but it was impossible to agree unless this second section was incorporated in the report as it was adopted by the House; and as it is a piece of legislation which contains no pledge or promise whatever to anybody it may, if it is found to be bad in operation, be changed, by subsequent legislation. If this provision as to gold contracts is not satisfactory to the people, if it is found to be defective in any way, the section does not estop Congress at its next session, or at any future time, from passing a law that will change it and make it conform to the necessities and circumstances of the country.

I do not wish to consume the valuable time of the Senate, but I wish simply to say, as a member of the committee making this report, that it seems to me that in its adoption we accomplish a great good, we vindicate the honor and integrity of the country, and we declare that the people, whoever they may be or wherever they may be, who talk of repudiating the public debt of these United States and bringing everlasting shame and dishonor upon the faith of this nation, find no sympathy in this Congress, but that we will stand by the faith and the honor of the nation.

Mr. COLE. Mr. President, I desire in the fewest possible words to express my disapproval of the report of the conference committee and of the principles contained in the bill as it has been amended. My friend, the Senator from Oregon, expressed the real object of the bill—that it was for the benefit of the foreign bondholders, the bankers of Europe.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I made no such expression, if the Senator attributes any such remark to me.

Mr. COLE. I refer to the Senator from Oregon nearest me, [Mr. CORBETT.]

Mr. CORBETT. I stated that it was alleged that it was for the benefit of them.

Mr. COLE. I understand from the Senator that such was the object, to insure them payment in coin for that which cost them greenbacks at a very low figure. It seems I did not misunderstand the Senator at all. One provision incorporated in the bill by the conference committee is this:

And the United States also solemnly pledges its faith to make provision at the earliest practicable period for the redemption of the United States notes in coin.

I should like to ask the Senator from Oregon farthest from me [Mr. WILLIAMS] or the chairman of the Finance Committee when they expect that period will arrive after this sort of legislation? If we declare our debt to be all payable in coin, making it instead of a debt of $2,500,000,000, equivalent to some $3,800,000,000, as we ordinarily estimate money, when under such legislation do they expect this solemn pledge that they are now about to make will be redeemed? Not in our time, I fear.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I should like to ask the honorable Senator from the State of California, the land of gold, where they make and pay all their contracts in gold, if he is in favor of paying the public debt of the United States in its depreciated promises or whether he is in favor of paying the debt in money?

Mr. COLE. I can answer the gentleman in a moment. I am in favor of paying the debt of the United States according to the contract under which it was incurred, nothing more and nothing less. If when this debt falls due, the United States are paying their debts in coin, their current and ordinary obligations, then these bonds will be paid in coin; but if they fall due before that time, let me ask the Senator from Oregon if he would obtain gold by the sale of other bonds for the purpose of paying these, and thus increase the bonded indebtedness of the country? When, under such legislation, does he expect that the country will get out of its bonded indebtedness? It certainly will not be during this century or the next.

Mr. President, this is entitled "A bill to strengthen the public credit." It will, in my judgment, be a step directly against the public credit, and have a tendency to destroy the public credit. So far as the second section is concerned, which relates to contracts made payable in coin, it is intended to restrict, partially nullify, a decision of the Supreme Court lately made upon that subject. That decision authorizes the enforcement of contracts made specifically payable in coin. This section of the bill is intended, in my judgment, to restrict the operation of that decision of the Supreme Court, and I am equally opposed to that as to the first section.

Mr. NORTON. Mr. President, I presume I am as reluctant as any one to consume the valuable time of the Senate, but I think that the remaining twenty or twenty-four hours of this Congress cannot be devoted more profitably to the interests of the country than in the discussion of the report of this committee of conference. It would be far better for the people of this country, for the men who pay the expenses and taxes of the Government, if the residue of the time of this session of Congress were spent in the discussion of this report. It would be better that the appropriation bills yet to be considered should all fail than that a bill which commits the Congress and the Government of the United States, as this does, to the bondholders, that commits the labor of the country into the hands of the capital of the country, as this does, should become a law.

In my judgment this controversy which has been opened for a year or two years between the capital and the holders of the public debt of the country on the one side and the taxpayers of the country on the other is now coming to a point. On the 16th day of December last the chairman of the Committee on Finance brought into the Senate a proposition in the form of a resolution which committed the Government to the payment in coin of these five-twenty bonds, or practically had that effect. That resolution, as proposed, I will read:

That neither public policy nor the good faith of the nation will allow the redemption of the five-twenty bonds until the United States shall perform its primary duty of paying its notes in coin or making them equivalent thereto; and measures should be adopted by Congress to secure the resumption of specie payments at as early a period as practicable.

Mr. SHERMAN. I desire to say to my friend from Minnesota that that is the exact substance, only in condensed form, of the present proposition.

Mr. NORTON. I am aware of the fact that that is the substance of this proposition. On the 16th day of December last the chairman of the Committee on Finance brought that resolution into this body, and from that day to this it has never been moved, nor has this body been asked to consider it, and why? Because it was an evasion of the doctrines that the chairman of the Committee on Finance held in regard to the payment of the five-twenties; it was an evasion of the position that was claimed during the canvass last fall as to the legitimate construction of the Chicago platform, and all of it tending to the point that the public debt should either be made permanent or should not be paid until it was paid in coin.

Now, the proposition that is reported by this committee is substantially the resolution introduced in December last, and what is it?

That none of said interest-bearing obligations not already due shall be redeemed or paid before maturity, unless at such time United States notes shall be converted into coin at the option of the holder.

And what does that mean? It means that the Congress of the United States pledges the faith of the Government to the men who hold the bonds that it will not pay one of these five-twenty bonds until the greenbacks, the lawful money in which the bonds may now be paid, shall be paid in coin; and, as the Senator from California suggested, how long will that be? How long will it be, when the indebtedness of the Government is raised from $2,500,000,000 to $3,300,000,000, until they pay these bonds in coin?

Sir, the effect of it is to make the debt permanent and to fix upon this country the permanency of the public debt which the holders of these bonds say is a public blessing; or the other alternative is, "unless at such time bonds of the United States bearing a lower rate of interest than the bonds to be redeemed can be sold at par in coin." That is the funding proposition over again. Either alternative brings permanency of the public debt. It will become permanent if we increase the debt to the amount that it will be increased by undertaking to pay it in coin or if we fund it at a lower rate of interest. The chairman of the Committee on Finance says it is at the option of the bondholders; if they do not care to fund let them hold the bonds forever, or if they choose let them accept a new bond at a lower rate of interest.

The objection that I have to this funding proposition is that the bondholders will accept it. They will agree to take a bond running forty or fifty years at a lower rate of interest rather than to have one that is now due and may be paid at the pleasure of the Government or that runs a shorter period. I do not say that it looks anything like repudiation if the bondholders agree to take it; but I object in the name of the people who pay the taxes to this proposition that the bondholders will accept it, and thus for forty or fifty years or whatever time you fix the debt becomes permanent. Sir, what does a permanent public debt mean? It means nothing but taxation; it means a permanent burden upon the people of the country; that no matter what may be their resources or their ability to discharge the debt they are to be at the mercy of the holders of the bonds, and they cannot pay a dollar of it until the men who hold the bonds are willing to receive it. Why, sir, under the funding bill that passed at the last session, if it were a law, we might be able to discharge every dollar of that debt, and yet we could not pay a cent of it for forty long years, and for that length of time the people would have to bear the burden of that debt imposed upon them.

My objection to this proposition is that it looks to and inevitably brings about a permanency of the public debt. What is the interest of the Government in regard to the public debt? It is that it should be in the control of the Government. The Government, acting for and representing the people, should have the debt in their control, and when they were able to pay it they should be permitted to do it. The interest of the bondholders is that it should be in their control, and that the Government should not pay any of it until they are willing to receive it, and in the mean time the people bear the burdens in the shape of taxation.

Then this proposition brings to an actual issue, as I think, the interest of the people who pay the taxes and the interest of the men who hold the public debt and pay comparatively none of the taxes; and because I see in it a question between the men who hold the debt and the people who pay the taxes, and because I believe that Congress should look to the interests of the people quite as much as to the interests of the bondholders, I believe the residue of this session of Congress cannot be more profitably spent than in discussing this very measure. It would be far better for the interests of the country that all the appropriation bills should fail than that this proposition should pass. The Senator from Oregon talked about this Congress pledging the faith of the nation and that nothing of repudiation should be heard of. Sir, when this Congress pledges the faith of the nation to pay the five-twenties in coin they repudiate the interests of the people and impose upon them burdens that they ought not to be required to bear.

I know it is said that the men who took these bonds under the requirements of the Government for money deserve some credit; that they were as meritorious as were those who went into the armies and fought the battles of the Government during the recent war. They may have some merit, but, sir, their merit was the merit of doing that which it was their interest to do. As has been said, the currency of the country was depreciated in order to make it more to their interest to take these bonds, and now when they come to be paid you appreciate it and make the payment that they receive larger. I think the whole policy of the Government on that subject was wrong. Sir, I believe if there was any interest in this country that was especially interested in the successful prosecution of the war and the suppression of the rebellion it was the capital of the country. If there was any class of men who ought to feel more interest in the stake than another it was the capitalists of the country. If it had been possible the Government should have compelled the money of the country to contribute its share and its proportion of the burdens of the war, just as it compelled the laboring classes to contribute their services and their lives in its defense. I do not see, therefore, that the merit of this class is so great in that regard.

I believe I have said all that I care to say on this subject. My desire was to call the attention of the Senate and the country to the fact that the issue is now made between the holders of the Government debt and the people who pay the taxes. The bondholders, looking after their own interest, want some legislation that will give permanency to the public debt; while the interest of the people is that the debt should be kept so far as it can within the control of the Government, that they may pay it just as fast as they are able to do so. Between these two what should Congress do? Between the laborers and the tax-payers of the country on the one hand and the bondholders on the other what should Congress do? Certainly, in view of their professions of patriotism and interest in the prosperity and welfare and faith and credit of the Government, they ought to have some regard for the men who bear the burden, at least as much as they affect to have for those who hold the obligations of the Government.

Mr. THAYER. Mr. President, I do not rise to discuss this report of the committee, but simply to appeal to the Senate to let us have a vote or to lay aside the subject. We are in the waning hours of the session with two more appropriation bills undisposed of; and yet we discuss these questions hour after hour. Do Senators suppose that they can influence the minds of other Senators now and make votes for or against their peculiar views? I do not think they can; and I appeal again to the Senate to let us vote on this subject or lay it aside and dispose of the necessary legislation of the session.

Mr. SPRAGUE. It was not nor is it now my intention to discuss the details of this bill. My protest in the beginning was launched against this, that its effect was to enhance the value of capital in this country and the cost of capital to the people of this country when, as now, it is so high that there is not an industry within the reach of my vision that can afford to employ it.

Mr. BUCKALEW. I have but a remark to make in consequence of what has been said. I remember at the last session of Congress, at the closing hours of the session, the Senator from Ohio brought in a report from a committee of conference, very much as he does now, upon the subject of the public debt. It was a proposition to renew the five-twenty bonds and make them permanent; to make them a thirty or forty years' loan at a reduced rate of interest, and there were some other conditions, and we were hurried to a vote without discussion. Then the same reason prevailed which is now urged upon us for an immediate decision of this report. We were told that there was not time to examine the subject; there was not time for debate. That report was adopted. So far as Congress was concerned the forms of enacting it into a law were passed through, but the bill was not signed by the President and no result was produced.

Now, sir, observe the spectacle presented. Although the bill was passed through in that manner without debate in the closing hours of the session, under the allegation that it was important to the public interests that such a measure should be enacted here in this new session of Congress, commencing in December last, now ending in March, that measure has not been renewed, it has not received the approval of Congress at this session; and we are to adjourn without having placed upon the statute-book any such measure, without having even gone through the forms of passing it through the two Houses of Congress. This may admonish us of the impropriety of pressing this measure now reported by the committee of conference through the Senate without consideration, without debate.

The second branch of the bill, as reported back to us in relation to coin contracts, we all understand is unnecessary. We all understand that the Supreme Court has made a decision recently that obviates all necessity of providing by law that coin contracts shall be enforced. It is unnecessary to invoke the law-making power now to render such contracts valid. But, sir, not only is this part of the measure unnecessary, in my opinion it is evil and pernicious so far as it has any effect. It makes provisions which will complicate this question of coin contracts. It will render it more difficult to enforce those which should be enforced. It will exclude from enforcement, if it have any effect at all, certain contracts which without its enactment would be enforced by the courts. In other words, it will complicate this question of coin contracts, which can be acted upon, which can be carried into operation much better by the courts if left alone.

The other measure, pledging the faith of the Government to pay the public debt in a certain manner, both the bonded debt and the greenbacks, in my judgment, for the reasons which have already been stated, ought not to be approved. As a matter of course it is impossible for gentlemen rising under the circumstances here to discuss the report of the committee of conference intelligently; at all events, to discuss it fully. We have not an opportunity of examining this measure. It is not even in print. We must take a glance at it and form our conclusions as we best can.

There is another consideration. A member of the committee of conference has informed us that this report did not receive the concurrence of all the members of the committee of conference representing the two Houses, and that the result was arrived at by the course which he thought proper to pursue, voting with one class of members upon one question and with another class upon other questions; so that a majority could thus be secured for several propositions without obtaining for the whole of them the assent of the same minds. This shows the impropriety of legislating in this manner, legislating through the action of a committee of conference. Here we must take what the committee report to us in gross. It is impossible to discriminate between the different matters contained in this report and select those which we may approve and to reject those which we disapprove. We must take the report entire; and it is a report sent to us from a committee of conference which was not itself in point of fact agreed upon the several matters which it contains. However, I will not delay the Senate by further observations on this subject.

Mr. BAYARD. This bill reminds me of Hamlet's comment upon the professions of the player queen when she was about to poison her husband:

"The lady doth protest too much, methinks."

The object of the bill is stated to be, in the title, "to strengthen the public credit, and in relation to contracts in coin." The first section is merely declaratory law which cannot bind any subsequent Congress in its view of the contract. It holds out a false expectation that must depend on the good faith of the country, irrespective of any such legislation as this; and it provides that the public debt is not to be paid until the irredeemable paper money of the country is redeemable in coin.

The second section, on the contrary, tends to retard a return to specie payments. It tends to encourage bad faith in contracts made payable in gold between individuals, and of course the necessary effect of that must be to retard the return to specie payments. The mode in which to return to a normal currency in this country, if you mean to do it with the least possible pressure, is by encouraging contracts of that kind in all the higher branches of trade until they gradually descend into all the business of the community. I, for myself, consider that the second section of the bill, independent of the first altogether, which I look upon as impracticable and unwise legislation, is quite sufficient to condemn it, because it is intended to destroy the legal effect and import of the decision of your own Supreme Court, and to prevent men using the normal currency of this country for the purposes of their contracts by imposing a mode of inquiry into the character of the contract which will be utterly destructive of all confidence in the commercial community. I trust, therefore, that the report will not be adopted, and I shall ask for the yeas and nays on its adoption.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. WILSON, (after voting in the affirmative.) I paired off with Mr. HENDERSON on this subject, and as I do not see him here I withdraw my vote.

The result was announced—yeas 81, nays 24; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Abbott, Anthony, Cameron, Cattell, Chandler, Conkling, Connors, Corbett, Cragin, Dixon, Drake, Edmunds, Ferry, Fessenden, Frelinghuysen, Harris, Howard, Morgan, Morrill of Maine, Morrill of Vermont, Nye, Patterson of New Hampshire, Ramsey, Sherman, Stewart, Sumner, Trumbull, Van Winkle, Warner, Wiley, and Williams—31.

NAYS—Messrs. Bayard, Buckalew, Cole, Davis, Doolittle, Fowler, Hendricks, Keniogg, McCreery, McDonald, Morton, Norton, Osborn, Patterson of Tennessee, Robertson, Ross, Sawyer, Spencer, Sprague, Thayer, Tipton, Vickers, Wade, and Whyte—24.

ABSENT—Messrs. Grimes, Harlan, Henderson, Howe, Pomeroy, Pool, Rice, Saulsbury, Welch, Wilson, and Yates—11.

So the report was concurred in.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed a joint resolution (H. R. No. 473) relating to the pay of the Sergeant-at-Arms, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills and joint resolutions; and they were thereupon signed by the President pro tempore:

A bill (H. R. No. 1570) making appropriations for the consular and diplomatic expenses of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1870, and for other purposes;

A bill (S. No. 264) for the relief of Henry C. Noyes;

A bill (S. No. 661) for the relief of Lieutenant Colonel John W. Davidson, of the United States Army;

A bill (S. No. 679) to amend an act entitled

"An act granting lands to the State of Oregon to aid in the construction of a military road from Eugene City to the eastern boundary of said State;"

A bill (S. No. 705) further to provide for giving effect to treaty stipulations between this and foreign Governments for the extradition of criminals;

A bill (S. No. 760) for the relief of Rev. D. Hillhouse Buel;

A bill (S. No. 781) for the relief of Alpheus C. Gallahue;

A bill (S. No. 844) for the relief of Captain Charles Hunter, United States Navy;

A bill (S. No. 862) amendatory of the act providing for the sale of the arsenal grounds at St. Louis and Liberty, Missouri, and for other purposes, approved July 25, 1868;

A bill (S. No. 228) for the further security of equal rights in the District of Columbia;

A bill (S. No. 753) to provide for the execution of judgments in capital cases;

RESOLUTIONS OF INDIANA.

Mr. MORTON. With the permission of the Senate, I desire to present certain resolutions of the Legislature of Indiana, which I ask to have read.

The Secretary read the joint resolutions, as follows:

[Joint resolution No. 10.]

Be it resolved by the General Assembly of the State of Indiana, That our Senators in Congress be instructed, and our Representatives requested, to oppose by their influence and votes the passage of any bill that shall specially legalize coin contracts until the United States shall redeem its Treasury notes in coin, and to oppose the enactment of any law which shall have the effect to reduce the present volume of paper money in use among the people of the United States.

WILLIAM CUMBACK,
President of the Senate.

A. P. STANTON,
Speaker of the House of Representatives.

[Joint Resolution No. 7.]

Resolved by the General Assembly of the State of Indiana, That our Senators in Congress be, and they are hereby, instructed, and our Representatives requested, to vote for and otherwise promote the repeal of the act of Congress commonly known as the tenure-of-office law.

WILLIAM CUMBACK,
President of the Senate.

A. P. STANTON,
Speaker of the House of Representatives.

The resolutions were ordered to lie on the table.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House had agreed to the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 2009) to authorize the Secretary of War to place at the disposal of the Lincoln Monument Association at Springfield, Illinois, damaged and captured ordnance.

The message further announced that the House had disagreed to the amendments of the Senate to the bill of the House No. 1911, making appropriations to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the service of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1869, and for other purposes, asked a conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. G. W. SCOTFIELD of Pennsylvania, Mr. WILLIAM LAWRENCE of Ohio, and Mr. STEVENSON ARCHER of Maryland, managers at the same on its part.

DEFICIENCY BILL.

The Senate proceeded to consider its amendments to the bill (H. R. No. 1911) making appropriations to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the service of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1869, and for other purposes, disagreed to by the House of Representatives.

On motion by Mr. MORRILL, of Maine, it was

Resolved, That the Senate insist upon its amendments disagreed to by the House, and agree to the conference asked by the House of Representatives on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

Ordered, That the conferees on the part of the Senate be appointed by the President pro tempore.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore appointed Mr. HOWE, Mr. CRAGIN, and Mr. NYE.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. TRUMBULL, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 2008) in addition to an act entitled "An act to relieve from legal and political disabilities certain persons engaged in the late rebellion," approved July 27, 1868, asked to be discharged from its further consideration; which was agreed to.

He also, from the same committee, to whom were referred several petitions of citizens of the United States, praying for such an amendment to the Constitution of the United States as will fully recognize the obligations of the Christian religion, asked to be discharged from their further consideration; which was agreed to.

He also, from the same committee, to whom were referred the following report and resolutions, asked to be discharged from their further consideration; which was agreed to:

Resolutions of the Chamber of Commerce of New Orleans, Louisiana, protesting against any further extension of that section of the bankrupt act known as the fifty per cent. provision;

A report of a special committee of the Ohio Legislature, remonstrating against the extension of admiralty jurisdiction by judicial construction over the navigable waters of the interior of the country, and in favor of congressional legislation to restrict such jurisdiction to tide-waters and sea-going vessels; and Resolutions of the Board of Trade of Charleston, South Carolina, remonstrating against the revival of extinct provisions of bankrupt laws.

Mr. CONKLING, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 843) to designate the place of confinement for persons convicted of offenses against the laws of the United States and sentenced to imprisonment in certain States, asked to be discharged from its further consideration; which was agreed to.

ARMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I call for the order of the day.

Mr. MORTON. I ask the Senate now to consider and take a vote upon the resolution before discussed, which was laid over with the understanding that it should be disposed of, in regard to the compensation of Senators from the reconstructed States. There will be no further discussion upon it, I presume.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill regularly before the Senate is the Army appropriation bill.

Mr. HARLAN. I ask the chairman of the committee if he will not allow the roll to be called on the bill which was pending during the morning hour? I think there will not be a word of discussion upon it.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I should be very glad to oblige the Senator; but I am appealed to on the other side, and it would require unanimous consent to take up the subject to which he refers.

Mr. CONNESS. I shall insist, for one, on going forward with the Army appropriation bill. The sooner that is disposed of the sooner we shall get to other business. I hope the Chair will direct the Clerk to proceed with that bill.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I am appealed to on both sides. I think I shall have to insist on the regular order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The unfinished business is before the Senate, being the bill (H. R. No. 1803) making appropriations for the support of the Army for the year ending June 30, 1870, and for other purposes, and the pending question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. SUMNER.]

Mr. HARLAN. What is that amendment?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment is the amendment offered by the Senator from Massachusetts with regard to paying the claim of Massachusetts incurred during the war of 1812.

Mr. HARLAN. Would it be in order to offer an amendment to that amendment?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There is an amendment to the amendment pending, offered by the Senator from Iowa, [Mr. GRIMES.]

Mr. HARLAN. I should like to hear the amendment to the amendment read.

The Secretary read as follows:

But interest shall be allowed to the States of Massachusetts and Maine on such sums only on which the said States of Massachusetts and Maine either paid interest or lost interest by the transfer of an interest-bearing fund.

Mr. SUMNER. The Senator from Iowa has already agreed to accept my modification of that amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Let the modification be read.

The SECRETARY. The amendment, as modified, now reads:

*And be it further enacted, That the Secretary of the Treasury be authorized and required to audit and fix the interest accounts of Maine and Massachusetts for advances made by Massachusetts, then including Maine, for the United States during the war of 1812-15 with Great Britain upon the basis that the claim of these advances belonged, after the separation of the two States, one third to Maine and two thirds to Massachusetts, and reckoning interest at six per cent. per annum, and according to the rules and limitations directed to be applied to the case of Maryland by the twelfth section of the act approved March 3, 1857, entitled "An act making appropriations for certain civil expenses of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1858;" and that he is hereby authorized and directed to pay to Maine and Massachusetts, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, such sums as he shall ascertain to be due to those States, as herein directed to be audited and fixed: Provided, That in lieu of payment in money the Secretary of the Treasury may at his discretion issue to these States bonds of the United States payable in thirty years and bearing interest at the rate of six per cent. per annum, payable semi-annually; the principal and interest of such bonds to be made payable in lawful money of the United States.*

Mr. GRIMES. I am inquired of whether with this modification of the proposition the amendment proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts is satisfactory to me. I desire to say that it is no more satisfactory now than it was before it was modified; and not only shall I vote against it, but I will vote against the Army bill itself rather than submit to be forced to vote on a question of this sort upon a general appropriation bill.

Mr. CHANDLER. I had hoped that the Senator from Massachusetts would withdraw this amendment and enable us to pass this appropriation bill.

Mr. SUMNER. I am perfectly willing that it should be passed.

Mr. CHANDLER. Are you willing to withdraw the amendment?

Mr. SUMNER. Does the Senator appeal to me to withdraw it?

Mr. CHANDLER. I said I had hoped you would. I do not care whether you do or not.

Mr. DRAKE. I appeal to the Senator from Massachusetts to withdraw this amendment.

Mr. SUMNER. Will the Senator vote upon the amendment and let the Senate vote upon it? That is all I ask. I do not wish to add another word or to make any explanation or to adduce any further authorities.

Mr. CHANDLER. I do.

Mr. CONKLING. So do I.

Mr. SUMNER. Let Senators vote upon it.

Mr. CHANDLER. No, sir; you talked about four hours on the subject and I must answer you. You have detained the Senate for two or three days, and it cannot pass now without your speeches being answered.

Mr. President, I stated when this bill was last up that Massachusetts never had a real claim against this Government, and in the next place that her pretended claim had been paid in full; and this I shall proceed to show. In the next place the Government never owed her a dollar of interest in the world, and in my judgment never will pay her a dollar of interest. I propose, as briefly as possible, to give a history of this claim on the part of the State of Massachusetts.

The claim has been now for more than fifty years before this body. It has been for more than fifty years under discussion. I will correct myself in that statement, for I believe she did not present any claim for more than twenty years, nor did she dream that she had a claim; and therefore that will reduce the time that this pretended claim has been before the body to at least thirty years.

Mr. President, during the war of 1812 the Government of the United States employed its own troops for defense, employed its own troops in repelling the enemy, employed its own troops for the national defense. But certain States, towns, and cities deemed themselves in peril, and in their alarm, in their supposed peril, they called out their militia. We were told the other day by the Senator from Massachusetts that one hostile foot did tread the soil of that State and that some little village was burnt. I had forgotten that circumstance until it was stated by him. But the majority of these claims sprung up in this way: a wild rumor would be raised; a haystack would be burned; a barn would be set on fire; a strange vessel would be seen in the offing; and immediately an alarm would be raised that the British were coming, and the militia would turn out and rush to the supposed point of danger, generally upon their own responsibility, not even at the call of the State of Massachusetts. Those militiamen never dreamed that they were entitled to pay, even from the State of Massachusetts, for a long time. They rushed out for their own defense, to protect, as they supposed, their own homes from danger. Those Massachusetts troops were not officered by officers of this Government. They were officered by officers of the Massachusetts militia. Other States did the self-same thing, and other States were in danger during those perilous times. The State of Maryland was invaded; battles were fought upon her soil; and she called out troops in the same way for her own defense, in addition to the Government forces that were upon her soil. And yet the State of Maryland made no claim for compensation to those troops of hers during those times of peril. They had no claim against the Government. They were Maryland militia, called out for the defense of Maryland by the laws of Maryland, and not being called out by the United States no claim existed for their payment. The States all along the Atlantic coast did the self-same thing. Wherever a strange sail was seen in the distance there was supposed to be danger, and nearly every one of the States lying on the coast finally trumped up claims of this description against the Government. Not one of those claims was presented for many, many years.

Finally, after a long time, the Government in its magnanimity concluded to refund these sums to the several States, not as in justice due to those States, because the money in most instances had been injudiciously expended, and not in accordance with the will of the commander of the American forces; yet, says the report on those claims, as these funds were expended for a patriotic purpose, therefore the Government will refund them. After a considerable time these several amounts were placed upon the books of the Treasury of the United States to the credit of the several States. An account was opened with those States. They were credited with the amount of the claims that were allowed, but no word was ever uttered about interest on those claims; and as the Treasurer of the United States had money from time to time he paid it upon those claims—sometimes $20,000, and sometimes $50,000, and so scattered the amounts around among the different States and upon the different claims. This process continued year after year until the claims were paid in full, and then the books were closed and the final settlement was had. So far as the books of the Treasury showed the accounts were settled and the transaction ended, no thought ever having entered the mind of any individual that interest would ever be demanded on those claims, it being considered a gratuity.

But after many years, years after the last dollar had been paid to those States, as was supposed, a claim was brought in for interest upon this gratuity. That claim was pressed year after year, and finally the Government was induced to pay interest to those States and cities where interest had been lost or had been paid by those States and cities. The books were reopened. Interest was cast upon the original amount of the claim, whatever it might be, down to the date of the final payment of that claim, at six per cent. Then, on the opposite side of the ledger, interest was cast at six per cent. upon every single item of debt that had been made against that State. There was six per cent. upon the one side, and six per cent. upon the other; the amount brought down to the bottom, the one deducted from the other, the interest paid at six per cent., and the account finally and forever closed. Here, sir, was final settlement, No. 2, never again, as was supposed, to be disturbed. The thing was ended, principal and interest having been paid where interest had been paid by the States, and the whole thing closed.

But, sir, in 1857, as I said the other night, the late Mr. Pearce, of Maryland, on the last day of the session, on the 3d of March, precisely as is the case now with the claim of Massachusetts, moved an amendment to a general appropriation bill reopening the account of the Government with the State of Maryland, and ordering it to be settled upon the basis of mercantile usage, as I said the other night, and although that is not the exact language, that is the idea. That amendment was in these words:

"That the proper accounting officers of the Treasury be, and they are hereby, authorized and directed to reexamine the account between the United States and the State of Maryland as the same was from time to time adjusted under the act passed on the 13th of May 1826, entitled 'An act authorizing the payment of interest due to the State of Maryland, and on such reexamination to assume the sums expended by the State of Maryland for the use and benefit of the United States, and the sums refunded and paid by the United States to the said State and the times of such payments as being correctly stated in the account as the same has heretofore been passed at the Treasury Department; but in the calculation of interests due under the act; aforesaid the following rules shall be observed, to wit: interest shall be calculated up to the time of any payment made. To this interest the payment shall be first applied, and if it exceed the interest due the balance shall be applied to diminish the principal.'

They then cast interest up to the time of the first payment, deducted the interest from the payment, and credited the balance upon the amount due to the State of Maryland, thus compounding the interest to the State of Maryland instead of paying six per cent. interest as the Government had agreed to do. But, sir, they did worse than that, and the Senator from Massachusetts insists that the account of Massachusetts shall be opened and settled upon the basis of this settlement with Maryland—they not only compounded the interest, but they compounded compound interest; for these payments were frequently made two or three times in a year, and they would cast the interest if the payment was made this month, the next month, and the month following; they would compound the interest twelve times a year if the payments were made in that time. Then, after having compounded compound interest against this Government for claims that were never due and were a gratuity from the first, they cast interest for fifty years upon the compound interest compounded. That was the proposition that was put through on the last day of the session in 1857, on motion of the then Senator from Maryland; and that is the proposition that the Senator from Massachusetts now proposes to force through this body on the afternoon of the last day of the session of this Congress.

Sir, he served this notice upon us: he says, "You may pay it now or you may wait; I shall continue to press this claim; I shall press it to-day; I shall press it to-morrow; I shall press it this year; I shall press it next year; and I shall keep pressing it until it is paid." Well, sir, I expect to sit in the Senate of the United States as long as the Senator from Massachusetts, and I serve this notice upon him: I will resist this unjust claim to-day; I will resist it to-morrow; I will resist it next year; I will resist it the year following; I will resist it while I am in the Senate with that Senator; and if he is reelected to press it for six years more, I will try to be reelected to resist it for another six years. [Laughter.]

Sir, there is no justice in the claim whatever. There never was any justice in it. But I have a little account that I should like to settle with the State of Massachusetts. In 1836 the State of Massachusetts received from this Government, and owes it to-day, with the exact rate of interest that she charges or attempts to charge this Government, $1,388,175. It stands charged to her on the books of the Treasury to-day and belongs to all the States of this Union. If the Senator proposes to collect compound interest he certainly will not object to paying it; and if this claim is to be pressed I propose to offer an amendment that interest on that $1,388,175 shall be cast in the same way, and that the amount shall be deducted that she claims for interest, and that she shall pay the balance which amounts to-day to three millions and some odd thousand dollars due to the Government for money advanced to Massachusetts. That is not a fraudulent claim. We will make you pay every dollar of it if you press this claim; and I propose to cast the interest in the self-same way upon that little sum of $1,300,000, and then I want Massachusetts to pay the difference.

Mr. President, I repeat there is no justice in this claim. There never was any justice in it. It was a gratuity at the start, and the claim is monstrous to be brought in here at this late day, after sixty years. Why, sir, suppose Massachusetts had a claim originally, is there no outlawry to a claim; is there no time when a claim shall cease to be a valid claim? She has had more than fifty years to press this claim. When the General Government was distributing money around among the States because it knew not what to do with it, why did not Massachusetts present her claim and collect it, and not come here when we owe $2,500,000,000, when the Treasury is absolutely struggling under the load of debt that now oppresses it, and press an unjust claim?

The Senator from Indiana [Mr. MORTON] said the other night, why not charge interest? Sir, the Government protects the individual. After six years, I believe, in every State in this Union every liability is absolutely barred by the statute of limitations, but there is no statute of limitation on the Government. It depends on the honor of the Government, and runs for all eternity for aught I know. Now, take the case of a claim for $100,000. Suppose Massachusetts had advanced $100,000 in the war of 1812. Computing compound interest upon it, you would have $200,000 in 1824, $400,000 in 1836, $800,000 in 1848, $1,600,000 in 1860, $3,200,000 in 1872, $6,400,000 in 1884, $12,800,000 in 1896, $25,600,000 in 1908, and in 1968 $912,000,000, or thereabouts. This is the way that interest runs up against the Government, and yet the Senator says, why not pay interest forever and ever? Why, sir, take ever so small a sum and let the interest run for a thousand years, and where would the finances of any Government be? It is for the very reason that this interest is running night and day and all the time, for the very reason that there is no end to the payment of interest, that no Government on earth has ever paid interest except where it has contracted to do so. Interest is just as much a matter of contract as the principal is. No Government ever did or ever will pay interest unless it has contracted to pay it; and this Government never contracted to pay the interest or the principal of this debt until it was finally entered on the books of the Treasury. I will not detain the Senate longer upon this proposition. I hope it will be voted down.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. SUMNER. The modified amendment to the amendment I have accepted. The amendment is within my power.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Then the question is on the amendment as modified.

Mr. CONKLING obtained the floor.

Mr. CHANDLER. If the Senator will pardon me, I desire to add that the Senator from Massachusetts voted against this Maryland claim when it originally passed. I have the yeas and nays before me. The Senator from Massachusetts then voted "no" very properly, as I shall now, and I hope he will, to be consistent.

Mr. DAVIS. With the permission of the Senator from New York, I desire to offer the following amendment to the amendment:

And the Treasury officers are hereby authorized to audit and pay to the loyal owners of the slaves that were drafted or enlisted into the military service of the United States during the late rebellion the bounty to which such owners may be entitled.

Mr. CONKLING. Mr. President, some time ago, after a large space in a short session of Congress which was crowded with important measures needing attention had been devoted to the consideration of one or more railroad schemes, I encouraged myself with the hope that propositions, covert or avowed, for railroad subsidies were at an end for this session. Now, however, as the sands of the Fortieth Congress have almost run, we are met with a new proposition to subsidize a railroad company, and to do it upon grounds and in circumstances which to my mind, after such investigation as I have been able to give the case, present the most preposterous and baldest instance of an attempt of this sort which I have yet witnessed in Congress. The tables here and in the other branch are loaded with bills which it concerns the management of the Government that we should complete; and yet upon an appropriation bill, in palpable defiance of the rules of this body, an attempt is made to ingraft a provision like this. Not only is it in defiance of the rules of the Senate, but repugnant to every precedent to which reference has been made. I say that in view of the fact that the Senator from Massachusetts has hunted up now nineteen instances, which might have been swelled to nineteen score of instances, in which by consent, no objection being made, appropriations in the nature of private claims have been tolerated upon general appropriation bills; but as the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. BUCKALEW] took occasion to show from the Journal of the Senate, when the question of order was made, as certainly as the report follows the flash so certainly followed the decision of the Chair and the adjudication of the body that the rules of the Senate would not tolerate such a perversion of its proceedings. Then, in defiance, I repeat, of the rules of the Senate, we have an attempt to force upon an appropriation bill a subsidy of about one million three hundred thousand dollars for a railroad company which only two sessions ago received from the Treasury of the United States, upon a claim more than doubtful, $140,000. My honorable friend from Massachusetts [Mr. WILSON] looks alarmed at that statement. Does he dispute it? No, sir, he does not; more than one hundred and forty thousand dollars were voted upon grounds which I repeat were more than doubtful, in my estimation, to the railway company, through the name of which I see a pencil has been run, as it appears, in the draft of this amendment. Confessedly the State of Massachusetts is not here, but a railroad company is here which fights under the nom deguerre of Massachusetts for $1,250,000 upon a pretense—I say it respectfully—which, in the light of the conceded facts in this case and the law applicable to it, vanishes before a fair investigation.

Mr. President, the State which honors me with a seat in this Chamber bears, I believe, about one third of the public burdens. Of the revenues contributed to this nation the State of New York pays at least one third, so that $400,000 is a sum not larger than that which this railway company proposes to take from the people of the State of New York. That fact alone, I think, will warrant me in discarding all obligation to abstain from debate, because a time and an opportunity have been selected which propriety forbids to attempt the successful consummation of this plan. If any member of this body can justify himself in insisting that an appropriation bill at this hour shall be the vehicle of carrying through a claim like this, I submit that a member of this body whose constituents are to be called upon to furnish $400,000 toward the sum required will be pardoned even in the circumstances and in view of the occasion for assigning such reasons as occur to him why the exaction should not be made.

Now, Mr. President, look a few moments at the conceded facts in this case. Long years ago, for purposes of local defense, the State of Massachusetts made outlays of divers sums of money. I beg Senators to bear in mind that the allegation now is that Massachusetts paid interest or lost interest upon those sums. That is the gravamen of the allegation, let it never be forgotten, in measuring the law and the equity of this case. Then, as early as 1815, Massachusetts had made disbursements and expenditures—I borrow the words from an act of Congress to which I shall refer—for the purpose of defending her domain from the foot of a foreign enemy. She had paid interest or lost interest upon her advances made then. That is the allegation. Upon that it is argued a claim arose in behalf of the State of Massachusetts against the national Treasury. I waive for the purpose of my argument the question discussed by the Senator from Michigan whether in truth that claim arose or not. I prefer for my argument to concede that it did. I reject the fact that the troops of Massachusetts, under the order of the Governor of Massachusetts, were not to leave the State. I reject the fact that Massachusetts denied the right of the Federal Government to call out the militia of the State of Massachusetts save and except only by her consent and approbation. I discard from view the fact that Massachusetts assumed the position that when a call had been made and she had consented that her troops should be called, still they could not be ordered under the authority or command of the Government of the United States save only by the President of the United States alone; and I put this claim in all respects upon a footing with the most favored claim of this description.

Mr. President, was it a liquidated claim? Has any Senator here argued that it ever became liquidated until 1886? The amendment on your table proposes a computation of interest without regard to the time when it was liquidated, and going back, as I understand it, all the way to the time when these advances were made. Let us examine that briefly in the light of two propositions which I submit to the Senate. First, I affirm that if not one shilling had ever been paid to Massachusetts, if the question were all open now, as it was at first, interest is no part of this debt. Interest is not a matter of course as an incident to the debt; far from it, and I venture to say that no lawyer will affirm, taking all the facts as stated most favorably for the claimant, assuming that no discord or dissatisfaction had ever taken place, that interest either was a part of this debt or by operation of law an incident to the debt. Last I may seem to speak without authority on this proposition let me refer to one of the early opinions of the Attorney General of the United States, an opinion carefully and elaborately considered on a very important case by that gifted son of the Republic, William Wirt, when he was Attorney General. He says:

"To come more closely to the subject interest is not a thing of course; it is in no case a part of the debt nor is it a necessary consequence of the debt. By the polity of many nations it is forbidden in all cases."

I ask Senators to observe this—

"and by those whose laws allow it in cases between individuals it is not allowed as a matter of right in every case; on the contrary, it is allowed only where the character of the contract expressly covers the claim of interest, as in penal bonds, where the penalty exceeds or equals the claim; or where the parties have, by their contract, expressly stipulated for its payment; or where the circumstances of the case call for its allowance as a matter of equity in the particular instance. In whole classes of cases it is as a general rule disallowed; and one of these classes is the case of unliquidated damages. These principles are nowhere more clearly stated nor more ably and amply illustrated than in Mr. Jefferson's correspondence with Mr. Hammond in 1792."

Now, will any member of this body put himself upon the proposition that it was ever agreed specially in this case that Massachusetts, as a matter of specific stipulation, should receive interest upon her advances made during the war of 1812? If it is not will some Senator tell me—rejecting entirely now the matter of payments and accounts stated—as an original question between Government and citizen or Government and State, upon what principle we are to adjudicate that Massachusetts was entitled to interest upon this claim? Let me proceed a step farther. Let me suppose the law were otherwise; that I am mistaken in this proposition. Will any Senator affirm that upon unliquidated and unascertained claims the State of Massachusetts was entitled to interest upon any construction, however latitudinarian? And yet this amendment applies just as much to a period confessedly anterior to all liquidation as to any other period in the history of this ancient demand. Upon what principle, I ask again, is that even if interest at all were allowed?

But go a step farther. In 1836, according to the allegation, Massachusetts had paid and lost interest upon her advances. I do not insist upon the argument made by the Senator from Michigan the other night, although that argument, I think, was strictly true and unanswerable in that regard. I do not insist that the interest account in an ordinary case is a matter of disbursement or expenditure to be charged. We know that it is in the universal business understanding of Christendom, but I do not insist upon it. The point to which I ask Senators at this moment to attend is this: if a man in an account which he is making up is called upon to state his disbursements, and the truth is that he has actually paid interest, as the State of Missouri and many other States did during the war lately closed, would any man stultify himself so far as to doubt for one moment that that was one of the specific things called for when notice was given to him to make up his expenditures and disbursements? Can any man doubt that? In the light of that question I ask the attention of Senators to this joint resolution of May 14, 1836:

"That the Secretary of War, in preparing his report pursuant to a resolve of the House of Representatives, agreed to on the 24th of February, 1832, be, and he hereby is, authorized, without regard to existing rules and requirements, to receive such evidence as is on file and any further proofs which may be offered tending to establish the validity of the claims of Massachusetts."

That means all of them—

"upon the United States or any part thereof"—

That certainly was an expression of range enough to be searching. For what?

"for services, disbursements, and expenditures during the late war with Great Britain."

There, in 1836, the State of Massachusetts, the alleged but unreal claimant here, was distinctly notified, not by the action of some bureau officer, which has been referred to here as something which liquidates damages between the Government of the United States and a claimant, but notified by act of Congress, by act of the law-making power, to put in her appearance and file her claims, with the evidence, for services, expenditures, and disbursements. She did so; and undoubtedly she did so with diligence and with accuracy. Those claims were examined by the Secretary of War, and his report has been read here as evidence that that liquidation took place which establishes the proper commencement of an interest account. Very well. The amount being ascertained, in 1859 the same power which had notified Massachusetts to appear, namely, the Congress of the United States, having up to that time remained unsatisfied of the validity and sufficiency of these demands, took action, avowing its satisfaction in their accuracy and directing them to be paid. They were paid and the State of Massachusetts received that payment.

Now, Mr. President, I have heard it argued here, and nothing in this case has surprised me more, that such a payment worked no extinguishment of interest; but that afterward a claim could be put in for interest independent of the principal, and that upon the usages of war that claim could be maintained. The honorable Senator from New Jersey [Mr. FRANKLIN] the other day called attention to this point, and he was answered by the Senator from Maine [Mr. FESSENDEN] positively and fully that such was not the law. Without having looked very far since that time for authorities on this subject I have taken pains to have brought here some of the familiar cases on the subject; and before referring to one or two of them I beg to submit what I understand the law to be upon this point; and if it goes further, or not so far, I wish some Senator would present from some text-book or some other book of authority countervailing evidence. Now, sir, I undertake to say that wherever the principal is paid and received in satisfaction of the principal, there being no pretense that it satisfies interest, that accord and satisfaction extinguishes interest unless one of two things be true: unless, in the first place, the obligation upon which the payment was made upon its face stipulates for interest; or, in the second place, when the payment is made the parties themselves stipulate that the claim for interest shall survive. Inasmuch as this proposition was denied by one of the Senators from Maine I sent for a volume of Maine Reports, thinking that perhaps a case from Maine might be locally more satisfactory than some other case; and I call the attention of the Senate to the case of Howe vs. Bradley, reported in 19 Maine Reports, in which the opinion of the court was given by Shepley, justice. There was a dissenting opinion; and I ask the attention of the Senate to the point which the court decided and the distinction taken by the judge who dissented. The court say:

"Interest is regarded as incidental to the principal debt and not as a part of it. The interest accruing before an act of bankruptcy cannot be added to the principal to form a sufficient petitioning creditor's debt. (Ex parte Burgess, 8 Taunt., 660; Cameron vs. Smith, 2 B. & A. 305.) It has been decided that an action cannot be maintained to recover the interest after payment of the principal."

Citing cases both in England and in this country.

Mr. Justice Emery dissented from the opinion in this case, the facts of which I do not stop to state; and now I ask the attention of the Senate to the criticism which the dissenting judge made upon the law as laid down in the language I have read. He says:

"In New York, too, notwithstanding the decisions cited from Johnson and Cowen, which last states the rule there of casting interest, in Stevens vs. Barringer, 13 Wendell, 639, it was held that an action may be sustained for the recovery of interest, although the principal of a debt has been paid, when the payment of interest is stipulated for in the contract. It is only where interest is not stipulated for in the contract, and is recoverable merely as damages or as an incident to the debt that a creditor is precluded from sustaining an action for its recovery after accepting the principal."

Again he says:

"In Fake vs. Eddy's Ex., 15 Wendell, 76, the same doctrine was maintained, and the chancellor said 'the counsel for the plaintiff are wrong in supposing that the rule of law that an action cannot be sustained for the interest of a demand after the principal has been paid is applicable to this case.' The cases of Tillotson vs. Preston, 3 Johns. R., 229; Johnston vs. Brannan, 5 ib. 268; and The People vs. The County of New York, 5 Cowen's R., 333, were all cases in which there was no contract for the payment of interest, and it could only be recovered as damages for the non-payment of the principal debt when it became due."

There the acceptance of the principal extinguishes the claim for interest. Is there any doubt about it in the experience or reading of any lawyer in this body? Did anybody ever hear that you could reopen and reexamine an account upon a question of interest unless there was fraud or surprise in the case? I undertake to say never in the history of jurisprudence in this country or in England for more than one hundred years.

I have another case, a very leading case in my own State, a case decided by the court of errors, the highest court known to us, upon this very proposition; and what did the court say? That the acceptance of the principal, no matter how or why or wherefore, worked an absolute extinguishment of all claim for interest unless expressly the parties reserved that claim and provided that it should survive. My honorable friend from Missouri [Mr. DRAKE] says that that is unquestionable law. Certainly it is; and I would not have ventured to read authorities in the hearing of the Senate to establish such a proposition if I had not heard my honorable friend from New Jersey contradict with great plainness of speech because he affirmed that it was the law.

Mr. President, I ask honorable Senators—I care not what their wish may be to see this railroad built without private subscription—to answer me one proposition. Let us suppose that Massachusetts had a claim triumphant and overmastering in its equity and its facts; let us suppose that claim was liquidated in 1814, if you please; then take the fact that Massachusetts was called upon in 1836 to present all her claims for services, disbursements, and expenditures, that she did so, that payment was made and not one syllable said, as pretended by anybody, as to the survivorship of interest. Take that proposition and tell me how any Senator who sits here to administer trust funds can vote as a matter of law or as a matter of conscience that now a claim for interest can be predicated of the principal paid so long ago?

I undertake to say, Mr. President, that there is not a court of equity in Christendom, taking the whole case as stated in favor of the claimants without diminution or addition, which would decree that the Commonwealth of Massachusetts or the Canadian Railway Company has the shadow of a claim against the Government of the United States for interest upon these advances. And yet, sir, we find ourselves in a very extraordinary, a very unusual position. There comes from the Committee on Foreign Relations a verbal report in favor of this claim. I wonder that we have not heard during this debate what the Committee on Foreign Relations had to do in theory of law or in possibility of fact with a claim of this description. The honorable Senator from Massachusetts who leads the effort to establish it is chairman of that committee. Second upon it is the equally distinguished Senator from Maine, [Mr. FESSENDEN,] and the proposition is to attach it to a bill coming from a committee which is led by the other Senator from Maine, [Mr. MORRILL,] and which is dignified by the presence of the other Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. WILSON,] and my honorable friend from New Hampshire, [Mr. PATTERSON,] and who by his action in the other branch was committed to this claim, happens also to be a member of the Committee on Foreign Relations; and thus we are brought to an accidental condition of things which was described by another person on a somewhat different occasion as a "fortuitous combination of unforeseen contingencies."

Mr. DRAKE. I would like to furnish the honorable Senator from New York with a little information just at this moment in connection with the point that he is now discussing if it would be agreeable to him that I should do so.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. (Mr. POMEROY in the chair.) Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. CONKLING. Yes, sir.

Mr. DRAKE. I have been very much puzzled to comprehend how it could be that this subject could properly emanate from the Committee on Foreign Relations, and I have just got the explanation of it. A bill was presented on the 11th of March, 1867, by the Senator from Maine, [Mr. FESSENDEN,] read twice, and referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, entitled "A bill to provide for the defense of the northeastern frontier," as if it were menaced! That bill was reported the day after it was referred to that committee, "reported by Mr. SUMNER without amendment," and it proposed, not that the interest claim of Massachusetts against the United States should be transferred to this European and North American Railway Company, but that the proceeds of all the claims of Massachusetts against the United States arising prior to the year 1860 should be transferred to that company. That is the way that this thing comes into the hands of the Committee on Foreign Relations and is reported by that committee—reported the day after the bill is sent to that committee, and reported without amendment. I give this for the information of the honorable Senator from New York.

Mr. CONKLING. Mr. President, it is not for me certainly to animadvert, except so far as properly and necessarily the facts are before us, upon the reasons, upon the considerations, upon the arrangements which have led to the presentation of this measure. The zeal with which Senators feel called upon to press forward in the advocacy of local interests behind them present questions, of course, in the case of each Senator to be determined for himself. But I refer to this matter to say that it will be an evil day, a day of misfortune when the fate of particular claims, the interests of particular States or corporations are to depend upon the attitude which may be held upon committees having particular measures in charge by the local representatives from the sections in which those claims arise.

Now, sir, I cannot believe that any committee of this body to which this claim naturally would have gone would not have made to us a written and explanatory report so as not to leave us in the situation in which we are found by the circumstances of this case. Certainly no committee to which it had naturally been referred would have reported it so late that it must be discussed at the hazard of all the legislation of the session. Certainly no such committee would have reported it when it was least expected as an appendage to a bill in connection with which nobody could have been prepared to consider or discuss it; and certainly it would not have come without a written report, without one word of explanation except that afforded by the arguments made in the Senate by particular Senators chancing to be members of this committee.

So much, I think, I have a right to say. It is not the good fortune of the State of New York to be able to avail herself of this movement in reference to $3,000,000 which she advanced during the war lately closed, and as to which I want an investigation of interest accounts if a principle of this sort is to be established. I believe, sir, that any member of this body investigating this claim in the light of the facts conceded to exist, and called upon to make report upon the considerations which I have endeavored imperfectly to suggest, would never fail to establish as far as a report could establish it the proposition of law that receiving in 1859 the principal of this claim, in the absence of all agreement to pay interest before or at the time, bars all claim for interest. At all events it is a question, I submit, worthy of the examination of a committee of this body, a question which ought not to be whistled down the wind by the accident, by the haste of an occasion of this sort, so unimely, and I must be permitted to say so inappropriate as conducive to fair and considerate legislation.

And, Mr. President, I ought not to fail to remind the Senate that interest in this case is barred, not as a technicality, not as the statute of limitations steps in and bars a claim—because that at times has been held to be technical, although I never believed that that was the philosophy even of a statute of limitations—but this bar is more philosophical, more equitable even than that. It proceeds upon the wholesome presumption that when the minds of the parties have met upon an agreement, the intentment, the effect of which is thoroughly established by the law and the understanding of the commercial world, it concerns good morals, it concerns the just composition of differences among men, that each party should stand to and abide by the terms and the conditions he has made. It proceeds upon the idea long embalmed, both in the civil and in the common law, that it is hurtful that afterward, except upon grounds of surprise or fraud, either party should be permitted to invent, to conjure up, to conceive in good faith or bad, new elements in the account, and bring them in, to the end that controversy may be opened.

In this connection, and before I take my seat, I wish to allude to one other thing, only one of the many things upon which I should have been glad to comment, which I have heard in the course of this debate. The honorable Senator from Massachusetts has repeated more than once, as a part of his case apparently, that this interest had not been paid for nearly half a century, or whatever the time may be; that during all these many years Massachusetts had been kept out of this interest. Why, sir, as upon the point which I just left, so here is, I submit, a total perversion, a total reversal of the whole theory of law. Until now, in every horn-book of the law could be found denunciations of stale demands; and in many of the States of this Union—New Jersey for one, if I am not mistaken—it is at least a misdemeanor, and sometimes has been made a felony, to transfer at all by assignment a claim so old as this. Statutes leveled against fraud, against undue advantage, have denounced as a crime the transfer of demands much younger than this. So in every system of jurisprudence with which we are familiar the diligent creditor has been encouraged and stale demands have been stamped with the disapprobation of every species of judicial courts.

But here we are told that if the State of Massachusetts and the Northeastern Railway Company, or the European and North American Railroad Company, if that be the title, have lain by year in and year out, although children then unborn have grown gray in the mean time, although payments have been received on account and finally the last installment of principal has been paid and accepted, and no breath breathed of a claim of interest, yet so far from that working an extinguishment, so far from discrediting and disproving this demand, the equities of Massachusetts only mount higher because for half a century she has slept upon her rights. That is a new idea, is it not? Did any lawyer ever hear before that in law or in equity half a century of silence was a recommendation, an increase of the probability and equity of a claim? It simply makes the current of authority run up hill to contend for any such doctrine.

Mr. President, I conclude my comment upon this amendment with this statement:

First, by universal law and American law Massachusetts never had, to begin with, a claim to the interest as following by right the principal of this demand.

Second, if such a right existed it could exist only from and after the time when the demand was liquidated.

And, third, after that time confessedly there never having been a demand for interest or promise to pay it, an account, some account, I care not what, was stated of the claims of Massachusetts for services, disbursements, and expenditures, which account was allowed, every penny of it was paid to and received by Massachusetts; and now if every penny of it was principal, if it was received only as principal, the truth existing that no promise was made at the time to pay interest, by the universal concurrence of authority, to which I respectfully challenge an example to the contrary, it was an accord and satisfaction, in spite of which no court of equity could decree and no court of law could adjudge that a shadow of right exists to demand interest upon the principal sum paid. On the contrary, that accord and satisfaction stands as an insurmountable barrier against every known approach but one. If it be true or if it be insisted that the party to that accord was imposed upon, that fraud or surprise entered into it, that suffocates the right, in the quaint language of an old judge; fraud unravels and vitiates everything, and in the presence of fraud you may talk about reopening and reexamining an account stated; but when the principal has been paid, and the proposition is that interest not stipulated for at the time shall be demanded afterward, the law and equity and truth all concur in saying never, never according to law.

Mr. SPRAGUE. Mr. President, I have not been seen by any one from the lobby in reference to this measure. My vote must be governed and will be governed by the information that I have received through the declarations and speeches of the different Senators, and I must confess that it is a very difficult thing for me to make up my mind as to the vote I shall give from those speeches. I must, therefore, be governed by my own judgment and reflection in the matter; and being governed by that, I have come to the conclusion from the speech uttered by the Senator from New York that my duty leads me to vote for the claim presented by the State of Massachusetts; and while coming to that conclusion I must beg leave for a moment to pause in the contemplation of the remark which fell from the lips of that eminent Senator, that New York pays one third of the income of the Government. Now, in my judgment it is susceptible of the clearest demonstration that the people of New England to-day pay as much of the revenue derived from the State of New York as the people of the State of New York themselves. That remark of the honorable Senator has led me to this reflection, which had not entered into my calculations before upon this question: whether it has struck him or the Senate it has struck me, that the opposition from the Senator or the influence which has resulted in his opposition has been in the contemplation of the effort made by New England at this time and in this way to extricate herself from the tributary relation which exists between her and the city and State of New York. That relation will certainly be severed, and it is the interest of this whole country, South and North, East and West, that that relation shall in some respects be severed, and that the growing progress of the great State of New York shall not come here to dictate the legislation of the country as well as its politics.

Sir, I am proud of the history of that State and of her eminent men. They belong to the country; they belong to New England as much as they do to any other portion of the country. The enterprises of New England and the public spirit of her men engaged in those enterprises have contributed to the greatness of the State and the people of New York; they share alike in their glory and in their prosperity. New England must protect herself against the charges that are made. Although the people of Rhode Island, whom I have the honor to represent, care but little for the people of Massachusetts or of Maine upon this or any other question, except when engaged in developing the enterprises of the country and in contributing to the honor and to the glorious destiny in store for us all, they yet feel that it is becoming and will be becoming in them to defend the reputation of New England, of which Rhode Island and the people of Rhode Island are a part.

I have sat here for the last four or five days and listened to the shafts leveled against that people, and I am unwilling to sit here longer without entering a solemn protest against such language. The war of 1812 is held up to the country and to the Senate as a stigma, and all the glory that there is in soldiery is supposed to be handed down to our own time. I tell the Senate and the country that the same act was performed by the boasted honor and chivalry and soldierly qualities of the men engaged in the present rebellion in my own experience. It will not do to go back sixty years and cast a stigma upon that people who lost more by the results of that war, that timid, ineffective, most cowardly prosecuted war in the history of the world—that people contributed more and lost more than any similar people the world has seen. Sir, she had no soil on which to subsist a population; she had by her energy and skill established for herself and for the nation its commerce; and what was the result? A war was brought upon her by men in the interior, who cried "war," "war," when war would injure them but little, but would contribute to their trade, to their prosperity, and to their advancement. Beleaguered New England stood firm. She was beleaguered from all her borders, from the Canada side and from the water side. New York, with but a small entrance, was uninjured in fact. New Jersey was in fact uninjured. The great power of Great Britain was standing against New England, and Senators stigmatize her for refusing, as she ought to have refused, to permit her only defense to go—where? Where there was no danger and stay where danger was.

Sir, I am astonished at the words uttered here by the Senator from Michigan, [Mr. CHANDLER.] He belongs to New England. For him to go back and visit upon that people the language that he has used profoundly affects me with astonishment and surprise; and especially so when I have been on the Committee on Commerce in this Senate and when from time to time appropriations increased two or threefold have been given to his State without any possible national advantage.

Mr. CHANDLER. Mr. President.—
The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Rhode Island yield the floor?

Mr. SPRAGUE. No.

The PRESIDING OFFICER: The Senator declines to yield. The Senator from Rhode Island is entitled to the floor.

Mr. SPRAGUE. Investigate the appropriations. I know about them. But here in my judgment, not fully known possibly to the projectors of this enterprise, is a work of great national importance; and I have been led to believe and to realize, since listening to the remarks made by the different Senators, that if there is any project more entitled than another to their candid consideration and investigation, considering the whole country, this is the one. I will not speak of the men who aided in that most disastrous and cowardly war of 1812-14; but I will say that the men who led the rank and file engaged in whatever of honor there was in it came from the schools located in New England; and the only naval fleet-victory to-day that the nation has to boast of came from the little State of Rhode Island commanded by Perry. So it will not do for men who understand the true history of that people and the true relations which subsist between the energetic people of New England and the rest of this country to indulge in such comments as we have heard here; but I forbear further to comment on that subject.

My remarks have been extended longer than I intended when I rose, and I will not longer detain the Senate.

Mr. CHANDLER. The Senator from Rhode Island has drawn upon his fancy for his facts, and it is a poor draft for he has not caught anything. I made no charge against New England, not a word of it, not a syllable, except upon the men who are pressing this fraudulent claim. I charged that upon them; but not one word did I say of the soldiers of New England in the war of 1812, nor did I cast a reflection upon them.

Now, sir, while I am up I wish to make one single statement that I forgot when I was up before. I stated then how these accounts were opened on the 3d day of March, 1857. I likewise stated that the Senator from Massachusetts very properly and justly voted against that proposition, deeming it then as I do now a fraudulent one.

Mr. SUMNER. No.

Mr. CHANDLER. Well, an improper one. On the 31st day of May, 1858, that was followed by this amendment—and this is a repetition of what I stated the other night—moved to an appropriation bill:

"And be it further enacted, That the proper accounting officers of the Treasury be authorized and directed to examine the accounts between the United States and the several States which have been or may be allowed interest upon claims against the United States which have accrued during or since the war of 1812 with Great Britain, and apply in such examination the provisions and principles of the twelfth section of the act of March 3, 1857, entitled 'An act making appropriations for certain civil expenses of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1858,' and that any money found upon such re-examination to be due any State shall be paid to such State out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated."

This proposition, had it passed in May, 1858, would have opened all the accounts of all the States that furnished money during the war of 1812 to readjustment on the basis of the settlement of the claim of Maryland the year before; but that did not pass. In the following year, on the 26th of February, 1859, the self-same proposition was made in an enlarged form. It was in these words:

"That all the States which have had or shall have refunded to them by the United States moneys expended by such States for military purposes during or since the war of 1812 with Great Britain, which have not already been allowed interest upon the moneys so expended, shall now be allowed interest so far as they have themselves paid or lost it; said interest to be computed by the proper accounting officers of the Treasury according to the provisions and principles directed to be applied to the case of Maryland by the twelfth section of the act of March 3, 1857, entitled 'An act making appropriations for certain civil expenses of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1858,' and that all the States which have been allowed interest upon claims against the United States, accruing during or since said war of 1812, shall be entitled to have their interest accounts re-examined and restated by the proper accounting officers of the Treasury according to the provisions and principles of the twelfth section of said act of March 3, 1857; and that those provisions and principles shall govern the computation of interest in all cases in which interest may hereafter be allowed to any of the States. Any money found to be due to any State, as directed by this section to be computed and ascertained, shall be paid to such State out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated."

That did not become a law, but it was pressed by all the old States which had an interest in these claims, and the amount then, on the 26th day of February, 1859, was over $17,000,000. The old States which would receive these $17,000,000, of which $1,070,000 was to go to the State of Virginia alone, combined to make this a law. Here let me say that if this rule is to be applied to Massachusetts there will be no power to resist its application to every other State having a claim against the Government. The amount to-day is not $17,000,000, as it was on the 26th of February, 1859, for there is ten years' interest to be added, so that if you allow this claim to Massachusetts accruing from the war of 1812 there is no way on earth that you can resist any other claim of any other State upon the same basis, and that whole amount to-day, for compound interest on claims arising in the war of 1812, not of $17,000,000, but of over $20,000,000, will have to be paid. If we are going to pass this claim and give this amount to Massachusetts let us take the amendment offered in 1859 and give it to all the States and settle the whole thing at once. Let us pay the whole twenty or twenty-four or twenty-five millions, whatever it is, and have done with it, and not have it pressed upon us year after year until it is all finally to be allowed.

I state that the total amount is over twenty millions to-day of compound interest on these old claims, and if we allow this we shall have to go the whole figure. When we combined all the new States then and settled it they gave it up and said "this question is settled forever and will never again be pressed;" but it now comes up; it is the same old monster in another form, but now it is for a railroad company in Maine, presenting a claim for the States of Massachusetts and Maine, not for all the States. Why not bring in the whole thing? Let us take at once the whole dose. It is a bitter dose, but we may as well swallow it at once as have it given to us piecemeal year after year. I hope the proposition will be rejected.

Mr. CONNESS. Mr. President, I do not rise to deliver a lecture to anybody. Senators have a right to discuss as long as they please every question here; but it does appear to me that Senators opposed to this amendment might allow us to take the vote on it, so that if it be not the will of the Senate that it shall be voted down there may be then some reasonable excuse for attempting to defeat the bill, it having been adopted; but if the Senate shall vote it down those Senators will have no complaint to make, and it is the last time the amendment can be offered. I hope we shall be allowed to vote.

Mr. CONKLING. There is some wisdom in that suggestion.

Mr. CONNESS. I do not know whether there is or not. I do not speak it for the wisdom there is in it. I do not hope to enlighten anybody. I hope we shall be permitted to vote and go on with the public business. If this bill must be lost because this amendment shall be adopted let it be lost after it is adopted; but let us not fight the time away until that is done.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment to the amendment moved by the Senator from Kentucky.

Mr. SUMNER. Let that be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to amend the amendment by adding thereto the following:

And the Treasury officers are hereby authorized to audit and pay to the loyal owners of the slaves that were drafted or enlisted into the military service of the United States during the late rebellion the bounty to which such owners may be entitled under the law of Congress.

The amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question recurs on the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. SUMNER.]

Mr. SUMNER and others called for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 16, nays 25; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Cattell, Corbett, Fessenden, McDonald, Morrill of Maine, Nye, Patterson of New Hampshire, Pomeroy, Ross, Sawyer, Sprague, Sumner, Van Winkle, Vickers, Warner, and Wilson—16.
NAYS—Messrs. Buckalew, Chandler, Conkling, Conness, Davis, Drake, Edmunds, Frelinghuysen, Grimes, Harris, Henderson, Hendricks, Howard, Howe, McGreevy, Morgan, Morrill of Vermont, Patterson of Tennessee, Rice, Robertson, Sherman, Stewart, Trumbull, Willey, and Williams—25.

ABSENT—Messrs. Abbott, Anthony, Bayard, Cameron, Cole, Cragin, Dixon, Doolittle, Ferry, Fowler, Harlan, Kellogg, Morton, Norton, Osborn, Pool, Ramsey, Saulsbury, Spencer, Thayer, Tipton, Wade, Welch, Whyte, and Yates—25.

So the amendment was rejected.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time. The bill was read the third time, and passed.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed the following joint resolutions and bills, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 474) authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to admit free of duty a certain submarine telegraph cable;

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 475) for the appointment of Thomas A. Osborn as manager of the National Asylum for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers;

A bill (H. R. No. 2022) to repeal the first section of an act relating to appeals to the Supreme Court; and

A bill (H. R. No. 2023) to amend an act entitled "An act imposing taxes on distilled spirits and tobacco, and for other purposes," approved July 20, 1868.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the enrolled bill (H. R. No. 2009) to authorize the Secretary of War to place at the disposal of the National Lincoln Monument Association at Springfield, Illinois, damaged and captured ordnance; and the enrolled joint resolution (S. R. No. 217) for printing the Medical and Surgical History of the Rebellion; and they were signed by the President pro tempore.

RAILROAD IN OREGON.

Mr. HENDRICKS. With the permission of the Senate, I wish to report back a bill from the Committee on Public Lands. I am directed by that committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 918) explanatory of the act of July 25, 1866, granting lands to aid in the construction of a railroad and telegraph line from the Central Pacific railroad, in California, to Portland, in Oregon, to report it back. I had desired to make a written report on the case expressing my views from the committee but I have not been able to do it. It has been impossible. I regret to be compelled to report the bill back without any recommendation on the subject. My impression is that the questions between the two companies are judicial questions, and that all that it is the duty of Congress to do is to remove the condition on which the grant is made so that the rightful grantee under the authority of the State of Oregon shall enjoy it. This view I desire to express, as I was not able to do it in the form of a report.

ISSUE AND PRINTING OF SECURITIES.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I ask unanimous consent to make a report at this time from the joint Committee on Retrenchment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I report from the Committee on Retrenchment on the subject of a resolution instructing that committee to make an examination of the methods adopted in the Treasury Department in printing bonds, notes, and other securities of the United States; what guards have been adopted to prevent fraud and mistakes; what additional measures, if any, ought to be adopted to prevent frauds and mistakes; whether there has been any fraudulent or erroneous issue of bonds, notes, or securities; and if so, by whose fault or negligence, and the proper remedy and prevention thereof; and especially to examine the official conduct of those charged with printing, registering, and issuing any notes, bonds, or other securities of the United States. I make this report covering a great deal of ground and a great amount of treasure, and accompanied by a large amount of statistics and evidence which will be filed with the Secretary; and I ask leave of the Senate, if there be no objection, to make such additions in the way of explanations and completion of the tables as shall be necessary to have the subject perfectly understood. The committee have been so pressed for time, covering so much ground, that the report is not in that complete state that it ought to be to be perfectly understood. I therefore ask that permission.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. No objection being interposed, leave will be granted to the committee to make any further additions to their report.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I move that it be printed. The motion was agreed to.

RECESS.

Mr. DRAKE. I move that the Senate take a recess to-day from half past four to seven o'clock.

The motion was agreed to.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The following bills and joint resolutions received from the House of Representatives were severally read twice by their titles, and referred as indicated below:

The bill (H. R. No. 2022) to repeal the first section of an act relating to appeals to the Supreme Court—to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The bill (H. R. No. 2023) to amend an act entitled "An act imposing taxes on distilled spirits and tobacco, and for other purposes," approved July 20, 1868—to the Committee on Finance.

The joint resolution (H. R. No. 475) relating to the pay of the Sergeant-at-Arms—to the Committee on Appropriations.

The joint resolution (H. R. No. 474) authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to admit free of duty a certain submarine telegraph cable—to the Committee on Finance.

THOMAS A. OSBORN.

The joint resolution (H. R. No. 475) for the appointment of Thomas A. Osborn as manager of the National Asylum for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers was read twice by its title.

Mr. WILSON. I ask unanimous consent to put the House joint resolution appointing Thomas A. Osborn manager of the National Asylum for Disabled and Volunteer Soldiers on its passage.

There being no objection the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution (H. R. No. 475) for the appointment of Thomas A. Osborn as manager of the National Asylum for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers. It provides for the appointment of Mr. Osborn in place of and for the unexpired term of Richard J. Oglesby, of Illinois.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATION.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a letter from the Secretary of the Interior, communicating the report of the trustees of schools of the cities of Washington and Georgetown; which was ordered to lie on the table.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (H. R. No. 1744) to strengthen the public credit and relating to contracts for the payment of coin, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

W. W. CORCORAN.

Mr. HARLAN. I move now that the Senate proceed with the consideration of the joint resolution (H. R. No. 413) in relation to lands and other property of W. W. Corcoran, in the District of Columbia, used by the United States Government during and since the war of the rebellion.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate resumed the consideration of the joint resolution.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. POMEROY.) The question is on the passage of the joint resolution, upon which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

The question being taken, resulted—yeas 34, nays 8; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Buckalew, Cattell, Chandler, Cole, Conkling, Conness, Cragin, Drake, Fessenden, Harlan, Harris, Henderson, Hendricks, Howard, Kellogg, McCreery, McDonald, Morgan, Morrill of Maine, Morrill of Vermont, Patterson of New Hampshire, Patterson of Tennessee, Pomeroy, Ramsey, Rice, Robertson, Ross, Sumner, Trumbull, Van Winkle, Vickers, Whyte, Willey, and Wilson—34.

NAYS—Messrs. Stewart, Thayer, and Wade—3. ABSENT—Messrs. Abbott, Anthony, Bayard, Cameron, Corbett, Davis, Dixon, Doolittle, Edmunds, Ferry, Fowler, Frelinghuysen, Grimes, Howe, Morton, Norton, Nye, Osborn, Pool, Saulsbury, Sawyer, Sherman, Spencer, Sprague, Tipton, Warner, Welch, Williams, and Yates—29.

So the joint resolution was passed.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. WILLEY, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the petition of citizens of Martinsburg, West Virginia, members of the German Evangelical church of that town, praying compensation for their church destroyed by fire while it was occupied and used by United States troops, ask to be discharged from its further consideration, and that the petitioners have leave to withdraw their petition and papers; which was agreed to.

Mr. TRUMBULL, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 2022) to repeal the first section of an act relating to appeals to the Supreme Court, asked to be discharged from its further consideration; which was agreed to.

Mr. VAN WINKLE, from the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (S. No. 900) granting a pension to William B. Looney, of Alabama, reported that the committee had met, and after full and free conference had been unable to agree.

On motion of Mr. RAMSEY, it was Ordered, That the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads be discharged from the further consideration of all matters heretofore committed to them and not reported upon.

NORMAN WIARD.

Mr. NYE. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill No. 2021, for the relief of Norman Wiard.

Mr. GRIMES. I do not think that matter can be disposed of between this time and the hour for a recess.

Mr. NYE. I will say a single word. I do not suppose it will lead to debate.

Mr. GRIMES. It will. It is a claim with which I am quite familiar, and I have several documents that I desire to refer to.

Mr. NYE. I do not suppose the honorable Senator's familiarity with it changes the nature of the claim. The claim rests upon the report of a joint committee of both Houses, known, I believe, as the Committee on Ordnance, and the bill has passed the House with great unani-mity. I submit that after that the honorable Senator from Iowa will hardly propose to oppose it. It is a claim that, if it is due at all, has been due a good while, and the individual to whom it is due is suffering.

Mr. GRIMES. It is very true that it is reported at the suggestion of the Committee on Ordnance, and amounts to $130,000.

Mr. NYE. One hundred and twenty-five thousand dollars.

Mr. GRIMES. It is also true that I have in my possession a statement of the account to which Mr. Norman Wiard agreed, amounting to $4,080, which he accepted over his own signature as being a discharge of all the claims embraced in the bill.

Mr. NYE. That may be so; but I think if it was so I could avoid that admission on the ground of lunacy.

Mr. GRIMES. If you want to go on with it I am content.

Mr. NYE. I do not think this committee have stumbled over such an obstacle as that, and from the amount of guns he furnished it was entirely impossible that that could have been his intention.

Mr. GRIMES. How many did he furnish?

Mr. NYE. I will submit the question. I desire to take up the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on taking up the bill for consideration.

The motion was not agreed to.

REMOVAL OF DISABILITIES.

Mr. STEWART. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill No. 1880, to remove disabilities. It has been read and discussed, and I suppose we can have a vote on it very soon.

Mr. CONKLING. We can do that, I think, after the recess. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Sergeant-at-Arms was directed to clear the galleries.

Mr. McCREERY. I ask as a favor, while the galleries are being cleared, that the vote be taken on House bill No. 1880. It is the last request I expect to make of this Congress. Other gentlemen have occupied a great deal of time in speaking; but I simply ask while the galleries are being cleared that the vote may be taken on this bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That may be done by unanimous consent.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 1880) to relieve certain persons therein named from political disabilities.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill has been read and the reported amendments agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate, as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I want to know before I vote for or against this bill how many men are included in it?

Mr. McCREERY. There are four gentlemen from Kentucky, and I indorse them all as peaceable and law-abiding citizens.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Are they all that are in the bill?

Mr. McCREERY. Four from that State.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Who are the others?

Mr. STEWART. It is a House bill. We have added names to it. I do not know the exact number.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I understand it comes from the Judiciary Committee. I make no objection.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time. The bill was read the third time, and passed.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

The Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business; and at half past four o'clock the doors were reopened, and the Senate, pursuant to order, took a recess until seven o'clock p. m.

EVENING SESSION.

The Senate reassembled at seven o'clock p. m.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATION.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a report from the Secretary of the Interior, communicating, in compliance with a resolution of the Senate, information concerning the remnant of the tribe of the Seminole Indians in south Florida; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

IMPORTATION OF SCIENTIFIC APPARATUS.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House joint resolution No. 327, which I think will take no time.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the joint resolution (H. R. No. 327) authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to remit the duty on certain meridian circles, the pending question being on the amendment reported by the Committee on Finance, to strike out all after the resolving clause and in lieu thereof to insert the following:

That all books, maps, charts, statues, statuary, busts, and casts of marble, bronze, alabaster, and all paintings and drawings, etchings, specimens of sculpture, cabinets of coins, medals, regalia, gems, and all collections of antiquities, and mathematical, philosophical, and scientific apparatus imported into the United States since the 1st day of May, A. D. 1863, be admitted free of duty: Provided, That the same be specially imported in good faith for the use of any society incorporated or established for philosophical, literary, or religious purposes, or for the encouragement of the fine arts, or for the use or by the order of any college, academy, school, or seminary of learning in the United States.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I will ask to leave out the amendment, and then the resolution will apply only to the meridian circle at Harvard and the one at Chicago. I ask the Senate to disagree to the amendment of the Finance Committee, as it will lead to debate.

Mr. SUMNER. Had we not better adopt the amendment?

Mr. TRUMBULL. We cannot do it. It will lead to debate. The Committee on Finance have reported an amendment which I ask the Senate to disagree to, because there is objection to it and we cannot get it through at this session.

The amendment was rejected.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BRITISH STEAMER LABUAN.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government.

Mr. SUMNER. I would appeal to my friend to allow action—

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Let this bill come up and then I will see what I can do.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. SUMNER. Now, I ask the Senate to be good enough to take up the bill (S. No. 528) to carry into effect the decree of the district court of the United States for the southern district of New York in the case of the British steamer Labuan.

The motion was agreed to by unanimous consent; and the bill was read the second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole.

It provides for the payment to William Bailey, William Leetham, and John Leetham, of England, or their legal representatives, owners of the British steamer Labuan, of $131,221 30, with interest from June 2, 1862, to the time of payment, and $5,000 without interest; also, to Messrs. De Jersey & Co., of England, or their legal representatives, part owners of the cargo of the same steamer, $3,613 92, with interest, from May 21, 1862, to the time of payment; and to Francisco Amendiaz, of Matamoros, Mexico, or his legal representatives, part owner of the cargo of the same steamer, $2,067 17, with interest from June 6, 1862, to the time of payment; such sums being due under a decree of the district court of the United States for the southern district of New York, pronounced March 25, 1868, on account of the illegal capture of the British steamer Labuan and her cargo by a cruiser of the United States.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, was read the third time, and passed.

BRITISH VESSELS VOLANT AND SCIENCE.

Mr. SUMNER. There is another similar bill, the bill (S. No. 551) to carry into effect the two several decrees of the district court of the United States for the district of Louisiana in the cases of the British vessels Volant and Science.

Mr. STEWART. I hope that will not be taken up.

Mr. SUMNER. There can be no objection to it. It is to carry out a decree of our own Supreme Court.

Mr. STEWART. I understand that, and I am opposed to doing it. Until Great Britain does some affirmative act toward the settlement of the Alabama claims I am opposed to paying anything to British subjects for losses during the war, no matter how incurred.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It can only be taken up by unanimous consent. Does any Senator object?

Mr. STEWART. I object.

Mr. SUMNER. Do I understand the Senator objects to that class of cases?

Mr. STEWART. I object.

Mr. SUMNER. This is one affecting a French—

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I think we had better proceed with the bill regularly before us.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the enrolled bill (H. R. No. 1744) to strengthen the public credit and relating to contracts for the payment of coin; and it was signed by the President pro tempore.

CIVIL APPROPRIATION BILL.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill (H. R. No. 2007) making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1870, and for other purposes, is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole. The amendments reported by the Committee on Appropriations will be acted on in their order as the bill is read if there be no objection.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. As the Senate is thin I think the bill had better be read through, and then the amendments acted on.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That course will be pursued.

The bill was read.

STATIONERY CONTRACTS.

Mr. ANTHONY. As the reading of this bill is concluded and there seems to be no great pressure for going on with it just now, I will appeal to my friend from Maine to allow me to call up a bill which I think is of very considerable importance, and in which I have no greater interest than every other Senator, and which is intended to correct gross and flagrant abuses in the Departments. It has been discovered in some investigations of the Committee on Printing of the House of Representatives that in some of the bureaus the stationery amounts to from four to ten times the actual fair and proper cost of those supplies. A bill has been passed by the House of Representatives and reported from the Committee on Printing to remedy the evil. It is House bill No. 1601, and I desire to call it up.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there any objection to the consideration of the bill named?

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. If it will lead to no debate and will simply involve the reading and passing of the bill, I shall make no objection; but if it leads to debate I must insist upon the Senate going on with the appropriation bill.

Mr. ANTHONY. Of course I recognize the supremacy of the appropriation bills at this time, and if the bill to which I have referred shall lead to debate I will not urge it now.

Mr. THAYER. There will be objection to that bill; it will lead to discussion.

Mr. ANTHONY. I do not wish to take any unfair advantage. Does the Senator from Nebraska say that he proposes to discuss the bill?

Mr. THAYER. There will be objection to that bill, and it will lead to discussion.

Mr. CONNESS. Let it be read.

Mr. ANTHONY. I do not think there will be any objection to the bill after I have spoken about five minutes.

The bill (H. R. No. 1601) to provide stationery for Congress and for the several Departments, and for other purposes, was read.

Mr. ANTHONY. I can best show the necessity of this bill by an exhibition of some papers before me.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. The Senator will allow me to suggest that I am informed this bill will lead to debate, and if so I think it ought not to be pressed now.

Mr. ANTHONY. I certainly will not do so if Senators object; and if, after I make a statement which I can make in five minutes, anybody objects, I shall then withdraw the request for the consideration of the bill. I wish to say one word to show the necessity of this bill or of some bill of this kind, and I can best do it by illustrating what has been done.

A piece of paper like that which I now exhibit to the Senate, bearing six words in print, is supplied to the Patent Office, or was before the present Commissioner came in, who is a thoroughly honest man I have no doubt, for forty dollars a thousand, and supplied in five times the quantity necessary. I could get rich on printing them at two dollars a thousand. I have here a blank-book that is called a caveat book. The Patent Office generally uses two of these books a year, and this year they have commenced upon the third; they never use three. The law requires that it shall be made at the Government bindery. It would cost there fifteen dollars. If three were required the total cost would be forty-five dollars. Last year there were forty-eight supplied at from forty to forty-one dollars a piece; three were used, and there is not one in the office.

Mr. TRUMBULL. What office is that?

Mr. ANTHONY. The Patent Office. The cost of this book for the Patent Office last year was nearly two thousand dollars, and the fair cost is not over forty dollars. This is a single illustration. The contractor testified before our committee that he gave eighteen dollars for the books and sold them to the Government for forty dollars, and we had two very able lawyers attempting for two days to prove to us that it was a fair contract, and that we ought to pay more of the same kind. This has been paid.

I will not detain the Senate. If any Senator desires to take the responsibility of putting over this bill after this statement, which is but an illustration of frauds that amount to more than seventy-five thousand dollars in one bureau of this Department, be it so. It is a bill which in the opinion of one of my colleagues in the House, and a colleague of my friend from Vermont on the Retrenchment Committee, will save the Government $250,000 a year. That is more than I think it will save; I think it will save about half that sum. I could go on for an hour showing that things like this large envelope which I now exhibit, are supplied in from five to ten times the number required at ten times a fair price. The same thing prevails to a greater or less extent in the other Departments. Last year, with considerable difficulty, we got through Congress a bill to have this sort of printing done at the Government Printing Office. It was resisted on the ground that it could not be done at the Government Printing Office. I have now in my hand a specimen of the way it was done by Government contract and the way it is now done by the Government Printing Office, and the difference in cost is $75,000 a year. The whole stationery business of the Departments is full of corruptions of this kind; and I wish to say that it affords me very great gratification to learn that our Secretary, who has the purchase of some of the stationery for the Senate, is in favor of this bill.

Mr. MORTON. Mr. President, this is a very important bill and makes very radical changes in regard to the purchase of all the stationery for the Government, giving it substantially to one man. It is a bill that will be resisted and lead to very general debate, I am satisfied, for which there is no time to-night. A bill of this kind ought not to be pressed just at the last hours of the session.

Mr. ANTHONY. I will correct my friend from Indiana. It gives it to the joint Committee on Printing, composed of three Senators and three Representatives. Everything is to be done under their direction. I will not persist, however, in urging the bill now.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I call for the consideration of the bill regularly before the Senate.

ARMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House had disagreed to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 1803) making appropriations for the support of the Army for the year ending June 30, 1870, and for other purposes, asked a conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. J. A. GANFIELD of Ohio, Mr. F. C. BEAMAN of Michigan, and Mr. G. M. DODGE of Iowa, managers at the same on its part.

The Senate proceeded to consider its amendments to the bill (H. R. No. 1803) making appropriations for the support of the Army for the year ending June 30, 1870, and for other purposes, disagreed to by the House of Representatives.

On motion by Mr. MORRILL, of Maine, it was

Resolved, That the Senate insist upon its amendments disagreed to by the House, and agree to the conference asked by the House of Representatives on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

Ordered, That the conferees on the part of the Senate be appointed by the President pro tempore of the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore appointed Mr. WILSON, Mr. SPRAGUE, and Mr. CONNESS.

CIVIL APPROPRIATION BILL.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. No. 2007) making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1870, and for other purposes.

The first amendment reported by the Committee on Appropriations was to strike out from line eight to line one hundred and thirty-two, in the following words:

For the following expenses in carrying into effect the several acts of Congress authorizing loans and the issuing of Treasury notes:

In the Secretary's office:
For two clerks at $2,500 each, $5,000; two clerks at $2,000 each, $4,000; twenty clerks at $1,800 each, $36,000; fifteen clerks at $1,600 each, $24,000; ten clerks at $1,400 each, $14,000; eight clerks at $1,200 each, $9,600; three messengers at $840 each, $2,520; six laborers at $720 each, $4,320; seventy-five female clerks at $900 each, $67,500; contingent expenses, $1,000; in all, $167,940.

In the Treasurer's office:
For four clerks at $1,800 each, $7,200; fourteen clerks at $1,600 each, $22,400; eleven clerks at $1,400 each, $15,400; ten clerks at $1,200 each, $12,000; three messengers at $840 each, $2,520; six laborers at $720 each, $4,320; four laborers at $432 each, $1,728; fifty female clerks at $900 each, $45,000; contingent expenses, $1,000; in all, $111,568.

In the Register's office:
For five clerks at $2,500 each, $12,500; fourteen clerks at $1,800 each, $25,200; nine clerks at $1,600 each, $14,400; one clerk at $1,200; five messengers, at $840 each, $4,200; four laborers, at $720 each, $2,880; one hundred and forty female clerks, at $900 each, $126,000; in all, $184,880.

In the First Comptroller's office:
For three clerks, at $1,400 each, $4,200; eight female clerks, at $900 each, $7,200; in all, $11,400.

In the First Auditor's office:

For two clerks, at $1,800 each, $3,600; three clerks, at $1,600 each, $4,800; five clerks, at $1,400 each, $7,000; six clerks, at $1,200 each, $7,200; in all, $22,600.

In the Bureau of Engraving and Printing of the Treasury Department:

One chief of bureau, at $3,000 per year; one chief clerk, at $2,000 per year; two clerks, at $1,800 per year each; one clerk, at $1,200 per year; one superintendent of plate printing, at $2,400 per year; one master machinist, at $2,400 per year; one superintendent of transferers, at $3,000 per year; one superintendent of engravers and custodian of dies, at $3,000 per year; one prover, at $1,800 per year; one superintendent of numberers, at $1,800 per year; three foremen of divisions, at $1,500 per year; five transferers, at $2,000 per year; two engravers, at $2,500 per year; one engraver, at $2,000 per year; three engravers, at $1,800 per year; one engraver, at $1,200 per year; one engraver, at $1,000 per year; one hundred and seventeen plate printers, at $2,100 each per year; forty valve-tenders, at $585 per year; seventeen female operatives, at $720 per year; four female operatives, at $600 per year; one hundred and sixty-six female operatives, at $500 per year; one hundred female operatives, at $375 per year; nine male operatives, at $1,200 per year; four male operatives, at $900 per year; thirty male operatives, at $625 per year; forty male operatives, at $500 per year; twelve male operatives, at $300 per year.

For material for the supply of the Bureau of Engraving and Printing of the Treasury Department:

For chemicals, glue, and other material for paper-mill, $6,000; for straw boards for boxes and other materials for bindery, $5,000; for material for bond-indorsing division, $3,000; for freight, expressing, and hauling material, $4,000; for bronze for fractional currency, $45,000; for steel plates, rolls, tools, &c., and miscellaneous engraving, $20,000; for hardware, fuel, tools, oil, brushes, brooms, paints, benzine, turpentine, machinery, material for repair of machinery in machine shops, $45,000; for sheeting, tawling, and washing rags and towels, $16,000; for colors of various kinds for manufacturing inks, $27,000; for bank-note and manilla paper, $82,000; for pure sheet rubber and other material used in plate printing, $10,000; for miscellaneous articles, $4,000; for contingent expenses, $3,000; being a total amount of $300,000; and the compensation of the United States examiner of chemicals and drugs at Boston shall hereafter be $2,000 per annum.

And it is hereby provided, That until the further order of Congress there shall be no more persons employed and no additional amounts paid for carrying into effect the several acts of Congress authorizing loans and the issue of Treasury notes than those herein specifically provided for.

To pay for express charges on transportation of money and bonds, $25,000. And no greater amount shall be paid for express charges in any one year.

And in lieu thereof to insert:

For necessary expenses in carrying into effect the several acts of Congress authorizing loans and the issue of Treasury notes, $1,250,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment proposed by the Committee on Appropriations was to strike out from line one hundred and seventy-six to one hundred and seventy-eight inclusive, as follows:

To defray the expense of a preliminary survey of the site for the proposed navy-yard at League Island, $5,000.

Mr. BUCKALEW. I ask that that amendment may be passed for a short time. The Senator from New Jersey [Mr. CATTELL] is not in his seat.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I have no objection.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be passed over, and the next will be read.

The SECRETARY. The next amendment is to strike out lines one hundred and seventy-nine, one hundred and eighty, and one hundred and eighty-one, as follows:

For the completion of a bridge over the Dakota river and to locate and survey the road from said bridge to the Vermillion bridge, $1,000.

Mr. HARLAN. I inquire the reason for striking out this item?

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. It was principally because the committee had no information on the subject.

Mr. HARLAN. It is new to me, but I am of the impression that it is to complete a wagon-road authorized by a previous act of Congress, so as to connect with the railroad at Sioux city and Yanteton in Dakota Territory; and if it be for that purpose, and be only $1,000, I think it had better stand.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. That would put it on too vague a basis for an appropriation of any kind.

Mr. HARLAN. I ask that it be passed over for the present until further information can be had.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Very well. Let it be passed over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be passed over. The next amendment will be read.

The SECRETARY. The next amendment is after line one hundred and ninety to insert:

For collection and payment of bounty, prize money, and other legitimate claims of colored soldiers and sailors for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1870, and for salaries of agents and clerks, $145,000.

For rent of offices, fuel, and light, $25,000.

For office furniture, $3,000.

For stationery and printing, $20,000.

For mileage and transportation of officers and agents, $18,000.

For telegraphing and postage, $3,000; being in all $214,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to strike out from line two hundred and four to two hundred and eight, as follows:

To enable the Secretary of the Interior to pay Vinnie Ream the sum now due her on the contract authorized by joint resolution approved July 28, 1866, for a statue of the late President Lincoln, $5,000.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. This sum has been appropriated in the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill, and therefore is struck out here.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to strike out from line two hundred and nine to two hundred and fourteen, as follows:

For this amount to pay B. A. Shepherd the sum due him on a lost check drawn by Robert S. Neighbors, United States special Indian agent, on the 2d of June, 1859, on the Assistant Treasurer of the United States at New York city, for supplies furnished the Indian department, $1,200.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to strike out from line two hundred and forty-five to two hundred and forty-nine, as follows:

To procure a survey and report, and for repairing wharf at the site for the navy-yard on the river Thames, near New London, Connecticut, deeded to the United States for naval purposes, $10,000; but no further amount shall be contracted to be paid for this purpose.

Mr. FERRY. I trust that this amendment will not be concurred in; and I would appeal to the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations that he will not insist upon this amendment after a statement of the circumstances under which the appropriation was placed in the bill by the House of Representatives.

Some two or three years ago an act of Congress was passed inviting the State of Connecticut to purchase and give to the Federal Government a site for a navy-yard or a naval station on the Thames river near the city of New London, in Connecticut. The State of Connecticut accordingly purchased a very valuable site for that purpose and deeded it to the Government of the United States. Last year an appropriation for the purpose of making a survey and completing the exterior inclosures of the station was placed upon an appropriation bill in the Senate but failed in the House. Since that time the commandant of the navy-yard at New York has desired to make use of this naval station for the purpose of transferring to it a portion of the vessels now crowded together at the navy-yard in New York and in danger from fire.

The front is about a mile in length, with an average depth of thirty feet, wharfed to a considerable extent, but the wharf dilapidated and out of repair, needing at this time repairs for the purpose of being used for the objects which I have mentioned.

I ought to add that the Secretary of the Navy recommended an appropriation of $10,000 last year, and it failed between the two Houses, as I have stated. This year it has been put into the bill by the committee on the part of the House and passed by the House. I have here a letter from the commandant of the navy-yard at New York, referring to the facts which I have stated. I will read a short portion of it:

"The wharf is wanted, first, for the purpose of safely securing vessels that are placed in ordinary and which from their present proximity to each other are subject to frequent removals, adding to their cost besides the danger in case of fire."

He says that if vessels could be sent there it would in many cases obviate the necessity of putting them in a regular dock-yard for repairs, and adds:

"The waters of New London harbor are resorted to by all nations, particularly for ships of heavy draft. It is the favorite cruising ground for naval school ships."

All that is desired here is to make the proper survey and repair a wharf already existing and needing repair upon this Government property. I hope the Senate will not concur in the amendment.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. The committee had no fixed opinion about this matter. There seemed to be an entire want of special information on the subject; and for that reason, perhaps, more than any other, it was non-concurred in. I shall make no further remarks about it.

Mr. GRIMES. I should like to know how much of this appropriation is for a survey and how much to repair the wharf.

Mr. FERRY. I cannot tell how much is for the survey and how much is for the repairs of the wharf. Of course no more will be expended than is needed for this purpose.

Mr. GRIMES. We may just as well look this thing in the face first as last; it is simply the starting of a new navy-yard. This appropriation will be followed next year by an appropriation of ten times the amount. Now the question is whether we want one, and whether the fact that an admiral who is in command of one of the navy-yards has been induced to write a letter in favor of this appropriation shall cause us to make it without any investigation by any organ of this body that would justify us in acting upon it?

Mr. FERRY. The argument from possible contingencies in the future seems to be one which is not applicable to this case. The appropriation is necessary to preserve public property which the Government has invited a State to cede to it for naval purposes.

Mr. GRIMES. Is the survey necessary? What is the object of the survey?

Mr. FERRY. I cannot tell anything further than that the Secretary of the Navy recommended last year and recommends again this year that this survey be made for the purpose, I suppose, of ascertaining what may be necessary to be done in order to adapt this property ceded to the Government for Government purposes.

Mr. GRIMES. Confessedly, according to the Senator's statement, we are acting wholly in the dark in this matter. It has not been investigated by anybody at all. We do not know how much of this appropriation is to be made for a wharf and how much is for a survey, nor why a survey is necessary. All this survey has been made once by the coast survey. I have no interest in the matter. I will say, though, in regard to the Government inviting this session, that I think the State of Connecticut and the city of New London were the parties that invited it.

Mr. POMEROY. I think, with the Senator from Iowa, that Congress ought to decide which one of these navy-yards, if we are to start a new one, we shall make an appropriation for.

Mr. GRIMES. This bill provides for both.

Mr. POMEROY. I know there is in the bill as it came from the House of Representatives a small appropriation for League Island and another for this station on the Thames. These two sites have been in conflict here for several years. I do not know that we have ever given one the preference over the other, though I have always voted for the site on the Thames when I could, because I have thought that was the best. I think Congress ought to decide not to start two navy-yards, but to start one. This making a report and a survey is paving the way for commencing a navy-yard. There is no doubt about that. I think there should be one, and I believe we ought before we make the appropriations to decide which of these sites we shall have, and to that end I believe there ought to be a report. Both sites are deeded to the Government now. There was a contest for several years in this body upon the point of purchasing them, but they are now both deeded to the Government. I do not think it is expedient to commence both, but I am willing to vote an appropriation for one, and I have always preferred the one on the Thames, because of the reasons which were given at great length at the last Congress. It is more accessible to the ocean, it is in the midst of a fine mechanical section of the country; it is accessible to timber, it is within striking distance of New York, the great commercial center. All these reasons were urged here before. I do not suppose the Senate can decide to-night on an appropriation bill where the new navy-yard shall be, but if they could decide which of these points they would make appropriations to and make them, and thus settle the question, I think it would be for the public interest. To keep these two sites running along, running parallel with each other, contesting with each other, each claiming precedence every year, the result will be only to weaken instead of strengthening the naval service. Before we appropriate a dollar there ought to be some decision reached on the question.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Committee on Appropriations to strike out the clause which has been read.

The amendment was rejected.

The next amendment of the committee was to strike out from lines two hundred and seventy-six to two hundred and seventy-nine, as follows:

For commissions at two and a half per cent. to such superintendents as are entitled to the same under the provisions of the act of March 3, 1854, $20,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to strike out from lines two hundred and eighty to two hundred and eighty-two, as follows:

For fuel and quarters for officers of the Army serving on light-house duty, the payment of which is not made or provided for by the quartermaster's department, $10,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in line three hundred and three to strike out "fifty" and insert "forty," so as to make the appropriation for rebuilding a first-class light-house at Cape Hatteras, North Carolina, in addition to former appropriations, $40,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to insert after line three hundred and thirty-three:

For the construction of a light-house on Spectacle reef, Lake Huron, $100,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. POMEROY. The committee ought to assign some good reason for appropriating $100,000 up there. I suppose there must be some good reason.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. We put it in as it is estimated for. That is the only reason.

Mr. POMEROY. Estimated for by the Light-House Board?

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Yes, sir.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be read.
